The career of Sir Bartle Frere had in it two heroic moments, but in its details there is so much that is common to all distinguished Indian officials that they can have little special interest unless told by a competent biographer. The history of nearly all of them has to begin by saying that they were born gentlemen of a good stock, that they entered the service of the East India Company young, and rose through subordinate ranks to govern kingdoms, and, finally, that in the hour of trial they showed the cautious daring, that sagacity which sacrifices or risks the less for the sake of the greater, which is the highest quality of a statesman. Sir Bartle Frere's trial was met in Scind in the midst of the great crisis of the Indian Mutiny. What he did as an administrator can only be justly estimated by the few who have a full knowledge of the conditions amidst which he worked; but all the world can appreciate the wise courage of his general policy. He saw, as John Lawrence and his fellow-Commissioners in the Punjaub saw, that the fate of India was being decided at Delhi. With the courageous sagacity of a man who could look to the interest of the whole, he risked our possession of Scind to feed the army in Central India. He saw that, as long as we were not defeated there, the outlying provinces would remain quiet, or, if they revolted, could easily be crushed provided our army was victorious in the heart of the struggle. Truths of this kind are easy to see after the event, and even at the time are obvious to men far away from the scene of danger. To see them and act on them at the time and on the spot at the risk of failure and death is a proof of rare courage and insight. That so many men were found to do the bravest and wisest thing in the crisis of the Mutiny is one proof among many of the admirable training in the arts of government given by service in India.

The last part of Sir Bartle Frere's public career has somewhat overshadowed the earlier. He has been chiefly thought of lately as the Governor of the Cape of Good Hope who hurried on the Zulu War. Apart from the fact that these years lie nearer us, it is only natural that this should be so. In Africa he stood by himself; his policy was the subject of a controversy which is not yet quite ended, and part, if not the beginning, of a series of events still in progress. His position was in many ways exceptional. He was probably the last of our Colonial governors who were able to act free from the telegraph and the slavery it imposes—free from the hesitations and timidity of Ministers who are necessarily compelled to think first of domestic politics, of their popularity, and of what the Opposition can say on the stump. In South Africa he found a struggling colony menaced by a barbarous and well-armed native Power. With the instincts of a ruler trained in the school of India he met the danger half way. It was inevitable that he should have brought a high sense of the benefits conferred by English rule on savages from the scene of his own early services, and he acted accordingly. An almost accidental military disaster checked the development of his policy; but, in view of the present condition of Zululand, only those who think fine phrases more sacred than human life will be inclined to deny that it was essentially wise and humane. The great mistake Sir Bartle Frere made in choosing to do as Lord Dalhousie would have done under the circumstances was his omission to calculate on the chance that his work would be undone by his masters in England. At this moment Zululand, which would have been at peace under English supervision if his plans had been resolutely carried out, is in a miserable welter of anarchy and bloodshed, and the English Government is at last, and when it is wellnigh too late, being forced to do what he long ago pointed out was inevitable. The latter end of his administration coincided with the beginning of a new colonial policy which consists in yielding to the strong, betraying the weak, and deserting the representatives of England when they are thrust into difficulties by orders from home. The creators of this new method began by trying to worry Sir Bartle Frere into a resignation by a course of petty persecution. He refused to confess himself in the wrong; and at last, after the tergiversation and logic-chopping which form an essential part of Mr. Gladstone's measures of administration, he was dismissed. His government of South Africa was, if judged by the results, a failure; but so would his administration of Scind have been if he had worked under the same conditions. It would have been impossible for him, or even for Lord Dalhousie, to carry out a consistent policy under continual interference from Ministers in England who were always terrified by the last danger, and who could not see the end because of the details. The lives of Sir Bartle Frere, and all the men of his generation in India, should be well written, and carefully read, for they did not work under those conditions, but in the old state of things, when our method was to pick out an officer who had given proof of ability, and set him to deal with a difficulty free-handed, on the understanding that he was to be supported.

DRESS AND SANITATION.

THE important subject of dress and its relation to health and its mutations, fashionable and statutory, are adequately illustrated at the Health Exhibition. The collection of wax figures arrayed in complete historical costumes, prepared from drawings by Mr. Lewis Wingfield, is as successful in its way as the reproduction of Old London, and not inferior in suggestion. Viewed in connexion with the show of modern dress and the designs of the various reform associations, it cannot but awaken curious reflection. Few can affect to regard the exhibition with absolute indifference save, perhaps, those who possess a primeval sense of the discomfort of all garments, who are philosophically tolerant of all fashions and representative of none. To most people the subject as presented at South Kensington must prove of the most absorbing interest, and is calculated to revive one aspect at least of the pregnant question, the proposition of which by the Academy of Dijon first aroused the dormant genius of Rousseau. The conclusions deducible from a dispassionate survey are, that either the popular theory is baseless that regards the application of sanitary science to dress as peculiarly modern, or that there is some occult connexion between the artistic and scientific ideal, the perfect sanitary idea and the beautiful. It is inconceivable otherwise how, in ages that are usually termed barbarous, the perfect union of these desiderata in dress should have been so nearly effected. Some of the mediæval costumes in the collection strikingly exemplify this truth. The twelfth century, as Mr. E. W. Godwin has elsewhere practically illustrated, was distinguished by the beauty and refinement of its dress, and it was not until civilization progressed and science invaded the domain of art that the acme of stupidity and ugliness was attained. From the East our Early English costumes derived their beauty of form, and Greek influence, doubtless modified and debased, permeated the Orient. While Mr. Wingfield's designs are interesting as showing the origin of certain domestic garments, such as the smock-frock, they are even more interesting as evincing the general decadence of taste since the Crusades. At the present time fashions are more multiform and more hybridized, less distinct and individual, than ever. The improver and the reformer, they are the enemy. What the former is capable of was seen in that singular perversion of the most perfect form of dress ever devised which Miss Mary Anderson displayed as Galatea, and which a glance at the Parthenon sculptures serves to correct; the efforts of the latter are signally illustrated in the present exhibition.

It is perhaps hopeless to expect unprejudiced views of the question from the majority concerned. Certainly the casual exclamations overheard in the crowd of sightseers are not encouraging. The expressions of complacency that we are not, in the matter of dress, as were our ancestors, are almost universal. Contempt and horror and surprise are mingled with gentle respirations of satisfaction, which are too evidently genuine not to savour of unconscious humour. The prevalent scorn is not confined to the ladies, for the men will refer disdainfully to the white ducks and blue coat of the Regency dandy as a proof of our continual progression towards the beautiful. In mere justice to the Georgian buck it should be noted that the straps of his white nankeen trousers should be buckled, his yellow silk gloves should fit, his neckcloth should be readjusted, and his coat set off on a good figure; yet, even if these defects were remedied, it is doubtful if many would recognize the obvious comfort and elegance of the dress. Leaving for awhile the historical effigies, and turning to the show-cases of the Rational Dress Society, we may all feel our hearts warm towards the Georgian exquisite, even the prodigious Macaroni, while we may positively adore the stately figure of Mrs. Pritchard and the spheric harmony of her hoops. The so-called "American lady's mountain dress" is a favourite example of scientific zeal, amazingly ugly and epicene. It is true that this appalling costume is stated to have been worn by that enterprising traveller and vivacious writer, Miss Bird; but it is obvious that even so rational a dress may be inconspicuous when relieved by the magnificent scenery of the Rocky Mountains or considerably mitigated in effect by the eccentricities of Salt Lake City. Whether any lady, thus habited, may snatch therefrom a genuine but fearful joy is known only to those who love the ways untrod by man, like the American ladies who not long since traversed the Virginian mountains, a rational society. Another astonishing production, also rational, is an evening dress that purports to be an adaptation of "the Eastern trouser," and is indeed most expressively singular. It very successfully illustrates the dangers of compromise, and transforms the dégagé grace of the costume which bewitched Lady Hester Stanhope into a grotesque hybrid. "A fancy mountaineering dress" is an alliance between a tight Zouave jacket and a very modern skirt, with rational adjuncts, the skirt apparently designed to make mountaineering impossible. Of the divided skirt the naturalistic poet will perhaps some day sing with unstinted praise; at the Health Exhibition it is unlikely to awaken either rapture or conviction.

From the creations of reason and reform it is a far cry to the era of the Plantagenets and their immediate successors; yet the transition to those dark ages is not unpleasing and is richly suggestive. Here among Mr. Wingfield's designs we have a reproduction, from a drawing in the Aschaffenburg Library, of the time of Henry I., a costume, not sumptuous certainly nor elaborate, but unaffectedly charming. Still more beautiful is one copied from a window in Fribourg Cathedral of Edward I.'s reign; while even the Norman dress from the Cotton MSS., illustrating the fashion during the Conquest, is thoroughly agreeable. Absolute quaintness, sincere and undebased by eccentricity, appears in the present collection to have departed from our national dress early in the Tudor period, though several examples of good taste and felicitous harmony are exhibited later, particularly in the portraits. These latter are, of course, of the highest historical interest, and some are admirably reproduced, particularly those from originals in the Garrick Club. The Mrs. Pritchard, in The Suspicious Husband, the Hogarth, the Commonwealth figures, after etchings by Hollar, the Lady Chesterfield and the Earl of Bristol, after Van Dyck, and the imposing Lady Bacon, in all the glory of the Elizabethan costume, are all remarkable for finish and excellent realism. It is curious, by the way, to note that the origin of the elevation in the shoulders of ladies' dresses which M. Worth is credited with initiating is distinctly observable in the Georgian dandy. Several other costumes are notably harmonious in colour and charming in design, such as the lady after Holbein, with a dress of dull purple and grey trimmed with grey fur, the Queen Anne costume of purple figured chintz or dimity, and cap and ribbons corresponding, the Georgian lady's dress, with sack and coal-scuttle bonnet, and the pretty rural dress of George II.'s time. The collection is worthy of prolonged investigation; but the aims of the promoters of the Exhibition are not likely to be realized if these interested survey it in a perfunctory manner or regard it as of mere archaic value; seriously studied, in connexion with the efforts of reformers and the precepts of Paris, it may tend to avert a revolution. Simplex munditiis should be the motto of the true friend of dress reform, and the phrase comprehends all sanitation.

PROPOSED NEW CREATION OF CARDINALS.

IT is always difficult to gauge the exact value of the current gossip in Rome on ecclesiastical affairs which "our own Correspondent" believes, or affects to believe, worth the attention of his readers. Death has indeed been busy in the Sacred College during the six years of the reign of the present pontiff. When the Catholic Directory for 1884 made its appearance twenty-seven Cardinals were recorded to have died since the accession of Leo XIII.; four more have since passed away, and there are now fifteen vacancies, a larger number according to the Times Correspondent than at any period since 1877, the last year of Pius IX. But three years before that, in 1874, there were twenty-eight vacant places, and the promotions under that régime were almost entirely of Italians, and of course always of persons supposed to be in the interests of the extreme ultramontane party, then in the ascendent at Rome. The result proved, as in the case of the nominations of the previous pontificate, how little possible it is for a Pope to exercise even any indirect influence over the election of his successor. Gregory XVI. was a Conservative ecclesiastic of the straitest type with less than no sympathy for any phase of Liberalism in religion or politics. He had been induced under strong pressure to raise Mastai Ferretti—then reputed an advanced Liberal by friend and foe alike—to the purple, but he had done so with undisguised reluctance, and was said to have predicted that, if the new Cardinal should ever become Pope, he would destroy the temporal power, and terribly compromise the spiritual welfare of the Church. Certainly Pius IX. was the last man his predecessor, had he had any voice in the matter, would have desired to see invested with the triple tiara; nevertheless, through a curious series of accidents it would take too long to recount afresh here, he was almost immediately elected by a Conclave chiefly composed of the "creatures" of Gregory XVI., and still more curiously he did—though not perhaps exactly in the way Gregory had anticipated—fulfil almost to the letter his predecessor's ominous prediction. During the unprecedentedly long reign of Pius IX. he had the opportunity of pretty well filling up the Sacred College twice over; there were only, we believe, three or four of Gregory XVI.'s nominees in the Conclave which elected Leo XIII. Yet here again the election fell—and after a still shorter interval of deliberation—on one of the very last of its members whom Pius IX. would himself have chosen as a successor. According to the old proverb "man proposes and God disposes," but it is not difficult to discover reasons of a very human and intelligible kind why all previous designs or conjectures about the papabile should so generally be frustrated by the event. The simple fact is that the rules of Conclaves, on which we have before now taken occasion to enlarge, and an admirably clear exposition of which will be found in Mr. Cartwright's little work on the subject, are framed, whether purposely or not, with an elaborate and complicated ingenuity which can hardly fail to baffle any previous calculations about the result. It would hardly be a paradox to say—and many historical examples might be adduced in support of such a proposition—that credo quia impossibile is the most plausible vindication that could be offered of any conjecture on the subject. The unlikeliest candidate, according to all ordinary tests of likelihood, has again and again been elected, the likeliest hardly ever. There have been occasions in the remote past when a Pope was allowed and even urged to nominate his own successor. Hildebrand named the three who were next to succeed him. But the age and the man were alike exceptional. The Papacy was recovering, partly through German intervention, from a long and disastrous agony of moral degradation, and Hildebrand was one of the greatest rulers of men who ever sat on the papal or any other throne. In ordinary times a Pope has one means only of exercising—indirectly—a posthumous influence on the fortunes of the Roman See. He can name many—in some cases most—of the Privy Council, so to call it, whom his successor will be bound to consult, and who in the first place have the exclusive privilege of electing him. But as regards, we do not say the person but the character and policy of that successor, this influence, for causes already indicated, is a very slender and precarious one.

But still, after making all deductions, it remains true that the College of Cardinals is a body which cannot fail to exert a considerable control over the action of the reigning pontiff, whatever may be his own individual opinions. There can be no doubt, for instance, that the present Pope was during his earlier years, and to some extent still is, seriously hampered by the opposition of the very uncongenial council of advisers his predecessor had saddled him with. No doubt Leo XIII. finds this inconvenience aggravated from his own honourable but rather self-denying resolve, announced from the first, to govern on strictly constitutional principles, and do nothing by his own mere arbitrary will—the one point on which his departure from the example of his predecessor must meet the hearty approval of the Cardinals. But it would be impossible for any Pope to carry out with success a policy in which he was habitually thwarted by them. "The Catholic Church," as M. About rather oddly phrased it, "is governed by a Pope and seventy Cardinals, in memory of the twelve Apostles." We may drop the twelve Apostles, and there are seldom or never seventy Cardinals at any given moment, but the statement is substantially correct. It is true that the cardinalitial dignity is in reality a secular, not a sacred, one; Cardinals may be, and sometimes have been, laymen. The distinction of Cardinal Bishop, Cardinal Priest, and Cardinal Deacon is a technical one, and does not indicate their rank in the ecclesiastical hierarchy. In these days the Cardinal Deacons are generally in priest's orders, though Antonelli during the greater part of his life was not, and many Cardinal Priests are in fact diocesan bishops, like Cardinal Manning, while on the other hand there have been Cardinal Priests and even Cardinal Bishops, who were not in priest's orders, and Cardinals have in several instances been allowed to resign their dignity and marry. When Cardinals not in sacred orders are created they are appointed for twelve months only, with an obligation of being ordained deacons within the year, but their appointment can be renewed toties quoties by papal authority, and the regulation in a Bull of Pius IV. that Cardinals below the grade of deacons should not vote in Conclave has been ruled to be liable to papal dispensation. Pius IX. wished all his Cardinals to be in priest's orders, and there are none of the members of the present College who are not priests. However their speciality is to be the great officials of the Papal Court, and in that capacity they enjoy a controlling power over the whole administration of the Church in communion with Rome. It has been characteristic, as we pointed out on a former occasion, of the nominations of the present Pope that a larger proportion of them than has been usual for a long time past have been non-Italian. Nearly half of the Cardinals created by him are foreigners, and considerably over a third of the present College are therefore of other nationalities than the Italian. It would indeed be easy enough in the bestowal of the fifteen Hats now vacant to equalize the numbers. This alone would give a peculiar interest and importance to the next creation, and we observe that of the thirteen names put forward in the current rumours, of which the Times Correspondent has made himself the mouthpiece, six are of non-Italians. Some of these names carry no special significance, but there are others suggestive of a line of policy which has come to be associated in general estimation with the present pontificate. And we should certainly not be disposed to attach much credence to the report retailed by "our own Correspondent" that "the Pope is wavering and waiting to see how political events may turn before deciding whether to choose prelates of violent or moderate views." That some contemplated appointments may still be in suspense is likely enough; that the alternative which presents itself to the Pope's mind is of the kind suggested is most unlikely.

As regards two of the prelates named the ground of hesitation is a sufficiently obvious one. It appears that the French Government desires to have Mgr. Place, Archbishop of Rennes, and Mgr. Bernardon, Archbishop of Sens, raised to the Sacred College, but that they last year suppressed the extraordinary allowance hitherto made to "national Cardinals," and as the position is one which necessarily involves additional expense, the Pope not unreasonably thinks that, if France wishes still to have Cardinals, she should continue to pay for them. But it is stated that otherwise his Holiness is favourable to these nominations. Of Mgr. Bernardon there is nothing particular to be said. But Mgr. Place, now Archbishop of Rennes, but formerly Bishop of Marseilles, like some other prelates already raised by Leo XIII. to the purple, signalized himself by taking a prominent part in the opposition at the Vatican Council. He is mentioned in the Letters of Quirinus as the French bishop who spoke most decidedly next to Dupanloup against the infallibilist dogma. When Strossmayer declared in the Council Chamber that "nothing could be imposed as a dogma on the faithful which had not a moral unanimity of the episcopate in its favour," and a violent tumult ensued, we are told that Bishop Place, "one of the boldest of the minority and the first to give in his adhesion to Dupanloup's pastoral (against the dogma) exclaimed 'Ego illum non damno!'" And he retained to the last the courage of his opinions, and voted Non placet in the minority. The other French candidate, Archbishop Bernardon, did not take so decided a line, but he voted Placet juxta modum, and was therefore unfavourable to the definition. And a still more conspicuous champion of the Opposition, indeed the leading spirit among them, Strossmayer himself, is also among those reported to be marked out for elevation to the sacred purple. No doubt Strossmayer, like the rest of his colleagues, has accorded a sort of tacit submission or acquiescence to the promulgation of the dogma, though he has taken no active part in it. He is said to be mainly interested and occupied at present in ecclesiastico-political schemes concerning his own diocese and country, and probably did not care to waste his energies on what may have seemed to him as to others a barren and unprofitable strife about "words and names" with no corresponding realities. Archbishop Darboy told one of his clergy after his return from Rome that, while the decree must be considered as having official validity, it was "un dogme inepte" and had no substantial force or meaning. Strossmayer is probably of much the same mind. That he has really abandoned the convictions he set forth with such wealth of argument and impassioned eloquence in the elaborate address delivered in the Council Chamber on June 2, 1870, is what nobody who knows anything of him is likely to imagine, and what we may pretty safely assume that Leo XIII. does not believe to be the case. He then began by "declaring that papal infallibility was against the constitution of the Church, the rights of the Bishops and Councils, and the immutable rule of faith." And after expounding, emphasizing, and vindicating this thesis from a copious review of Church history, he concluded by repeating that "the divine rule (of ecclesiastical tradition) would be completely overset by the personal infallibility of the Pope, to the great injury of faith"; that "the definition was desired by the worst enemies of the Church, who openly assert in writing and by word of mouth that it is the best means for destroying the infallibility of the Church"; and, lastly, as regarded his own Croatian flock, that "not only would the return of their separated brethren (of the Eastern Rite) be barred, but it might be feared that the Catholic Croats would be driven out of the Church." That the man who said all this, and much more to the same effect, in the most public and solemn manner, has become a genuine believer in the doctrine he so fervently denounced, it would be difficult to credit on his own assurance, and we are not aware that he has ever intimated anything of the kind. Haynald indeed, Archbishop of Kalocsa, if a man of less commanding mental and moral power than Strossmayer, spoke no less vehemently, and with more pungent and incisive bitterness, against the dogma; and Haynald is already a Cardinal. It will not therefore be surprising if a still greater champion of the same cause should take his seat beside him in the Sacred College. There is one more name among those included in the rumoured list of future Cardinals which deserves a passing notice here. Capecelatre, now Bishop of Capua, was not a bishop in 1870, and therefore of course took no part in the Council, but there can be little doubt which side he would have espoused if he had been there. He is, we believe, regarded by those most capable of judging as facile princeps among the Italian clergy of all ranks for his learning, his ability, and his large and liberal views, and historical study, in which Leo XIII. has manifested of late so active an interest, is said to be his speciality. He is in all respects the sort of man the present Pope would be likely to single out for promotion, and the prevalent rumour therefore, so far as he is concerned, is very likely to be well founded. The other Italian names mentioned in the report are not generally known to fame, but it would probably be thought improper not to include an Italian contingent in any fresh batch of Cardinals, and the men of distinction among possible Italian nominees are few and far between.

ARCHITECTURAL DRAWINGS.

IN the great exhibitions of the London season from that at the Royal Academy downwards, the spectator is harassed by the constant change in the attitude of mind he has to assume in order to appreciate the works of art presented in succession to his eye. At each change there is a mental acrobatic feat performed, which after an hour or two leaves him in the very worst condition of mind for appreciating pictures. It is however with a real feeling of pleasure that we can go round the rooms at the Burlington Fine Arts Club. The collection is not too large to be enjoyed in a reasonable time; and, above all, there is method in the selection and arrangement. As no limit was made either as to time or country in the selection of the drawings, we have before us a series including examples of almost every style which has been developed in the civilized world; indeed for those who can read aright, there are the materials almost complete for a universal history of architecture. In the styles of treatment too there is the utmost variety. Some of the drawings have been made by the architects themselves in designing their own work; some are sketches quickly done in order to note an invention as it passed through the mind; some are the records of the wanderings of English architects in foreign lands; some are portions of series of views of particular groups of buildings made with a view to engraving; whilst perhaps the most beautiful are those of great pictorial artists, such as Turner, who have found in architectural subjects the colour and form, and the groupings of light and shade, necessary to satisfy the requirements of their art. To the public these latter will certainly be the most attractive, whilst to all they will seem the most beautiful. But the student of architecture will no doubt take the greatest interest in those examples which will enable him to see to some extent into the actual working of the mind of the great architects of the past.

Many of the drawings by pictorial artists are of very great beauty. That those by Turner are so is a matter of course. Cotman is represented by one very beautiful example of a Norman tower on a flat shore. Amongst others of this class we find Prout, W. L. Leitch, Roberts, and Mackewan. But it must also be observed that both professional architectural draughtsmen, such as Nash, and architects themselves, such as Sir Charles Barry, Wyatt, and Street, do not fall far behind these in the purely pictorial qualities of some of their drawings of buildings. Of the sets made for illustrations to books, those by James Stuart and C. B. Cockerell are perhaps the most interesting; but the works of Nash and Billing deserve an almost equal attention. If the visitor, however, goes with the intention of studying architecture, rather than the picturesque representation of architecture, he will find both the collection of the Inigo Jones drawings and those of Wren's St. Paul's attract a large part of his attention. It is most unfortunate that the Committee were unable to avail themselves of the generosity of the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral of the metropolis, in order to exhibit a set of drawings which would have illustrated clearly the changes which the designs for that building underwent before the present form was finally decided upon. Two large drawings, however, lent by the Royal Institute of British Architects, by F. P. Cockerell and J. E. Goodchild, give a very interesting representation of one of the early forms of the interior of the dome. The small selection of the drawings in the possession of the Duke of Devonshire, some by the hand of Inigo Jones himself, and others from his sketches, combined with the two extremely important finished designs for Whitehall Palace, lent by Her Majesty the Queen, form a group well worth study. The palace is well known from many published works and from the one fragment of it which was built. But even in Kent's book there is no engraving of it which gives nearly such a grand idea of its dignity and finish of detail as these two, which are no doubt by the hand of the master. Amongst the Duke of Devonshire's drawings are some finished in Indian ink, in order to be engraved in Kent's design of Inigo Jones. But by far the most interesting are those which are undoubtedly Inigo Jones's own sketches. Some of these are purely architectural, and show a power of drawing continuous firm lines very like what we find in the leaves of the Album of Villars de Honecourt, but with greater power of elaboration. Several are designs of the scenery required for the Court plays, and arranged by him as Master of the Revels, in which capacity it was that he quarrelled with Ben Jonson. Many of these show a variety and brilliancy of imagination which in actual building he found himself obliged to restrain. The Club may certainly be complimented for having collected together a set of drawings which will be admired, not only by those interested in the technique of architecture, but also by the lovers of exquisite draughtsmanship and connoisseurs in the English school of water-colours.

TELPHERAGE.

IN these days of discovery and mechanical invention we are apt to forget the first experiments and attempts to bring the processes to a practical issue. Although many people still living well remember the day on which the first locomotive carrying passengers was run, yet the large majority look upon railways as matters of course, and, if they think at all on the subject, wonder how our ancestors could do without them. It is the same with the telegraph. Many of us are old enough to know with what interest the laying of the first Atlantic cable was watched, and the effect produced when the first message from America was received. Ocean cables are no longer wonders, and long ones are now laid without attracting much attention, so that it sometimes is almost a matter of surprise when we hear of places to which a telegram cannot be sent.

We now hear of an invention just brought to a successful issue, and only waiting to be put to practical use. Without predicting for telpherage anything like the extended applications that railways or telegraphs have received, yet it gives good promise of being of great value in many districts. This is another of the many applications of electricity for which the last quarter of the nineteenth century will be famous. There are many places where transport is necessary, but in which a railway or even a rough tramway would not pay, firstly, in consequence of the difficulties of constructing the line, and secondly, because of the small quantity of traffic. A railway necessitates the construction of a permanent way on ground which must be level or only on a comparatively slight gradient; it requires land to be purchased, and in hilly districts cuttings, embankments, bridges, and tunnels, and, when these are completed, expensive rolling stock; and, lastly, many officials to work the trains.

Professor Fleeming Jenkin proposes to substitute for these appliances a suspended rod or thick wire on which a number of light trains can be run, the wire which supports the train being also the conductor which transmits the necessary current of electricity. Electric railways and tram-cars have already been constructed in which the usual double rails are employed; wire-rope trams are also in use; but the system of telpherage is a combination of the two. In the new system strong posts are erected at distances of about seventy feet, the posts being provided with cross-heads, to the ends of which are attached steel rods about three-quarters of an inch in diameter, one set of rods acting as the up- and the other as the down-line. The ends of the rods at each post are electrically insulated from one another, and the end of one rod on, say, the down-line is connected by a conducting wire to the end of the next rod on the up-line, and so on, the two extreme rods at one end of the line being connected to the terminals of the dynamo-electric machine which generates the current. It results from this that the consecutive spans of the rods on each line are alternately in a different electrical condition, so that if connected by a conducting wire, the electric circuit will be completed and a current would flow through the wire. On these rods run pairs of wheels, from which the trains consisting of an electric locomotive in which the Professor's very ingenious system of nest-gearing is employed, and five or six buckets for carrying the goods, are suspended. The carriages are connected to one another by means of stiff rods, so that they are held at a convenient distance, ten or fifteen feet from one another, and are thus prevented from coming into collision in running downhill or when swinging from the action of the wind. The train is made of the length of one whole span, so that when part of the train is running down an incline, owing to the bending of the suspending rod, the other part is going up, one part thus helping the other and diminishing the traction required; this length of train is also necessary for the arrangement of the electrical connexion; for, as the leading and end wheels of the train are resting on sections of the line which are in different electrical conditions, the current passes in at one of the end wheels of the train, through a wire to the motor, then along another wire to the wheel at the opposite end of the train, where it returns to the line. Each train will carry a useful load of 15 cwt. or 1 ton; but, as a number of trains may be run at distances of about one-fifth of a mile apart, the lines can be employed more usefully than an ordinary railway track; in addition to this, no attendant is required for the trains, the line being worked entirely from the stations, at one of which the electricity is generated by a dynamo-machine, driven by a steam-engine or by water-power where available. The lines may be run on a somewhat steep incline; in fact, a gradient of one in ten has not been found excessive. Again, very sharp curves may be used; one described with a radius of little as six feet having been found quite practicable. The posts may be of such a height as is convenient for the locality traversed; shorter posts will suffice when the line passes over fields than when crossing roads. In hilly country, where roads are difficult to construct, the telpher line might be eminently useful for the conveyance of minerals and produce, especially where water-power can be obtained for driving the dynamo-machine.

As the speed proposed is only four or five miles an hour, it is obvious that telpherage cannot compete with railways; it is only intended as a substitute for cartage; one train, in fact, will do the work of a horse and cart, and that without the employment of a driver, and also at a lower rate. Professor Fleeming Jenkin has estimated the cost of erecting and working a line extending five miles from the station, the double line being therefore ten miles in length. On this line twenty-five trains could be run at once, and, at the rate of four miles an hour, would be capable of carrying in each direction sixty tons in a working-day of eight hours. The total cost of the line, including steam-engine, dynamo-machine, trains, &c., would be about 8,000*l.*, and the expense of working, including interest on first outlay, depreciation, &c., would be about twopence per ton per mile. In this estimate it is calculated that only one-third of the energy developed by the steam-engine is transformed into tractive force in the electric motors; possibly improvements in the apparatus may ultimately increase their efficiency. This compares favourably with road traffic. A road of five miles in length may be estimated to cost 5,000*l.*, and the cost of cartage, not including first cost and maintenance of road, may be put down at one shilling per ton per mile.

Many applications of this system of telpherage readily suggest themselves. Professor Fleeming Jenkin proposes to employ the lines as feeders to railways bringing materials from the interior of a country to the main line passing through the district, also for the carriage of grain, coals, minerals, gravel, sand, meat, fish, salt, manure, fruit, vegetables. In many factories, materials have to be conveyed from one part of the works to another, and for this purpose tramways are now generally used, occupying space on the ground which might be more profitably employed if overhead carriage could be substituted. It is perhaps too much to expect that the parcel post will be conveyed by these means, for the objection to overhead telegraph wires would be much intensified in the case of telpher lines. Again, for transporting war material and stores it is not difficult to imagine that the erection of a telpher line from the sea, when this is made a base of operations, might be quite possible, the dynamo-machines being worked by engines on board the ships. Whatever applications the system may ultimately receive, we may wish success to the endeavours of the inventor.

In the foregoing description many important scientific details are necessarily omitted, and for these the reader must be referred to Professor Fleeming Jenkin's lecture recently delivered before the Society of Arts, a report of which, with explanatory figures, is printed in the Journal of the Society, but perhaps enough has here been said to show that the scheme is well worthy of consideration.

THE PICTURE GALLERIES.—IV.

LANDSCAPE art in the present exhibitions of the Royal Academy, the Grosvenor Gallery, the Royal Society, and the Royal Institute is marked by one almost universal characteristic. There is a very general absence of any attempt to compose. The pictures are mere sketches from nature. A fine composition, such as Turner's "Carthage" or "Crossing the Brook," or Gainsborough's "Watering Place" or "The Market Cart," hardly exists. About nine-tenths of the landscapes shown in these four great gatherings are neither better nor worse than coloured photographs of ordinary views. The few exceptions, such as Mr. Henessey's "Twixt Day and Night" (87) in the Grosvenor, or Mr. Fulleylove's "Three Graces" (596) in the Institute, stand out in the recollection of visitors. Mr. Henessey represents a pale scene, when the sun has gone down and the moon is rising, when everything is toned away by the white mist and the absence of positive colour, and when the three figures, two Norman peasant women and a child, look strong and dark in the whitening evening air. In catching and fixing a mood of nature, and in treating his theme delicately, we had almost said poetically, Mr. Henessey has earned the gratitude of lovers of well-thought-out, well-composed, yet truthful and accurate landscape. Mr. Fulleylove has given us an old-fashioned garden scene. "The Three Graces" are marble statues in a fountain surrounded by green lawns and yew hedges. He is so much pleased with the scene—and no wonder—that he has sent to the same Gallery two variations of it (612 and 709), the last putting our old friend the blackamoor from Clement's Inn into the place occupied in the first picture by the "Graces." There is good work of this kind to be found also at the Academy, but very little of it. Mr. C. P. Knight's "Falmouth Harbour" (547), unfortunately, like so much other good work, skied by the Hanging Committee, is an excellent example of the use which a real artist, as distinguished from a sketcher, may make of shipping. Mr. Knight's only other work is more of a sketch. The "Upper Waters of Loch Fyne" (741) are not filled, like the mouth of "Falmouth Harbour," with shipping, but the artist has used a sweet tranquil Scotch sunset to give effect to his picture. Another fine landscape at the Royal Academy is Mr. Bernard Evans's "Fern Hall, Cannock Chase" (1104), in the Water-Colour Room. It is very badly hung, and we failed to observe it in our first survey of this room. Yet it deserves better treatment, being, with a single exception, the only landscape among the water-colours worth looking at twice. Cannock Chase is an old hunting-ground of this charming painter, and he has here brought out its characteristics with a loving hand, and yet with evident power of that composing kind which is so often wanting. The exception mentioned is immediately underneath. This is Mr. Walter F. Stock's "In the Golden Eventide" (1102), a very sweet and warm view of a river, a bank of trees half in shade, and a few accessories calculated to raise his work from the rank of a sketch to that of a picture. Mr. Keeley Halswelle's "Bed of Water Lilies" (201) is in the Grosvenor, and, in spite of rather too much heaviness in the clouds, will satisfy his most ardent admirers for its silvery tone and delicate gradations. His best picture at the Academy is in the Great Room, and is called "A Gleam of the Setting Sun" (257). It shows a high bank crowned with trees, a river in the foreground, and a finely-drawn, well-rounded mass of cloud behind. The "Gleam" is, however, too brown and not sufficiently sunny to please us. He exhibits another "sunset," "The Scene of Sir Walter Scott's 'Rokeby': a Gleam of the Setting Sun" (417), in which the ruddy glow we are accustomed to associate with the idea of evening is wholly absent. This is of the three the least pleasing of Mr. Halswelle's works, being, in fact, only a transcript from a natural scene. Sir Robert Collier sends nothing to the Academy, but in the Grosvenor he has two fine sketches—"A Wounded Giant" (126) and "A View from Baveno" (244)—both fine specimens of the grand style of landscape so finely dealt with by this eminent amateur.

Mr. Brett's pictures at the Royal Academy labour, with one exception, under the same defect. It is impossible, for instance, to admire "Macleod's Maidens" (395), in spite of the faultless painting of sea and sky. If the rocks could be taken out, or rocks which are not "natural sculpture" substituted, it would be easier to like the picture. As it is, geological curiosity does duty for the picturesque. His "Granton Pier" (852) is more satisfactory; but we never like Mr. Brett's stormy seas as well as his sunny ripples like those in "Britannia's Realm." A fine example of this manner is in Gallery XI., "A Summer Day in St. George's Channel" (1574). Another painter of the sea is Mr. Henry Moore, who appears in great force with two pictures in the Royal Academy, three in the Grosvenor, and six at the Royal Society's gallery. Another artist who paints the sea with ease and brightness is Mr. Hamilton Macallum. His "Coral Fishing in the Gulf of Salerno" (170) in the Grosvenor, and a very similar scene in the rooms of the Institute (407), are full of Southern warmth and brilliancy. At the Grosvenor one of the best sea pictures is "Off the Coast of Portugal" (313), by Mr. Tristram Ellis. Some pilot and fishing-boats are lying to in the track of the ocean steamers. Although a water-colour, this is fine solid work, thoroughly learned and composed as well as truthful. Mr. Ellis has several charming views, both here and in the Institute, chiefly taken at Cintra and in the neighbourhood of the "Castle of the Penas" (862, Royal Inst.) He thus breaks entirely new ground. It is strange, indeed, that English lovers of the picturesque should so persistently neglect Portugal. Its very nearness seems to be against it. A picture by Mr. Napier Hemy in the Grosvenor some years ago showed what might be made of Oporto. Lisbon is scarcely less worthy of the artist's regard. The people, as Mr. Ellis shows in these sketches, are quite as interesting as to costume as Spaniards, or even Italians.

The remaining landscapes worth noticing in the Royal Academy are not many. Mr. Peter Graham has two very woolly pictures (27, 216), harsh and crude in colour, and, like so many other works by the Academicians, far below the mark. Mr. Whipple's "Summer at Streatley-on-Thames" (82) is in every way admirable. The shadow of the trees against the sunlit sky is most delicate; and, on the whole, this must be classed among the best landscapes of the year. Mr. Adrian Stokes represents an avenue in a wood, with a female figure in the middle and a male figure in the extreme distance. To this spotty, weak, and disappointing picture (188) two lines of poetry are appended. Some of Mr. Graham's faults, and especially his woolliness, are apparent in Mr. Davis's "Hill Side" (286), but the colour is much more harmonious. Mr. Colin Hunter's "Herring Market at Sea" (389) is the least hard of his contributions to the exhibition, but there should be a note in the Catalogue to explain what are the strange blue birds flying about in the foreground. "A Wintry Dirge" (411), by Mr. Alfred East, has a look of Ruysdael, but the comparison is fatal. Miss Clara Montalba's Dutch study, "Middelburg" (505) is very sunny and warm, and seems to kill everything near it. Mr. Ernest Parton's "Vale of Light" (558) must divide with Mr. Whipple's "Summer," mentioned above, the honour of being the best landscape in this year's Academy. The birch-tree is exquisitely painted. Nearly as good is Mr. Walton's "A Dappled Sky" (745), a fine Surrey view, with a low blue distance. Mr. MacWhirter used to do better and—as some tree studies in the Institute show—can do better than in anything he shows at the Academy. "The Windings of the Forth" (491) is poor to the last degree. The distance is as strong as the foreground, and the touch feeble and hesitating. "The Home of the Grizzly Bear" (846) is a study in black and blue, and is very incomplete. Mr. Leader's "The Ploughman homeward plods" (902) is very like a picture by Herr Heffner in the French Gallery. We cannot give it greater praise. Mr. W. L. Wyllie's "Barges Shooting Rochester Bridge" (1539) is very fine, and will enhance the artist's great reputation, as will also his "Close of a Winter's Day" (1589), which shows an old hulk being broken up by convicts.

With these notes we close our review of the least interesting exhibition of the Royal Academy that most of us can remember. The number of poor pictures by Academicians placed on the line, the systematic ill-hanging, the cynical disregard of the claims of foreign artists, coupled with the ungenerous treatment of critics by the authorities, spoil any pleasure we might otherwise derive from the sight of nearly fifteen hundred pictures. That we are not overstating the case will be seen when we remind our readers of the treatment received by M. Emile Wauters, which the Academy has done nothing since the exhibition opened to rectify, and by a further fact which has been made public—namely, that a great work by M. Jules Breton was refused. This is scarcely credible, but strictly true. Since the Royal Academy a few years ago rejected a Corot and skied a Daubigny they have done nothing like this.

The landscapes which remain to be noticed at the Royal Society's rooms in Pall Mall are many, and we must make a small selection suffice, taking the pictures in the order of the Catalogue. Mr. Marshall's "Hyde Park Corner" (30) is very powerful; it shows, looking westward, a group of horses at the drinking-troughs on the right, with the bare trees of the Park looming large through the yellow fog. Overhead is one of the grand red sunsets so often seen in London, and especially last winter. "A Deserted River Bed" (36) is the most vigorous of Mr. Hunt's ten contributions. The dark sky, the half-hidden sun, the white birds rising in the middle distance, produce on the mind an effect like that produced by a poem. Mr. E. A. Waterlow sends a large and brightly-coloured "Ramble on the Cliffs" (48), which irresistibly reminds us of Mr. Hook at his best. Mr. T. M. Richardson is very conventional as usual in his large and showy "Glencoe from Rannoch Moor" (120). In a coast scene of very rugged character, "King Ida's Castle" (270), Mr. Hunt has contrived to give an admirable representation of sea-spray. To notice all the good landscapes here would be to notice a full half of the pictures exhibited.

At the Institute Mr. Elgood vies with Mr. Fulleylove in painting garden scenes. "My Lady's Garden" (8) is very pretty with its brick wall and old-fashioned flowers. There are two or three other sketches of, apparently, the same scene, by Mr. Elgood in the exhibition, all of which will repay the seeker. Mr. Brodley's "Hayfield" (37) is a fine study with a rising moon. Mr. Weedon's "Mountain Mist" (50) is a careful work. A large sunset view of "Rouen from Bonsecours" (61) is by Mr. J. H. Scott, and is full of detail without any loss of strong effect. Passing by some pretty pictures by Mr. George Lucas, Mr. Hine, Mr. Moxon Cook, Mr. Harry Goodwin, and Miss Greenish, we come to a pure water-colour study in "Donington Park" (153), in which Mr. Orrock vindicates the old style of work with a very satisfactory result. There are several other pictures by Mr. Orrock in the Gallery, and all equally meritorious and conscientious. Mr. Knight's "Evening Glow" (167) looks more like an oleograph than a water-colour. It is, however, very strong and effective. Mr. Holloway appears to great advantage, though with a somewhat hackneyed subject, an old hulk, "The Wellesley" (176). There are one or two Oriental sketches by Mr. W. L. Wyllie. Mr. Wimperis is at his best in a pure water-colour, "Llyn Pen Craig" (218). But the best landscape in the first room seems to be "Summer Time: a Sussex Landscape" (235), by Mr. Hampson Jones, a charming view, apparently of the eastern side of old Winchelsea. The shadow of the hill creeps over the marshes, and the glow of the sky deepens. We do not often feel inclined to praise a picture so unreservedly. There is great depth in Miss Swan's "Cool Nook" (238), a brook among dark trees. "Chill November" (255), by Mr. H. C. Fox; "Flow on, thou shining River" (280), by Mr. Grace; "Mount's Bay" (284), by Mr. Aston; a bright Mediterranean view (313), by Mr. Robinson; and Mr. Claude Hayes's hunting-scene at "Horsham" (318) are all worth looking at. Mr. Arthur Severn's moonlight view, "From the Casino, Monaco" (332), is rather empty compared with his much more satisfactory "Venice" (962). In the Middle Room Miss Martineau's "River Spey" (367) is a cloudy midday scene, cool and pretty. Mr. Ammonier's "Sussex Village" (392), and several other pictures by the same artist, are very pleasing. Mr. Thomas Collier is as satisfactory as usual in his pure water-colour in the "New Forest near Lymington" (427). "The Old Guard House" (442), by Mr. Bell, betrays the influence of the French school, with its high tall houses and windy wet street. Mr. C. W. Wyllie sends one of his fine sketches, "Down the Thames" (485). Mr. Peter Ghent illustrates very charmingly some lines from Gray's Elegy (615). Mr. John O'Connor's "Italian Fishing-Boats" (656) shows powers of composition as well as of painting. An Italian landscape by Mr. Carl Werner (735) is pleasing; and there is grand sunset effect and great breadth in another foreign view, "The Acropolis of Athens from the Pnyx," by Mr. Harry Johnson. Mr. Syer's "Devonshire Stream" (822) is strongly painted in pure water-colour. Mr. Alfred Parsons shows a beautiful view, beautifully painted, "The Duddon Valley" (828). "Alfriston, Sussex" (948), is a showery scene, very fine and bright, by Mr. Thorne Waite. "Notre Dame de Paris" (1069) is a large and important architectural picture, painted with great power and skill by Mr. John Varley. On the whole, considering the immense number of water-colour pictures here brought together, we must pronounce the average quality very high, though, as we have observed, there is here as elsewhere by far too great an absence of any attempt at composition. Had we space unlimited, we might notice almost as many more from among the thousand works exhibited.

Mr. Whistler has opened an exhibition at Messrs. Dowdeswell's in Bond Street. He calls his works "Notes—harmonies—nocturnes." Most of them are charming exercises in colour, delicate as flowers; but, for all they have of form, they might be hung upside down.

Another minor exhibition, the Ladies' Amateur Art Society, shows a small collection of oils and water-colours at 23 Baker Street. The "lady amateurs" do not advertise sufficiently, and their little exhibition will have closed before many people have heard of it; yet among the painters who contribute are such well-known names as those of Louisa, Marchioness of Waterford, who sends three of her brilliant studies of colour; Miss E. J. Harding, whose "Chapeau Noir" is very pretty; Miss Fraser, who sends a charming allegorical drawing; and Lady Harris, Lady Phillimore, Mrs. Marwood Tucker, Mrs. Frank May, and Miss Barclay Sandeman, whose still life "Study" of a green jar on a red velvet shelf is extremely good.

YACHT-RACING.

JUST seven years ago a memorable yacht-race took place on the ocean course along which the racing fleet, or so much of it as is at present fit for action, will sail to-day in the first great match of the season. The interest of the contest on this occasion was in no way due to the weather; for, though there was at the time when the yachts started a strong breeze, and a dark and lowering sky, which gave every possible promise that it would continue, it unfortunately was fair for all but the very last bit of the course; and a run is generally thought but dull sailing. Nevertheless, the Southend to Harwich match of 1877 was a very remarkable one, and is likely to be remembered until steam-yachts have extinguished sailing-yachts, and until fundamental ignorance of seamanship is a necessary condition precedent for enjoyment of the sea. In this race the famous Jullanar made her first appearance, and by coming in ahead of everything, and taking the first prize on a day by no means well suited to a yawl, showed what wonderful speed she possessed, and how well considered had been the daring innovations of her designers which had moved the mirth of grave sailors and yacht-builders. In this race also the Miranda, best of all modern schooners, made her maiden effort, and made it in very vigorous fashion, as she beguiled the tedium of the run by gybing all standing—a proceeding which had disastrous results, for her main-boom went outside the strop on the second or third gybe. Keeping well up with her and with the two hundred ton Australia, which had great speed before the wind, the Jullanar tore along, showing wonderful power of running for a yawl; and when, at the elbow of the course close to Harwich harbour, she had to haul her wind, she showed that she could, to use a nautical expression, look up very high, and would have fetched right into the harbour had she not been put about by the Australia. The instant, however, this vessel had crossed her she went about again, and, forging marvellously to windward of the other, came in the easy winner of a race so fast that the steamers had been distanced. The Miranda would very possibly have won if she had not carried away her main-boom and spinnaker-boom, but nevertheless the reputation of the new yawl was made. Struck by her strange appearance and admirable performance, a thoughtful yachtsman christened her the Ugly Duckling; but the sailors, who were not so well read in Hans Christian Andersen as the School Board might have wished, changed this into the Duck, seeing some resemblance between the hinder part of that bird and her counter. If, however, still jeered at, the Jullanar was henceforth feared, and was from that day recognized as a very terrible antagonist in strong breezes.

This of course is ancient history, for events move fast in the yacht-racing world; but like other ancient history it is worth attention. The yawl and the Miranda, which was to a certain extent modelled on her lines, proved themselves two of the best racing yachts that had ever been launched. In some respects, indeed, the Jullanar was the best vessel of her kind that ever had been or has been launched. By no reviler could she be called a racing machine. Moderately sparred and canvassed, she could not always vie successfully with other vessels in light winds, but in a breeze and a sea she was invariably admirable. In fact she was at once a racing-yacht and a true sea-going vessel as capable of making an ocean voyage in any weather as of sailing over a Solent course. On one occasion she performed the extraordinary feat of beating against a gale of wind from the Longships to Falmouth, and handsomely defeating a steamer which was making the same voyage. Now to what were the good qualities which put her in some respects so far above her predecessors due? To good designing, or at least in great part to good designing; to improvements on the existing type, and to careful study and thought; certainly not simply to ballasting, albeit she was a well-ballasted vessel. The great success of the Miranda, which, as has just been said, was modelled on the Jullanar, and which, having survived all the yachts of her day, still flies her racing-flag, proved still further that an advance had been made; and in no long time this fact was recognized. It would be entirely wrong to speak of the fastest yachts which have been produced since her day as having been copies of her; but there can be no doubt that to her peculiar design a considerable change in the modelling of yachts has been due, and that in essentials some of her features have been followed.

Now this advance was a most legitimate one, being an improvement in the model of a small fast sailing-ship such as, in former days, would have been of great importance. Has there been any such advance or any similar advance since? To give even the faintest affirmative in answer to this question would certainly argue very great boldness. A considerable advance has been made, no doubt, in the valuable art of bolting a great mass of lead on to a vessel's bottom, but it would be hard indeed to say that there has been any real improvement in designing beyond the improvements which were suggested by the Ugly Duckling. After her triumphant appearance it was discovered that the plan of putting heavy ballast very low down, which, within reasonable limits, was adopted in her, could be carried much further, and that, under the rule of measurement, great advantages would be gained by lead keels. The Jullanar and Miranda were followed at intervals by vessels on which more and more lead was fastened outside, until the extraordinary proportions which have recently attracted so much attention were reached. Through no fault of their own, naval architects have had to employ their energies in the work, more suited for mechanics than for scientific designers, of attaching lead to a yacht's keel and garboards. Of course, when such a method is followed, the production of vessels somewhat faster than any vessel which has gone before means very little. There is a great entry of cutters for to-day's race, and amongst the names set down is that of a yacht recently built in the North which carries more outside lead than any vessel of her tonnage afloat, with the exception of the Irex, not yet ready for sea. If she wins, as very likely she will, her victory will have nothing like the significance of the Jullanar's. Owing to no fault, as we must repeat, of designers, yacht designing has become a purely mechanical art, and the triumph of a vessel means nothing more than that bolts and ties have been adroitly adjusted.

Now, to use a famous expression applied to a very different subject, this will never do. A system which encourages the production of racing machines and confines a sport, not merely to rich men, but to exceptionally rich men, must either be put a stop to, or it will effectually put a stop to yacht-racing. How the evils complained of can best be done away with we do not now propose to consider, but assuredly they can be done away with if an earnest effort is made. The general adoption of the length and sail area rule of the Y.R.A. may have good results. At all events, the experiment might well be tried, and to getting it tried the pundits of the Association, who have been rather lethargic of late, may usefully apply themselves. Otherwise they may find that they are relieved from all necessity for future effort, and that their occupation is gone. There is a goodly muster of vessels for the great opening match, as there has been in previous years, but in all probability lead will assert its irresistible supremacy before the season is far spent, and there will be dull racing, such as has already caused so much discontent. No sport can long endure which has become monotonous and slightly ridiculous, and unless lead keels are checked yacht-racing must needs become monotonous and somewhat absurd.

THE PROSPECTS OF THE STOCK MARKETS.

THE natural tendency of the panic in New York is to depress the prices of all kinds of Stock Exchange securities. American railway securities are of vast amount, and are held largely by investors all over Europe, but more particularly by investors in the United Kingdom, Holland, and Germany. The great fall that has taken place in the prices of these securities has therefore inflicted heavy losses upon great numbers of people in Europe as well as in America, has at the same time, as we have often explained, diminished their borrowing, and consequently their purchasing, power, and has seriously alarmed them for the future of their properties. The losses have at the same time compelled many speculative buyers of these securities to sell other securities, such as English railway stocks and foreign bonds, to fulfil the contracts into which they had entered; and thus the fall in prices in one great class of securities has led to a fall in prices generally in all classes of securities. But it is the effects in the United States which will chiefly tell upon the future of the markets. There the shock given to credit has been very severe. The last weekly return of the New York Associated Banks shows that, in spite of their efforts to bolster up the stock markets, the banks were obliged last week to reduce their loans by nearly 2¾ millions sterling. They had to do this because of the large withdrawals of their deposits, alleged to be by savings banks in the West, upon which there was a very general run. Should this run upon the savings banks and other credit institutions throughout the Union continue, the banks generally will be deprived of their resources. They will in consequence be compelled to force borrowers to repay them what they owe, and in doing this they will bring about such large sales of Stock Exchange securities as will still further lower prices. It is possible, of course, that the run upon the banks may be nearly at an end, and that therefore there may be no further large calling in of loans; but in any case it is clear that the power of the banks to lend largely is crippled for some time to come, and therefore, except in the case of such great speculators as Mr. Vanderbilt and Mr. Gould, there will be little speculative activity in New York. It is quite true that there was a rise of prices in New York at the beginning of this week, but it did not last, and such as it was, it was partly due to the efforts of these great speculators, partly to the buying of speculators for the fall, who think that the decline in prices for the present is sufficiently great, and therefore they are realizing the profits they have made, and partly it is ascribable to purchases by European investors. It is hardly probable, however, under the circumstances, that these causes will long suffice to support markets. The likelihood, rather, seems to be that in New York we shall see for some time to come great stagnation in the stock markets, with, perhaps, a further slow but persistent fall. Another cause unfavourable to the stock markets is the fear of an estrangement between this country and France. Members of the Stock Exchange and speculators generally fear that the Government may enter into engagements with France which will be so displeasing to the public that the Government will have to do as it did in the case of the convention with M. de Lesseps, and that the result may be a coolness between the two countries which would certainly depress markets generally. Lastly, the proposal of the Prussian Government to tax heavily all Bourse transactions has caused a fall upon the German Stock Exchanges. The German Stock Exchanges for some time back have been leading the movements for a rise in prices, and there were symptoms that we were about to see in Germany a considerable speculation; but this proposal of the Prussian Government has checked the movement and threatens even to create such an alarm as may lead to a considerable fall.

But while these several causes tend to depress the prices of Stock Exchange securities all over the world, there are other causes with a very opposite tendency. The immunity with which the London Stock Exchange has passed through the crisis engendered by the New York panic, as well as previously by the Paris panic, shows that in this country there has been of late very little rash speculation. The speculation that existed in 1880 and 1881 was chiefly carried on by Frenchmen and Americans. There was, of course, a certain speculation in England also, but that it was kept within bounds is proved by the fact that there have been so few failures on the Stock Exchange here. There have, indeed, been some very bad ones, of which the Blakeway scandal is the worst, but, in comparison with the number of members of the Stock Exchange, the failures and frauds have been exceedingly few. It is evident, then, that the members of the Stock Exchange are still wealthy and in good credit, and it follows that the clients for whom they do business must have escaped very serious losses. That their losses were considerable, of course admits of no doubt; but if they had been very serious the clients would have been unable to meet their requirements, and the members of the Stock Exchange would have been in consequence embarrassed. That there have been so few failures then is evidence that the losses suffered in this country have been so moderate that those who incurred them have been able to pay up all their liabilities and yet retain their credit, with some few signal exceptions. In the meantime the wealth of the country has been growing, and the savings effected have been large. Trade, it is true, is less profitable than it was, and agriculture has been depressed; but still the profits of business generally are large enough to admit of considerable savings, and these savings therefore are waiting for investment. It was known for a long time that a crisis of some kind must occur in New York. People generally, therefore, were keeping their resources well in hand lest the crisis might turn out to be very formidable. It was also known that the Oriental Bank was in such difficulties that its suspension was not improbable, and nobody could foresee what would be the result of a suspension. Now that the panic has occurred in New York, and that the Oriental Bank is being wound up, people feel relieved. They know the worst, or very nearly, and therefore they are able to see how they stand, and they are reassured as regards the future. With every future fall in prices, therefore, there will be a greater readiness to buy than there has been for the past two or three years. Now that good American railway bonds can be bought to pay from 5½ to 6½ per cent. per annum, and that good railway shares can be bought to pay nearly 7 per cent., and in some cases more, it is certain that buying throughout Europe will be continuous, and will grow larger and larger whenever there is a further fall. The knowledge that the banks and great speculators in New York have been obliged to buy from insolvent speculators vast masses of securities which they do not intend to keep, and therefore which they will sell at the first opportunity, will, as we have said above, prevent any early considerable rise; but as the sales go on and depress prices, investors will be tempted to buy, and in this way it is probable that any further considerable depreciation will be prevented, and that after awhile a recovery of prices will set in.

The disposition to invest which has been manifesting itself here in England since the beginning of the New Year by the success of the numerous colonial loans brought out and by the rise that has taken place in all sound securities, such as railway debenture stocks and municipal bonds, is also found to exist in Germany. The Germans, like ourselves, were not carried away by the speculative mania that prevailed in France from 1879 to the end of 1881. They consequently did not suffer very heavily by the crash that followed the failure of the Union Générale. Since then they have been cautious in their operations, and they have been very fortunate in large beetroot crops. When discussing the crisis in the sugar trade a few weeks ago, we showed how great had been the growth of the beetroot sugar industry in Europe of late, and the principal growth has been in Germany. Indeed, the last beet crop in that country has been unprecedentedly large. At the same time a succession of improvements and of chemical discoveries has so reduced the cost of manufacture that the profits resulting to Germany have been very large. The Germans, therefore, are prosperous at present; and, having saved much, they are inclined to invest liberally, and also to speculate. Now that their country has become the leading political State in Europe, they desire to make its capital the leading financial centre. Paris having lost some of its financial importance since the late panic, the great capitalists of Berlin wish to attract to themselves the foreign loans and financial operations which used to centre in Paris, and they have been favoured by the reconciliation which has lately taken place between the Courts of Germany and of Russia. There has in consequence been a very considerable rise of prices in Germany during the past few months, and the tendency was towards a further rapid rise. This has been checked, as stated above, by the proposal of the Prussian Government to lay a heavy tax upon all Bourse transactions, speculative and otherwise. At the first announcement of this proposal there was something like a scare on the German Bourses. The proposal, especially that all speculators must enter their transactions in a book which should be open to official inspection, should be regularly stamped, and should be heavily taxed, caused a great outcry. It is said that it will have the effect of driving away all financial business from Germany. Of course the outcry is greatly exaggerated. The Germans have less ingenuity than they are generally credited with if they do not find some means of evading the law, supposing that the proposals are ever accepted by the Federal Parliament; and in any case a heavy tax will not put down speculation or prevent financial business. Of course Government interference of every kind does check business, as does likewise heavy taxation; but a check is one thing and a total driving out of capital is another. Besides, the proposals as yet have been only laid before the Federal Council. They have to be approved by it and then accepted by Parliament. They are not likely therefore very soon to come into effect, and in the meantime the probability is that speculators will recover from their scare and that the speculative movement will soon recommence. As regards the apprehended estrangement between this country and France, it is hardly probable that, whatever may happen, there will be war, and although a coolness and ill-feeling between the two countries would undoubtedly depress the prices of foreign stocks generally, it would not have such serious effects as are feared by the Stock Exchange. One other cause tends strongly to favour a recovery of prices. It is the abundance and cheapness of loanable capital. In consequence of the dulness of trade and of the absence of speculation, there has been going on for a couple of years past a great accumulation of unemployed capital in the great centres of business throughout the world. The Bank of France, for example, holds nearly 41 millions sterling in gold, the Bank of England holds over 25 millions sterling, and the United States Treasury holds about 39½ millions sterling of the metal. The owners of this vast capital find no profitable employment for it. Hitherto they have preferred to keep it unemployed because they foresaw difficulties which have now occurred, but they will be hardly likely to keep it unemployed much longer. The investment of these large sums will necessarily tend to a rise of prices. It is further to be recollected that commodities generally are exceptionally cheap just now, as well as Stock Exchange securities. Consequently, merchants are able to carry on the same amount of business as usual with a much less amount of money, and the capital which is thus set free they have either to keep entirely unemployed or to invest in Stock Exchange securities. Of course they will invest it in Stock Exchange securities which are perfectly safe, and yield a reasonably good interest. Their purchases will cause a rise in the higher classes of securities, which will lower the interest yielded by those securities, and the rise in the higher class of securities will almost inevitably be followed by a rise in all classes of securities. Lastly, the rapid reduction of debt by our own Government and by the Government of the United States tends to force up prices in spite of all obstacles. Those who are paid off must invest their capital again somehow, and the investment tends to raise prices.

THE RICHTER CONCERTS.

HERR RICHTER continues faithful to his mission. Thanks to him, it is possible week by week to study Wagnerism in its highest expressions and week by week to compare the master's work with the work of greater men. That this is an advantage is unquestionable. If Wagnerism is a fashion merely, then the more we have of it the sooner we shall have done with it. If, on the other hand, it really signifies a new departure, and embodies a new æsthetic principle, then the more we consider it and the better we are able to understand it the sooner will it be recognized for what it is and become the influence it should. Wagner believed, and absolutely, in the art he had invented—in the new art, that is, he had pieced together out of the old ones; he believed no less absolutely in the theory he had discovered—which in other words he had adopted, with exaggerations of his own, from the principles expounded by his predecessors—by Gluck and Weber, Bach and Berlioz, Beethoven and Spontini, and Meyerbeer. But he also believed in his music as music; and he not only sanctioned its production at concerts, but arranged a good deal of it for current use. On these arrangements Herr Richter chooses this season to depend for the better part of his material. As programme music they are presented, and as programme music they must be considered and sentenced. That with so much to select from we should be so rigorously restricted to the productions of Wagner and his school is, as we have argued, a little hard. Still, as we have shown, the restriction is not without its advantages.

At the Fifth Concert, with an overture of Marschner's rather feeble as to its force, and rather tame as to its romance, Herr Richter gave us an excerpt from the Ring des Nibelungen, adapted by himself, on Wagner's instructions, from Siegfried and the Götterdämmerung, and depicting, at great length and with any amount of ingenuity and accomplishment, the whole course of Siegfried's adventure with Brynhilda, from the moment when he starts in quest of the rock where the Valkyr sleeps her enchanted sleep to his journey down the Rhine and his entry into the hall of the Sibrichungs. It may, says the programme writer, "be defined as a mosaic of motives"—the "Walsungen" motive, the "Voice of the Bird," the "Glow of the Brightoning Glare," the "Slumber" motive, the "Fate" motive, the "Horn" motive, the "Love of Roving" motive, and, "by way of insisting on the advantages of the married state, the melody ascribed to Fricka, the protectress of marriage vows," with many others too numerous to mention, all "woven into a wondrously continuous (and shapeless) web." It was followed by the "Trauermarsch" from the Götterdämmerung, which, as everybody knows, is no mere funeral march for the death of a hero, like Beethoven's or like Handel's, but an oration somewhat in the manner of Bossuet, compacted of motives signifying Siegmund, "Siegfried's Death-blow," "the Sword Nothung," the "Recognition of Siegelinde and Siegmund," "Alberich's Victory," and a crowd of well-known facts and circumstances besides. And this in its turn was succeeded by the famous "Ride of the Valkyrie." At the Sixth Concert the master was represented by no more than two excerpts—the trio from the Rheingold, and an adaptation, familiar enough to Herr Richter's audiences, from Tristan und Isolde. The trio was excellently sung by Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Damian, and Fräulein Friedlander, who were recalled with enthusiasm. The excerpt was admirably played by Herr Richter's orchestra.

At the Fifth Concert the Symphony was Beethoven's Seventh in A, that masterpiece of invention and inspiration and accomplishment. Save for a certain weakness in the horns (a fault habitual to Herr Richter's orchestra), it was admirably rendered. At the concert of last Monday the anti-Wagnerian element was represented by Weber's delightful fantasy, the Ruler of the Spirits Overture; by Beethoven's violin concerto; and by Brahms's Third Symphony. The concerto introduced us to a new violinist, Herr Hugo Heerman; his technique is phenomenal, his taste is delicate and correct, his emotional capacity is inconsiderable, his tone is often wiry and thin.

THE DERBY.

IT would be impossible to tell the story of the Derby without noticing for a second time several races which we have described in recent articles; but we will do so as briefly as possible. At the Newmarket Craven Meeting the Biennial, which was the very first race, was won easily by Royal Fern, but he had nothing of importance to beat except Wickham—a colt that had been backed at 14 to 1 for the Derby early in the season and afterwards had turned roarer—and Zadig. Too much was made of this performance, and the subsequent victory of Zadig in the Great Metropolitan Stakes at Epsom helped to mislead racing prophets, by inducing them to over-estimate the merits of Royal Fern's running in the Biennial. During the same meeting at Newmarket, the Craven Stakes was won by Scot Free with ridiculous ease, and these two colts started first and second favourites for the Two Thousand, Scot Free being the most fancied of the pair. Harvester, for whom 8,600 guineas had been given a couple of days before the Two Thousand, was understood to have run badly in a trial on the intervening day, and after being backed at 4 to 1, he eventually started at 20 to 1. Scot Free won in a canter by five lengths, St. Medard was second, Harvester was third, only a head behind St. Medard, and Royal Fern was last but one. Harvester, however, had sweated so much before the race, that his running was not considered genuine, and he became rather a better favourite for the Derby after the Two Thousand than he had been before it, being first favourite at 7 to 1, while 8 to 1 was taken about St. Medard. The last-named horse is wiry and fast, but he was considered by many people to be too small, light of bone, and wanting in muscular power for a Derby horse. Two days later, in the One Thousand, Queen Adelaide ran within half a length of Busybody after a fine race, and in consequence of this performance she became first favourite for the Derby, going up in the betting until she stood at 5 to 2. At the Newmarket Second Spring Meeting, another race was run which again altered the Derby betting. This was the Payne Stakes, for which both Scot Free and Harvester started. Scot Free was giving 7 lbs. to Harvester; but on the strength of the Two Thousand running, nearly 2 to 1 was laid on Scot Free, and nearly 3 to 1 against Harvester, while 12 to 1 was laid against Royal Fern. There were also three other starters. The course for the Payne Stakes is more than a quarter of a mile longer than that for the Two Thousand. The finish is the same for each race; but for the Payne Stakes the horses start close to the Gap, where the Cesarewitch course runs through the Ditch and turns sharp to the right into the straight. The two favourites lay near each other for the first half-mile, a little behind the horse that was making the running, and then Harvester took the lead. As they came down the hill, Scot Free's head was at Harvester's girths, and after a short struggle as they came up from the Dip, Harvester won, with something in hand, by three-quarters of a length. These first earnings of Harvester under his new master were worth 1,040*l.*, and the performance was considered so good that he was backed after the race at a fraction under 3 to 1 for the Derby. He was afterwards first favourite, alternately with Queen Adelaide, until the Saturday before Epsom races, when he was reported to be taking walking exercise only, and he gradually declined to 40 to 1. Talisman was one of the leading favourites, and it was argued that his two-year-old form was almost equal to that of Harvester; but there was much to be said against his running of last year. In the first place, he had never won a race, and although he had run within a length of Superba, half a length of Harvester, and a head of both Sandiway and Spring Morn, he had on other occasions run very indifferently. His admirers maintained that he had never been fully trained in any of his races last year, that he had improved during the winter, and that he was one of the best-looking colts that would run in the Derby. Another horse that had been beaten every time he ran was Beauchamp. When Talisman ran Sandiway to a head, Beauchamp was the same distance behind Talisman; so on this form there was not much to choose between the two colts. Beauchamp was unplaced for the Two Thousand; but it was said that he was not fit at the time, and there could be no question as to his good looks. Richmond had won three races, in one of which he had given St. Medard 13 lbs. and beaten him by a head; but he had run very badly on several occasions. This spring he had been unplaced in the City and Suburban Handicap, but it was said that he had been shut in at an important part of that race, and that he was making up his ground in a marvellous manner at the finish. When this became known, he went up to 12 to 1 in the betting. Shortly afterwards there was a report that he had hit his leg, and he did not appear at exercise with the other horses from his stable. Down he went to 33 to 1, but it was then discovered that, instead of doing his work as usual with his stable companions in the mornings, he had been taken out in the afternoons, and that there was nothing whatever the matter with him. He then went up 10 to 1. St. Gatien had won all the three races for which he ran last year, but he had beaten nothing of exceptional merit. Still, no horse can do more than win all his races. Although rather narrow, he shows plenty of quality with power, and he had a large number of admirers and backers. We have now noticed all the starters which had shown even moderate public form. A week before the race Sir John Willoughby's apparent chance of winning the Derby was almost without precedent. The ring, and perhaps the owner himself, scarcely seemed to know, at one time, whether to make Harvester or Queen Adelaide first favourite. Sir John has been spoken of as an extravagant buyer of horseflesh. When he gave 3,500 guineas for Queen Adelaide as a yearling, people said that very high-priced yearlings rarely won many races, yet this filly won but little short of 3,000*l.* as a two-year-old, and as she ran Busybody to half a length in the One Thousand, a couple of days after that filly had been sold for 8,800 guineas, she would probably have fetched something like double her original price at public auction a fortnight before the Derby. Again, when Sir John gave 8,600 guineas for Harvester, wise people laughed, especially after that colt had been beaten in the Two Thousand; yet when Harvester was sold, he stood at 9 to 1 for the Derby, and before the day of the race he went up to something under 3 to 1, so that two or three weeks after his purchase he was practically appraised by the ring, as far as the Derby was concerned, at a much higher value than on the day of his sale. After doing nothing but walking exercise for four days, Harvester was cantered on the morning of the Derby day, and as he was sound when pulled up it was determined to start him. When he was seen in the paddock he went up considerably in the betting, and he started at 14 to 1. St. Gatien was scarcely in so good favour as he had been two or three days before the race, and he started at 12 to 1. Queen Adelaide fretted a good deal before coming out for the race, and she seemed inclined to kick. Her small feet and light fore-legs did not please all the critics, but still she remained a very steady first favourite at 5 to 2. Her near relation, St. Medard, was a good second favourite at 6 to 1, and Talisman was third favourite at 7 to 1. There was an excellent start, and Queen Adelaide, St. Gatien, and Richmond were some of the first horses to break the line to go to the front. Richmond made the running until half-way down the hill, with the exception of a few moments when a horse called Woodstock took the lead. As they were descending the hill towards Tattenham Corner, Richmond gave up his forward position, and a party of horses, composed of St. Gatien, Borneo, Waterford, and Loch Ranza, led the field round the turn, while Harvester, Queen Adelaide, Beauchamp, and Richmond headed the second division. Of these, Richmond was already beaten, and Queen Adelaide was rather shut in against the rails. St. Medard and Talisman were done with as they came into the straight, and Loch Ranza was also soon beaten. Half-way up the straight St. Gatien took the lead very resolutely; Borneo and Waterford were in close attendance; Harvester was making up ground, but still waiting; and Queen Adelaide, although going very well, was somewhat blocked in. At the distance Borneo was beaten, and Waterford gave way almost immediately afterwards. Queen Adelaide then got an opening, but she had to go round a little and lose some ground in doing this, and then she began to dash bravely towards the front. In the meantime Harvester had been improving his position surely and steadily, but just when he seemed to be about to overtake St. Gatien, he blundered in his stride and lost ground. It was only for a moment, however, and he was soon by the side of St. Gatien, fighting out a desperate race. Queen Adelaide was also making up ground at every stride. Wood had now almost reached the winning-post with St. Gatien, and, although S. Loates rode Harvester with both judgment and resolution, all he could do was just to catch St. Gatien on the post, and the race was declared to be a dead heat. Queen Adelaide was a couple of lengths off. Mr. Hammond and Sir John Willoughby agreed to divide the honours of the Derby between them; so Harvester and St. Gatien were not brought out again to decide their merits. This caused some disappointment; but, after such a magnificent race, perhaps it was better to leave well alone. Many people think that Harvester would have won if he had not made that unfortunate "peck" at a critical moment; while others believe that Queen Adelaide would have secured the victory if she had had a clear berth; but in racing there must always be some risks and mischances, and it cannot be denied that the Derby of 1884 was a splendid race. We have often noticed the breeding of Harvester, who is by Sterling out of Wheatear. St. Gatien is by Rotherhill or The Rover out of St. Editha. If he is by The Rover, he has a treble cross of Birdcatcher's, a double cross of Touchstone's, and a double cross of Newminster's blood in his veins. People of a speculative turn of mind may naturally ask themselves whether Harvester would not in all human probability have won both the Two Thousand and the Derby if he had not undergone a change of stable a couple of days before the former race, and if he had had Archer on his back in the latter.

The French Derby, which took place on the Sunday preceding the English Derby, was considered almost a certainty for Mr. Lefevre's Archiduc. This colt had been first favourite for the Epsom Derby, until the death of Count Lagrange had rendered his nomination void, and he had won the French Two Thousand in a canter by two lengths from Little Duck. Great, therefore, was the surprise when Little Duck beat him by exactly the same distance for the French Derby on Sunday last. Nearly three to one had been laid upon him at the start, and he was considered so good in this country that the official handicapper estimated him at equal weights with Busybody, and 3 lbs. above Harvester. Little Duck is by See Saw out of Light Drum, and he belongs to the Duke de Castries. The Duke won the French Derby last year with Frontin, and both his victories were very well received by the racing public, but considering the inconsistent running of Little Duck and Archiduc, either the French Derby or the French Two Thousand must have been a most unsatisfactory race.

REVIEWS.

DR. STEPHENS ON RUNES.*

IN his poem on the Grande Chartreuse Mr. Matthew Arnold draws, in three lines, a vivid picture of a Greek standing "in pity and mournful awe" before "some fallen Runic stone." Runes are but rarely read in England, and Dr. Stephens's Handbook of the Monuments is a most welcome introduction to the study of monuments that still touch us with "pity and mournful awe." The runes, whether inscribed on grave pillar, on amulet, on sword-belt, on drinking-horn, or idol, or brooch, are the oldest lettered documents of our own ancestors. Faint, but audible still, these whispers come from the remote centuries, and we seem to hear with reverence the most ancient accents of a speech which is still our own. It is needless at this time of day to praise the learning and industry of Dr. Stephens, and his contempt for the linguistic charlatanism which dubs itself by the name of science. Facts, studied with earnestness and interpreted with modesty, are the basis of Dr. Stephens's readings. He is never ashamed to confess it when an inscription baffles him, he does not cling with conceited self-confidence to readings at best tentative, and he is no friend of conjectural emendations, or theories that runes must be magical, or gibberish, or written by a slave who did not know the tongue, merely because at present they are not decipherable.

We propose to give a summary of Dr. Stephens's ideas about the old Northern inscriptions, and then to examine the historical revelations about the life of the past which are contained in some of his more interesting examples.

Dr. Stephens first maintains that the values of the runes, as laid down by himself, are correct. Here the question turns chiefly on the meaning of a rune which distantly resembles a three-pronged fork, and is still more like archaic forms of the Greek Ψ. This old Northern stave Y was always A, no consonant, and certainly never M nor R. In his preface, and again in a chapter styled "The Word-Hoard" (p. 214), Dr. Stephens makes fierce and successful war against the adoption of R as the equivalent of the three-pronged rune. Assuming this trident to be R, then most of the inscriptions are unreadable, or can only be read by the aid of "desperate archaisms or unknown constructions," or they must be explained as gibberish or as inscriptions in a speech invented by the rune-cutter, or as magic. One is reminded of the famous Bath inscription on a leaden plate. One philologist interprets this to mean that some doctor of the period cured a man's wife, and received "five hundred thousand pounds in copper" for his skill. The proper names are read as names of witnesses to the deed. Another child of science makes out that the names are those of men suspected of stealing table-cloths, and devoted (by the owner of the linen) to all the Furies. The readings are really too funny in their diversity to be lost, so we offer extracts. One runs:—"Q(uintus) has bathed Vilbra for me with the water. Along with Cliquati's he has saved her by means of quin . . tael (or tale). His pay is 500,000 pounds of copper coin." Then follow the names of the witnesses. A learned German prefers:—"May the man who stole my table-cloth waste away like water unless he restores it." Then come the names of some suspected persons. There is another reading, not less droll than the first. Now the opponents of Dr. Stephens and of the letter A seem to produce decipherments of the runes as incongruous and nonsensical as two of the three interpretations of the Bath inscription. Dr. Stephens, on the other hand, usually gets sense out of the staves, not improbabilities like the hypothesis that a physician's fee was 500,000 pounds of copper. We are thus humbly anxious to hope that Dr. Stephens is right, and that his reading of the runes so as not to make gibberish may be received, as he says, "with reasonable satisfaction, if not with perfect certainty." By the opposite system, scarcely two out of sixty inscriptions can be even plausibly translated.

Dr. Stephens next goes on to demonstrate that the first outflow of the Scando-Gothic tribes, the Germans, knew nothing of the art of writing, that the Saxons, or Flemings, or Low Country men were equally ignorant, and that the art was either brought to Scando-Gothic Europe, or learned or developed there by the third "clan-wave," the Northern or Scandinavian. As one out of many proofs, Dr. Stephens asserts that no runic stone, no inscription on any permanently fixed object, has ever been found on German or Saxon soil. "Germans of the better sort" admit this. The runic inscriptions in Germany are all on objects like jewels and other portable things, which might, for all that we can see, have reached Japan in the course of early commerce, but could not prove that either Germans or Japanese had possessed the art of writing runes. Again, in Northern lands fresh runic stones are always turning up in diggings or in old buildings. Not one has ever come to light in Saxon or German territory. The language, once more, in all Runic monuments is never German nor Saxon, but one or other dialect of Old Northern. Yet, shadowy as is the case for German runes, Dr. Stephens declares that pedantry has employed these non-existent objects as a weapon of Teutonic Chauvinism. In a sentence where honest indignation mixes her metaphors, he writes, "These archæological fictions and cobwebs have already been used for hounding on to the Germanization and annexation of North and South Jutland."

What is the date and origin of the art of rune-writing? The evidence of desecrated graves shows, Dr. Stephens thinks, that it is older than Christianity. He holds, as we understand him, that the "iron-wielding clans" reached Scandinavia after a march "from Northern or Central India." We confess that this idea, like all theories about the migration of the "Aryan race" and its members, appears to us very fanciful. The latest German notion (we do not assume that the latest German theory is any better than any of its brethren) makes Northern Europe, not Central Asia, the "cradle of the Aryan race." Dr. Stephens says "lore-men" should begin their researches in India, and examine graves northwards and westwards till they come on runes. He is certain that runes are not a modification of Roman letters. In a brief note he observes that "the birth of the runes has been cleared up by the Rev. Dr. Isaac Taylor." According to Dr. Taylor, the runes are an independent offshoot from the old Greek alphabet in Scythia (from Thrace and the Black Sea and the Crimea and Dnieper up towards the Vistula). According to this system, Greek letters were differentiated into runes perhaps seven centuries before Christ. But what will Mr. Paley say to a theory which makes Greek the fruitful mother of the Futhorc, at a period when Greek writing was still undecipherable by readers of Macmillan's Magazine, and (therefore) must have been of very little practical use? Without dwelling on Dr. Stephens's ethnological inferences, we may agree with him that the art of writing shows "a very high degree of barbaric civilization and technical skill" in our ancestors, who, had they been less advanced in culture, could never have invaded and renovated Europe as they did.

We may now turn to the examination of a few out of the many inscriptions which are admirably engraved in Dr. Stephens's volume. He gives, in many cases, not only modern representations of the monuments, but copies of the sketches made by the old antiquaries of the seventeenth century. Sometimes, as in the case of the great golden horn, these sketches and copies are all that survive. This horn, which weighed eight pounds, was found at Galehus, in North Jutland. The conjectural date of 300-400 A.D. is assigned to it. The metal was decorated, apparently in repoussé work, with very remarkable designs. Here we see barbaric figures of men armed with round shields and short leaf-shaped swords. Another man holds a boomerang (?) in one hand, a staff in the other, and wears horns. Men on horseback and centaurs also occur, saddles were in use, and figures of dogs and deer are common. The art (in the sporting scenes) is just between that of Red Indian picture-writing, and lentoid gems from the Greek islands in the second stage of their development, after they ceased to be absolutely savage. A representation of a man with a boar's head recalls the familiar "serving man" of Winchester. A row of grotesque men, beasts, serpents, and fishes looks extremely like picture-writing. The horn, however, has a runic inscription, thus interpreted by Dr. Stephens:—"To the ever to be feared Forest God, Echleu dedicated this horn." The golden horn was found in 1734, and a still longer one had already been found in 1639. In 1802 both were stolen, and probably went straight to the melting-pot. Both were deeply interesting examples of ancient skill; and would be more interesting yet if we could accept the translation of the runes, not only "with reasonable satisfaction," but "with perfect certainty."

The most common staves are sepulchral inscriptions. Occasionally nothing but the dead man's name is given. The heathen Northmen had all the heroic Greek desire to be remembered, by aid of their barrow and pillar, after they had long departed. "Over thy dust did we pile a great and goodly tomb, we the holy host of Angive warriors, high on a jutting headland over wide Hellespont, that it might be far seen from off the sea by men that now are and by men that shall be hereafter." So says the ghost of Agamemnon to the ghost of Achilles; and we may compare the words of the dying Beowulf:—

> build me a low
> fair after fire-heap
> At the flood dashed headland.
> A minne shall it stand there > to my mates and landsmen, > high looming
> on Hronesness.
> So that seafarers
> sithence shall call it
> BIOWULF'S BARROW
> As their beak carved galleys > out of hazy distance > float haughtily by.

So Dr. Stephens translates the "noblest English epic," and the parallel between heroic Greeks and heroic Northmen is very striking. The maker of Beowulf, it will be observed, says nothing about inscriptions, any more than the poet of the Odyssey in the case of the burial of Elpenor or of Achilles. Yet we know that the heroic Northern grave-stones had their runic staves, and why not the heroic stele of Greece? But time "has rent the pillar from the tomb," and we have no examples of Homeric grave-steads. Dr. Stephens prints one runic mortuary inscription which must have been carved from the deck of a war-galley on the sheer face of the sea-cliff. Generally the staves merely name the hero and the place where he died, and tell us that "he slew many warriors." That was the brief record of a well-spent life. More touching are the runes on a sword-hilt which prove that a lady gave it to a man, her lover or brother, or lord or champion. An amulet is doubtfully read, "I bid thee go, O snake, against Æla," a "sending" of mischief after the ancient Icelandic fashion. The longest and most interesting inscription of all cannot here be given in full (p. 33-36). The height of the stone is 13 feet, the breadth 4 feet 8 inches. "This stands alone as a runish stone book." The "book" tells, in the name of a father, concerning the prowess of his son, a stripling, in battle. He > bides now, belted,

> Battle steed holding,
> Shield on his shoulder,
> That shoot of the Marings,
> Rest he so in his galley.

The old King Warin, "a great lay-smith," bade Biar cut this dirge on the rock, and has raised an enduring monument. As interesting, in its way, is an inscribed small bronze figure, perhaps of Freya (p. 59) an example of barbaric art, not quite untouched by better influences, and conjecturally dated in the fourth century. Dr. Stephens's volume is full of similar treasures and of sound learning, expressed in his own quaint English.

THE MAMMALIA OF INDIA.*

MR. STERNDALE, whose Seonee is, or ought to be, a well-known book, has produced a volume on the natural history of the Indian fauna which makes very pleasant reading. We do not propose to review it from the merely scientific point of view, though Mr. Sterndale arranges his orders and his genera and gives technical as well as vernacular designations with all due pomp, if on a somewhat old-fashioned system. The book, however, is much less of a scientific treatise than of a collection of agreeable beast-stories, fascinating descriptions of fascinating animals, and illustrations to match. The author frankly acknowledges his indebtedness to other writers; but few of them, with the exception of Sir James Emerson Tennent, are writers much known to the ordinary English reader, and the material gathered from them is supplemented by abundant results of Mr. Sterndale's own observations. He seems to unite in a happy combination the characteristics of the sportsman, of the fancier or pet-keeper, and of the zoologist; and, if he seems to enjoy keeping the beasts and playing with them even more than putting ounces of lead into them, and then drying their skins and cutting up their carcasses, we do not know that we feel much less well disposed to him on that account.

Mr. Sterndale begins in the most approved fashion with the order Bimana; but he does not profess to devote much space to them. The order Bimana are, after all, and everywhere so exceedingly "bimanous"—if we may be permitted an adjective—that perhaps it is as well. Thus Mr. Sterndale, quoting another authority, informs us that the Andamanese women, "though affectionate to their children, are ruthless to the stranger." It is perhaps unnecessary to visit Port Blair in order to discover this peculiarity; we can study it with great accuracy and in numerous examples at London, England. But a mongoose is quite a different animal from a weasel; and, though the English cat is a very charming beast, it is inferior in beauty to Felis diardii and Felis marmorata, which latter, by the way, must be one of the loveliest animals in existence. Therefore we are not sorry when Mr. Sterndale at about his seventh page makes his bow to man—proud man.

He then becomes interesting at once, and describes a gibbon he had (not an historian nor a book, but a specimen of Hylobates hooluck) who must have been wholly delightful. This engaging anthropoid used to put his arm through Mr. Sterndale's, was extremely clean in his habits ("which," says Mr. Sterndale thoughtfully and truthfully, "cannot be said of all the monkey tribe"), and would not go to sleep without a pillow. Of course he died of consumption. The gibbon, however, as a pet has one weakness, that of "howling in a piercing and somewhat hysterical fashion for some minutes till exhausted." Less interesting personally than the gibbon, but an animal of very developed social instincts, is Semnopithecus entellus, otherwise the Bengal langur. The Bengal langur fights for his wives according to a custom not unheard of in other cases; but what is peculiar to him is that the vanquished males "receive the charge of all the young ones of their own sex, with whom they retire to some neighbouring jungle." Schoolmasters and private tutors will read this with interest, as showing the origin and early disabilities of their profession. Passing over many scores of intensely humorous bats, whom, alas! most people have only seen stuffed on neat little stands in museums, and scarcely fewer creatures of the molo kind (among these Mr. Sterndale chivalrously speaks a word for the musk-rat, who is nearly as much maligned and ill treated in India as his brother the shrew is, or was, in England), we come to the Carnivora, of whom it may be said that all animals would be Carnivora if they could. How bountifully India is provided with these every one knows vaguely, but few people, perhaps, accurately till they have refreshed their memories by looking at a book of zoology, taking India in the sensibly generous sense which Mr. Sterndale attaches to it—that is to say, as including the Himalayan regions, Burmah, &c. All bears are nice; but, as even careless visitors to the Zoological Gardens know, there are few bears so nice as the Indian sun-bears, as they are called—for what reason we never know, any more than we know who told some naturalist that "helarctos" was Greek for "sun-bear." Sir Stamford Raffles had a sun-bear, which refused to eat any fruit but mangosteens or to drink any wine but champagne; there once was a cat in the United Kingdom which cared for no fish but red mullet and for no game but woodcock, if that is any parallel. The only occasion on which Sir Stamford's bear was ever known to be out of humour was once when no champagne was forthcoming. This, too, can be paralleled from the human race in these luxurious times. "What does the fellow mean by asking me to dinner," &c., that sun-bear thought to himself, no doubt. Another sun-bear, "left to itself" in more senses than one, began with a bottle of cherry brandy, and proceeded to one of blacking. Very similar cases are recorded of miners and of the late Professor Porson; so is the whole world one. A propos of bears, Mr. Sterndale "would like to set an old she-bear after the persons who lead bears about with rings." It would indeed be good sport.

The siluropus of Thibet is as yet an uncaptured beast, at least alive. It is, or is said to be, a cross between a bear and the quaint but much smaller ailurus, of which the Zoological Gardens have, or had, a specimen. From those funny beasts, through the badgers (who seem to be very much like an English badger, but more splendid), we come to the immortal ratels, whom to see is to love, though affection may perhaps not be increased by the exercise of another sense; and the wolverenes, who shade their eyes with their hands like Christians; and the martens and the weasels (by the way, Mr. Sterndale speaks of the pine-marten as "becoming scarce" in England; we thought it had almost entirely disappeared) and the polecats (Mr. Sterndale says ferrets are stupid; but we have heard trappers in England express a different opinion) and the otters, (the Canadian otter invented tobogganing; but Mr. Sterndale does not say whether it is practised by his Indian congener)—we come at last to tiger tiger burning bright, and the rest of the cats. Of the lion Mr. Sterndale says little, and that little on hearsay. There seems to be little doubt that it is dying out in India. Not so the tiger; and in regard to him we must commend some very sensible remarks of Mr. Sterndale's on the absurd nose-and-tail measurement of large game. As he justly says, the actual measurement is inaccurate and delusive, and rarely gives the same results when tried twice on the same subject, besides which the length of the tail and the size of the feet are in anything but a constant ratio. With respect to the tiger's non-human enemies, Mr. Sterndale corroborates the statement that not only packs of wild dogs but even the bear will "go for" tigers and beat them, while he has a really wonderful buffalo story which we must quote:—

> Buffalos in herds hesitate not in attacking a tiger; and I saw one instance of their saving their herdsman from a man-eater. My camp was pitched on the banks of a stream under some tall trees. I had made a détour in order to try and kill this man-eater, and had sent on a hill tent the night before. I was met in the morning by the khalasi in charge, with a wonderful story of the tiger having rushed at him, but as the man was a romancer I disbelieved him. On the other side of the stream was a gentle slope of turf and bushes, rising gradually to a rocky hill. The slope was dotted with grazing herds, and here and there a group of buffalos. Late in the afternoon I heard some piercing cries from my people of "Bagh! Bagh!" The cows stampeded, as they always do. A struggle was going on in the bush, with loud cries of a human voice. The buffalos threw up their heads, and, grunting loudly, charged down on the spot, and then in a body went charging on through the brushwood. Other herdsmen and villagers ran up, and a charpoy was sent for and the man brought into the village. He was badly scratched, but had escaped any serious fang wounds from his having, as he said, seen the tiger coming at him, and stuffed his blanket into his open mouth, whilst he belaboured him with his axe. Anyhow but for his buffalos he would have been a dead man in three minutes more.

On the vexed question whether there are two kinds of panthers or only one, Mr. Sterndale is on the side of the Chorizontes, and holds the pard to be distinct from the panther. Whether the fact that a pard once killed a panther that lived in the same cage, and ate part of it, is an argument on that side may be doubted; homo homini lupus and why not panthera panthoræ? Of the famous pardanthropic panther of Kahani (a most unpleasant bisclaveret, who began with his own wife and finished about three hundred people before he was shot by accident) others besides Mr. Sterndale have told, but Mr. Sterndale saw him, which is something. The tiger cats are of course delightful, and, as was said above, Felis marmorata (of which the Zoological Gardens do not seem to have ever had a specimen, though they had once a clouded panther, of which it is a kind of miniature) is the handsomest of all. Mr. Sterndale tells a very curious and characteristic story of a less uncommon wild cat. She became so tame that she would of her own accord climb on his knees when he was writing, and lie there. But she would never let him stroke her without at once snarling and spitting. English or rather Scotch wild kittens are said to behave in much the same manner; but we never heard of any one who was bold enough to take a full-grown Scotch wild cat in his lap. A page or two further the history of two kittens of Felis rubiginosa is very agreeable. Felis manul, a grey cat with a black shirt and markings, must be rather an uncanny-looking beast, but it seems to be rare. Again we may note a curious detail of the education of cheetahs. "Women and children are told off to sit all day close to the animals and keep up a conversation." The cheetahs, it would appear, rapidly become tractable; anything, they probably think, is better than this. Of mysangs and mungoose (though that is not the proper plural) who shall speak in detail? But Mr. Sterndale had a mungoose which went for a large greyhound, and the greyhound bolted. We can only allude to the curious stories here told or quoted about the odd results of the similarity between wolf-dog and fox in India, which is such that a wolf will sometimes join a pack of dogs in hunting a fox, the Indian Isegrim evidently wishing to revenge the misadventures of his French or Flemish brother. Of the delights of the King of Oude, who sits and reads placidly in his cockatoo-house while half a hundred throats scream round him, and observes pleasantly, "The birds are singing a little this morning," of a famous rat-hunt on a polished marble floor, and of two mice who used to climb a parrokeet's perch at dinner-time, and sit in the food-boxes eating the parrokeet's provender, Mr. Sterndale must be left to tell himself. But it is necessary to observe that the parrokeet was wanting in proper pride, or those mice would assuredly not have done it twice.

We can find no more room for Mr. Sterndale, except to direct attention to an exquisite though not original sketch in the appendix, which represents a loris standing up for all the world like a small bear or a very hairy baby, and preparing to plunge at a cockroach. But it did not get the cockroach, which served it right for the coarseness of its taste in trying for anything so nasty.

THOUGHTS ON SHAKSPEARE'S HISTORICAL PLAYS.*

MR. CANNING must surely be jealous of the parsons. He has been to church, and has watched how a long sermon grows out of a short parable. He has thought that he, as well as the best of the preachers, could feebly tell in many words what had been already forcibly told in few. He has succeeded admirably, and has blown as big soap-bubbles as perhaps any that we have ever witnessed. He has not been troubled with modesty, but has chosen the greatest of all poets on whom to practise his art of expansion. There are writers whose brevity might have been some justification for such treatment as Mr. Canning ventures to use towards Shakspeare. Our nursery rhymes, for instance, are always brief and sometimes obscure. Beneath them there has been supposed by more than one ingenious commentator often to lurk political allusions. We could have patiently borne Thoughts on Old Mother Hubbard, or The Philosophy of Little Jack Horner. The rise and fall of Humpty Dumpty affords a legitimate subject for all the thinking that Mr. Canning could give to it. But Shakspeare's historical plays he should have left alone. About them he has nothing to say, though unfortunately he says it at great length. He leads his readers about just like the cobbler in Julius Cæsar, but without his excuse; for it is only their patience and not their shoes that he wears out. Thereby most certainly

* Thoughts on Shakspeare's Historical Plays. By the Hon. Albert S. G. Canning, Author of "Macaulay, Essayist and Historian," "Philosophy of Dickens," &c. &c. London: Allen & Co. 1884.

he does not get himself into more work. Let any one who would see the dulness of which poor human nature is capable compare the striking opening of that play with the first lines of the sketch of it as given by Mr. Canning:—

> This play does not describe any of Cæsar's extensive and wonderful foreign conquests. It begins in Rome, whither he returns after his victorious campaigns to be congratulated, applauded, and praised by his fellow-countrymen, many of whom wish to make him sole Ruler. He is offered the imperial crown, amid general acclamation; but two distinguished Romans, Brutus and Cassius—both sincere republicans—form a conspiracy, and eventually murder him. They are mistaken, however, in expecting general approval.

Antony, he goes on to tell us, was the middle-aged lieutenant of Julius Cæsar. He was an able general. Cicero was a celebrated orator, and was executed soon after Brutus and Cassius had committed suicide. "His fate is not recorded by Shakspeare." When we read this we were ready to exclaim, almost as Brutus exclaimed to Messala when the news of the proscription had arrived, "Therein our letters do not well agree." Six pages further on, indeed, Mr. Canning himself stumbles on the truth, though he forgets to turn back to blot out his blunder. In describing the quarrel between Brutus and Cassius—"one of the most favourite passages," he informs us, "for modern declamation"—he writes:—"Cicero, their most illustrious ally, had been executed previously by Antony or his followers." By this time our author thinks it high time to give his authorities, and he refers us to "Tacitus, Suetonius, and Student's History of Rome." We shall next expect to find some village theologian defending his positions by quoting St. Paul, St. James, "and the Rev. Mr. Jones, our minister." Passing on, we are told that "to a man of Julius Cæsar's patriotic mind and civilized ideas it was doubtless a grievous disappointment to perceive so many superior men among his foes." Civilized ideas is strange English for a student of Shakspeare to use, and superior is a strange term to apply to Roman conspirators. Let Antony's speech be henceforth amended, and let him say, even if the verse shall halt for it—"So are they all, all superior people." Superior, at all events, is English. As much cannot be said for talented, which mongrel adjective Mr. Canning applies to Octavius, Cicero, and Brutus. Further on he tells us that "Shakspeare makes Brutus anticipate Antony's suicide, or untimely death, with pleasure, which seems inconsistent with his kindly, generous nature." We thought that we knew the play fairly well, but we could not call to mind the lines on which this statement is based. They are the following:—

> If he love Cæsar, all that he can do
> Is to himself, take thought, and die for Cæsar;
> And that were much he should; for he is given
> To sports, to wildness, and much company.

Mr. Canning's paraphrase of the last two lines, apparently, would be after the following fashion:—"As this middle-aged lieutenant was given to dissipation, it would be a very happy thing, for all superior and talented people, if he were to commit suicide." But our author does worse than misunderstand Shakspeare; he misquotes him. He has so many words of his own that he has not room for the poet's. So, in one passage, quoting merely the words of the second citizen, he puts them in the mouths of the citizens in general.

He is not content with telling us what Shakspeare did write; he lets us know also what he might have written. "Cæsar might," he says, "in Shakspeare's hands have made most interesting and instructive allusions to his foreign conquests and campaigns, especially in Britain." As Cæsar was a man of what is called universal knowledge, he might, no doubt, without any violation of historical probability, have been made to give a lecture on cookery. Whether the play would have been the better for it is another question. When we reflect, not on what Cæsar might have said, but on what Mr. Canning might have written, we may be thankful that he is contented with adding only one more to his list of curious epithets. He describes Octavius and Brutus as "the comparatively civilized associates" of Antony and Cassius; and in a few lines more brings his essay to a conclusion. In his sketch of Antony and Cleopatra he returns to his epithets. Cæsar is called Antony's "late revered master." Perhaps we should congratulate ourselves that he is not called "the late lamented Julius." Antony and Cleopatra are described as "this unscrupulous pair." But we have written enough to show our readers of what kind of stuff this volume is made. Wherever we have dipped into it we have found the same folly and the same wordiness. It is a book that should not have been written and that cannot be read.

HISTORY FOR THE YOUNG.*

UNDER the name of Stories from English History, Mrs. Creighton has produced a pretty little book, "intended," as she says, "to serve as an amplification of the ordinary child's history." The narrative is pleasantly written, in a style which is clear and simple, without falling into the common error of becoming affectedly childish, and the subjects are for the most part well chosen. The endeavour to interest her young readers in the life and death of Sir Thomas More is praiseworthy, but we fear not very likely to be successful. More's greatness is not of the kind that a child can well appreciate, nor is the cause for which he suffered sufficiently definite and comprehensible to appeal to a child's sympathies. The latter objection equally applies to the case of William, Lord Russell, whom Mrs. Creighton persistently styles Lord William Russell, an inaccuracy which she did not learn either from Burnet or Macaulay. In the story called "A Scottish Raid," she makes as it were an inroad upon the domain where Sir Walter Scott reigns supreme; but there is some freshness in the attempt to awaken sympathy for the plundered Northumbrians as well as for the plundering Scots. We should like to know whence she derives the statement that the Scots "rode on strong little ponies called Galloways," because the term, as at present accepted in equine literature, denotes a large pony—between thirteen and fourteen hands high—and the pure-bred galloway of old days is said to have been sometimes more than fourteen hands. In the legend of the Battle of Stamford Bridge it would have been well to point out distinctly where the details of the Saga are manifestly untrustworthy. That English horsemen bore the brunt of the battle is inconsistent with everything that we know of the composition of English armies in the eleventh century; and the horses "covered all over with armour" are a sheer anachronism, for we have the evidence of the Bayeux Tapestry that even the Normans, much as they relied upon cavalry, had not advanced to the point of armouring their horses. "The conversion of the English," familiar as the tale is, deserves praise as being gracefully re-told; and the biographical sketches of Lady Jane Grey and Bishop Latimer, the episodes of Sir Philip Sidney's death, Raleigh's first expedition to Guiana, and the stirring incidents of Sir Richard Grenville's fight in the Revenge, are all good. Coming down to later times, the stories of Clive, Nelson, and Sir John Moore are quite the kind of thing to rouse the interest of children. The illustrations claim credit as being "from authentic sources," in which case it would have been well always to indicate the source. No date or any other information is attached to the frontispiece of "Knights tilting"—delightfully grotesque figures, but of a drawing only to be excused in a mediæval artist. In the "old print" of the Powder Plot, the representation of the all-seeing Eye of God (with a long and solid ray of light like a spear proceeding from it) will, we should think, puzzle children, unless they should be so old-fashioned as to be acquainted with the awful history in The Fairchild Family of Emily's vision after she stole the "damascenes"—in which case it may frighten them. The sketches of well-known portraits of Sir Philip Sidney and Sir Walter Raleigh deserve praise, and "The Seven Bishops going to the Tower" reproduces what is evidently a good contemporary print, and probably true to life.

Of the Fifth Series of Miss Yonge's Cameos, which cover "the period of the great struggle between England and Spain," there is no need to say much more than that they have the merits and the blemishes of the preceding volumes. Most people will probably be inclined to think that in history as in fiction Miss Yonge is apt to overcrowd her canvas, and that the effect is sometimes a little bewildering. At the same time there is no doubt that girls in their teens—for whom we take these Cameos to be especially intended—are, when they like their author, much more patient readers than older people; and whatever exception may be taken to Miss Yonge's method, few living writers have done so much to inspire a taste for history in young people. The period treated of in this volume is one with which she has already dealt in two of the most pleasing of her historical stories; and as it calls up reminiscences of the Chaplet of Pearls, we forgive what a stern critic might consider a waste of space over the ballet which preceded the Massacre of St. Bartholomew. Perhaps the supposed daughter of Mary Queen of Scots and Bothwell would hardly have been mentioned had not the author already made her the heroine of Unknown to History. On the question of the guilt or innocence of Queen Mary Miss Yonge will not commit herself: but, though she is inclined to reject the "Casket letters," she says:—"We fear that only by forcing stubborn facts and denying much contemporary evidence can Mary be supposed a guiltless victim." The volume ends with the death of Mary's great rival, Elizabeth, which is well and pathetically described, but without the usual exaggeration of its painful side; for, as the author observes, "compared with such scenes as took place at other royal death-beds," it does not appear that the dying hours of Elizabeth were darkened by neglect or lack of loyal affection. Miss Yonge has satisfied herself of the truth of the story about Essex and the ring, and consequently believes that the Queen did, at least in the popular sense of the term, die of a broken heart—that is, that grief and remorse left her no power of rallying against her "casual ailment" of a sore throat. We observe that the author repeats—in this case without suggesting any doubt—the story, which of late years has been somewhat discredited, of the Bishop of Lisieux preventing a massacre of the Huguenots. And we should like to know whether she has authority for saying that in Elizabeth's time the recusant laity were sometimes put to the peine forte et dure for refusing to give evidence. One ordinarily connects that punishment with a refusal to plead.

The three anonymous "Historical Readers" edited by Professor Meiklejohn are designed "to meet the requirements of the New Code and the instructions to H.M. Inspectors," and are adapted respectively to Standards IV. to VII. Without entering into the mysteries of the New Code, we may say that these books, albeit with many attractive features, just fall short of the standard which we should set up for a school-book. We acknowledge the unusual excellence of the paper and the printing, and the clearness of the numbered paragraphs with their headings in "Clarendon" type, after the fashion of the well-known school series published by Messrs. Macmillan. We like the pleasant and easy style of the narrative, and the tone of real interest in, and feeling for, the greatness and welfare of England—witness the little exhortation to patriotism with which the third volume concludes. Poetical pieces, for the most part not ill chosen, are intermixed with the prose; and there are genealogical tables and maps for use, and pictures for pleasure. But the maps stand in need of some improvement; for in that of the Danelagh, King Alfred has been done out of all his territory between the Thames and the Ouse; and in those of the Continental dominions of Henry II. and Edward III., the map-maker has been seized with a perverse fancy for locating Guienne where Gascony should be, and he has omitted to mark Edward III.'s possessions of Calais and Ponthieu. Of the pictures, many are pretty; but we are again distressed by horsemen fighting at Stamford Bridge; also by the conventional moustached portrait of William the Conqueror (though the author has only a few pages before described the Normans as "clean-shaven"), and by a Joan of Arc in female attire on an occasion when she is known to have dressed as a man. A portrait which is recognizable as that of the younger William Pitt is placed opposite the first mention of the elder; a confusion for which the writer's failure to mark any clear distinction between the two Pitts is perhaps responsible. To begin at the beginning, from which the pictures have diverted us, it is exasperating to come upon nearly a whole chapter devoted to the Druids, the Arch-Druid, the mistletoe, the sacred knife, the rites practised within Stonehenge—in short, all the stage business of Norma. Everybody by this time—except the compilers of school-books—is aware that our knowledge of British Druidism is of the smallest, and that there is no authority whatever for such a statement as that "The Arch-Druid was the greatest man among the British people." When we get to the English period, we find ourselves confronted with the barbarism of "Witena-gemote" for Witenagemot; and sheer carelessness only can account for the statement that Æthelstan was succeeded by "'six boy-kings,' who had very short reigns, and no one of whom did very much good to England." This is the way in which the author disposes of the hero Eadmund, conqueror of the Five Boroughs and of Cumberland, and of Eadred, whose reign is marked by the submission of Northumberland. Of Eadgar he gives an account sufficiently full to show the absurdity of his previous statements; and though the sixth of his list, Æthelred, certainly did little good, his reign of thirty-seven years cannot well be called "very short." Æthelred's wife Emma is said to have been the sister of a "Northman who had made himself Duke of Normandy"—which would be a more accurate description of her great-grandfather Rolf than of her brother Duke Richard. Her son, Edward the Confessor, is represented as having been half-brother to Harold I., with whom he had not a drop of blood in common. The legendary parentage of Hereward, whose family is in truth unknown, is given as an undoubted fact; and, in describing the events of Stephen's reign, the author speaks of "Robert of Caen, who was afterwards created Earl of Gloucester." In fact he held that rank long before Stephen ascended the throne. In the second "Reader," the subdeacon Pandulf is, in defiance of Lingard, described as Legate at the time of John's famous submission; and Philip of Valois is made to announce himself as "the fortune of France"—an expression now admitted to be founded upon a misreading of Froissart. The story also of Queen Philippa's marching in person against the Scots is now so discredited that it ought not to be repeated in elementary histories; and by this time instructors of youth should be able to distinguish John Tyler of Dartford—he who in defence of his daughter slew the tax-gatherer—from Wat Tyler of Maidstone. The introduction of the lines on the death of the Black Prince which Scott, probably not thinking them good enough for any one else, attributed to young Frank Osbaldistone, is injudicious. Without going as far as Osbaldistone père—"Why, the bellman writes better lines,"—we may say that their merit is not high enough to atone for their conveying the false notion that the hero from his deathbed saw

> The splendour of the setting sun
> Gleam on thy mirror'd wave, Garonne,
> And Blaye's empurpled shore.

"Garonne and sun," again to quote Frank's stern parent, "is a bad rhyme"; and if Mr. Osbaldistone's studies had lain in a historical direction, he would no doubt have gone on to point out that the Black Prince actually died on the banks of the Thames. However, we refer even Garonne rhyming with sun to some of the directions laid down in this and the preceding "Reader" for the pronunciation of French names. Mantes, we are told, is to be pronounced "Maungt"; Caen is "Caung"; Tenchebray "Tong-shĕbray"; Blois is lengthened into "Blō-ā," and Poitiers into "Po-ā-ti-eh"; Anjou is "Angzhoo," and Angevin "Ong'-jĕ-vang"—an admirable reproduction of French "as she is spoke" by the ordinary British tourist. The idea of appending to each section explanations of hard words is good in itself; but many of the explanations actually given could surely be as well, and in some cases better, given by any intelligent teacher. Awkward does not seem so abstruse a term as to need a note, nor is "curious and unfortunate" a very satisfactory equivalent. Laymen are said to be "men not belonging to the Church," as if all laymen were Jews, Turks, infidels, or heretics. In reference to Thomas Becket's austerities, the annotator uses the term "Roman Catholic priests," which is entirely out of place at that period. He is very precise in his information about King Arthur, who, he states, "became ruler of Britain in 516 A.D.," "instituted the order of the Knights of the Round Table," and "died in 542." This is the more noteworthy because the author of the preceding volume, to whose period Arthur properly belongs, has judiciously refrained from fixing a single date in the life of that prince. The third volume is the best of the set; but it is unjustifiable to introduce as history an abridgement of the scene of Raleigh and his cloak from Kenilworth, giving the dialogue between him and the Queen, and even her blushes, without a hint that they are taken out of a novel. It is new to us that Cromwell's troops marched to battle at Dunbar chanting the Psalm "Let God arise," though undoubtedly Cromwell himself was heard to quote it. The Psalm that was sung was the CXVII. The information that "The King of Bavaria is an under-king of the Emperor of the Germans, and his army is therefore at the command of his overlord," is not apposite as a note on the battle of Blenheim; for there was no King of Bavaria then; and wherever the Elector of Bavaria's army ought to have been, as a matter of fact it was fighting for the French. And it is enough to make the Wesleys turn in their graves to read that "in this reign three great men, John and Charles Wesley and George Whitefield, left the Church of England." Every one who knows anything of early Methodism knows that as long as its founder lived he maintained its connexion with the Church. The meaning of "hereditary" is certainly not made plainer when it is interpreted as "handed down as an heirloom from father to son." It is possible for "a plain man"—to use one of Macaulay's favourite expressions—to know what is meant by "hereditary," but it takes a lawyer to define an heirloom. We must give the writer credit for understanding the true meaning of the "Three Estates"; but from his saying that "the archbishops and bishops of England" "are elected by the Sovereign," it would seem that he is not acquainted with the mystery of a congé d'élire. Also he should not class "royal dukes" as a distinct rank of nobility.

It will be seen from what we have said that these "Readers" cannot be unreservedly recommended. The authors show undeniable narrative power, but there was need of more thorough historical training and more careful editorship.

SOME AMERICAN BOOKS.

PROFESSOR J. E. NOURSE'S book on American Explorations in the Ice-Zones (Boston: Lothrop & Co.) is one that can be read with advantage by those interested in the subject. The part which America has borne in the work of Arctic exploration fully justifies the appearance of such a book. If the manner in which the story is told is somewhat heavy, the interest which attaches to the story itself, and the free use which its nature compels him to make of the narratives of others, render the book an interesting one. It is copiously illustrated, and a good deal that lacks vividness in the narrative is made up for by the pictures. The chief impulse to American research in this direction was given, Professor Nourse tells us, by the voyages of Sir John Franklin. The author gives a list of twenty-nine expeditions, English or American, undertaken either in the hope of relieving him or of finding fuller traces of his last expedition. The accounts of Arctic travel, though such voyages are of the highest interest and importance, are in their nature somewhat monotonous. Icebergs and icefloes, snow and frost, play so great a part in all of them that (apart from the greater importance of Arctic investigation) one feels as if one had been wading through the last dozen numbers of the Alpine Journal. The book begins with full accounts of the travels of Grinnell and Kane, and, among other narratives of interest, gives a touching account of the untoward fate of Hall and of De Long.

Mr. Arthur Gilman's History of the American People (Boston: Lothrop & Co.) figures with propriety in a "Library of Entertaining History." It is profusely illustrated, and contains pictures of an Indian papoose, of the house in which Mr. Whittier was born, of a house in Concord from which the wife of the Rev. W. Emerson watched the fighting, and of the monument on Bunker Hill. The latter recalls to our mind a story of an Englishman who was taken by an American friend to see this memorial. "It was here, sir," said the American, "that General Warren fell." The Englishman, not being familiar with all the names and incidents of that period, imagined that his friend referred to some recent accident, and, glancing at the height of the monument, said he feared that General Warren must have been hurt. One little fact will show that Mr. Gilman's love of his own country does not always allow him to be fair to others. In giving an account of the war which began between England and America in 1812 he can find space for a notice of the sea-fight between the Constitution and the Guerrière, in which the Americans were victorious, but none for the not less important one between the Shannon and the Chesapeake, in which they were defeated; nor does he mention the fact that the weight of metal carried by the American ships in that war was much greater than that of the English. Perhaps this is mere carelessness; for in the account of the Virginian campaign between the Federals and Confederates in the year 1862, he makes the seat of war pass at once from the neighbourhood of Richmond into Maryland, without noticing the intervening battles at the end of August in the neighbourhood of Manassas. If the Federal forces had not been wholly defeated in these battles Lee would not have been able to invade Maryland. The book is readable and popular in its tone, but has no pretension to historical value. Indeed, no such claim on its behalf is put forward.

Dr. Taussig writes an interesting little book on Protection to Young Industries (New York: G. B. Putnam's Sons). Starting from the remark of Mill that in certain cases such protection is justifiable, he proceeds to examine whether the system adopted in the United States has really attained its object. He examines in succession the history of the cotton, the woollen, and the iron manufactures in America, and shows that in these three main branches of industry, as, in all probability, in nearly all others of less importance, the protective system was not the cause of their rapid development. With or without protective laws, these industries could not fail to have flourished and grown. There is a great deal of curious and important information condensed into this little book. Few people have any clear notion of the vast difference between international trade a century ago and the same trade now. In 1740 we were importing bar-iron from the American colonies. The changes in American as well as European industries caused by new mechanical discoveries and new industrial methods are clearly shown by Dr. Taussig. Thus the use of coke instead of charcoal in blast furnaces, which became general about a century ago, gave England at once a pre-eminence over those countries, like Sweden or the American colonies, which depended for their supply of fuel on wood. The beds of anthracite in America could not then be utilized. The so-called protection of young industries, when brought to the test of fact in the United States, turns out, according to Dr. Taussig, to be a mere mystification. The book treats of one side only of the question, and attempts no more. But the writer is fully alive to other aspects of it. The present arguments for protection in America take a different form, the main argument being based on the cheapness of foreign as compared with American labour. And, as the writer acutely points out, during and after the war with England in the early part of this century (when American manufactures were imperfectly developed), the desire arose among Americans to make themselves, in the event of war, self-sufficing. No doubt this feeling has much to do with Prince Bismarck's protective policy.

Mr. E. J. Lowell's The Hessians in the Revolution (New York: Harper Brothers) is a narrative, carefully worked out, of the part played by the German auxiliaries of England in the war between the mother-country and the colonies.

Mr. Church's Stories of the Old World (Boston: Ginn, Heath, & Co.) is a book published in the series of "Classics for Children." It seems to us much too elaborate for the purpose, and much too full of Homeric and Virgilian speeches boiled down into prose. Children want to read of action more than of talk. Kingsley's "Heroes" would touch a child's mind with ten times as much power as this book.

The Story of a Country Town, by E. W. Howe (Atchison, Kas.: Howe & Co.) is a tale of Western life in America. There is a good deal of vigour in the plan of the story, but it cannot be said to be well told.

Pictures and Stories from American History, by Uncle Ned (Springfield, Mass.: Milton, Bradley, & Co.), conducts the childish mind from the discovery of America to the Centennial Exhibition at Philadelphia. Not to speak of the British defeats here depicted, there is a flaming representation of General Scott's entry into Mexico, with which the American youth might with advantage compare some of The Biglow Papers.

ARCHER-HIND'S PHÆDO.*

IT is not without a feeling of anxiety, of apprehension even, that we take up an edition of the Phædo, bearing a name not yet familiar to readers of Greek literature, nor, perhaps, of assured significance in the narrower circle of students in Platonic philosophy. This is, we believe, the first time that Mr. Archer-Hind steps out of the respectable seclusion of the Journal of Philology, and brings his contribution to the public table. His official position at Cambridge proves him a sound scholar, in the ordinary sense of the words, and academic rumour has long represented him as having higher claims. No one, indeed, could have read what he has previously published, small as it is in amount, without discovering that he is both careful and original, and that an exposition by him of a dialogue of Plato was likely to repay curiosity. But this did not guarantee a good, or even a tolerable, edition of the Phædo. There are Greek scholars of the most extensive learning, there are metaphysicians and moralists of the greatest power and acuteness, whom we cannot without something like a shudder imagine laying expository hands upon that book. Of all human writings—we fear no misunderstanding—the Phædo of Plato is perhaps the most sacred. There is one tragedy, and only one in the world's history, which has stirred the hearts of men more profoundly, which has soothed and encouraged a greater number of nobly-spirits than the death of Sokrates. The dialogue in which the narration of this death is used to frame an argument upon soul in general and the human soul, and to set forth the doctrine "that the wise and virtuous man will meet death with cheerfulness," is in theme almost without a rival in literature, in art incomparable. We give to the present editor, not indeed all the praise that he deserves, but the praise which in such a matter we should rate most highly, when we say that he is worthy of his subject, that he has printed no sentence, we may almost say no word, which should not have been found within the same covers as the text.

One advantage Mr. Archer-Hind possesses over the majority of those who undertake to re-introduce great works to the reader—it will scarcely be said that the time does not call for the exercise of such a function. Mr. Archer-Hind is the colleague and, as appears from his preface, the intimate friend of Mr. Henry Jackson, and acknowledges his assistance—we had almost said his collaboration—in the strongest language. Now upon the development of Plato's philosophy "an entirely new and most important light has been thrown by Mr. Jackson in a masterly series of essays recently published in the Journal of Philology, Vols. X. and XI." Whatever may be the ultimate judgment upon Mr. Jackson's theories, this friendly sentence cannot be disputed. They are borrowed from no one, either in this country or elsewhere, they concern no less vital a question for the history of human thought than whether the writings of Plato record the growth and maturity of a consistent scheme or the shifting phases of a controversy determined mainly by artistic motives, and they have been set forth with at least such primâ facie probability as, whether they are accepted or not, will render it impossible to ignore them. For the promised edition of the Philebus by Mr. Jackson we are waiting, and the present book is the first continuous exposition of a Platonic dialogue as seen under the new doctrines. A few brief quotations must here suffice to indicate their surprising interest. Mr. Archer-Hind, after stating (p. 34) the principle of Sokrates, "that knowledge is of universals," and describing the development from this of Plato's ideal theory, in which the universal becomes an essential idea prior to the particulars of which it is the cause, while "between the primal unity and the infinite multitude of particulars" we have "a definite number of classes . . . and each of these classes represents an idea," continues as follows:—

> This is the stage of the middle Platonism; as yet the ideas are simply hypostasisations of every logical concept. . . . The particulars in every group derive their nature and existance from the immanence, παρουσία, of the idea. The Republic is the chief exponent of this phase of Plato's metaphysics . . . its main distinguishing characteristics are the assumption of an idea for every group of particulars, and the inherence of the idea in the particulars. . . But Plato presently finds reason to be dissatisfied with this expression of his theory; the difficulties and deficiencies he sees therein are stated with overwhelming force in the earlier part of the Parmenides. The points which chiefly demanded correction were the contents of the ideal world and the relation between ideas and particulars. . . instead of an idea corresponding to every group of particulars, we now have only an idea for every group which is naturally and not artificially determined; thus all ideas of σκευαστὰ are abolished. Next relations are reduced from the rank of ideas to that of universal predicates . . . so that we no longer have ideas of great and small. . . Finally, ideas of negations are abolished, such as evil, unjust, &c. Therefore one great criterion of the stage to which a dialogue belongs will be the nature of the ideas that are assumed in it.

Again:—

> In the middle period the idea exists (α) transcendentally; (β) immanent in the particulars. In the period to which we have now come, the transcendental existence of the idea alone is allowed; the particulars no longer participate in the idea, but are regarded as copies, μιμήματα, of the ideal type, παράδειγμα. . . . The later metaphysic is unfolded in the Parmenides, Sophist, and Philebus, and consummated in the Timæus.

It is needless to say that this, with its noticeable "consummation," is a very different view of Platonism and the history of Platonism—a very different view of the Philebus and Timæus from that which will be found in the common text-books; still more different from the notion, if there be any definite notion, which is carried away by those who study Plato in popular translations. The mere possibility that it may be true, and that "guided by these landmarks we shall find it no hard matter to determine the bearings of" a Platonic dialogue, must be sufficient to awaken the highest interest in students of ancient philosophy, and this edition of the Phædo will show how much light may be derived from it. But, in order that it may be properly judged, we must have expositions by the Cambridge Platonists at least of the all-important Philebus and Timæus. Mr. Jackson has promised the Philebus. Will not Mr. Archer-Hind commence upon the Timæus at once?

No position can be more important to those who look in Plato for a philosophy than that defended by the editor (Introduction, § 4), that the famous tripartite division of the soul (in the Phædrus and elsewhere) is metaphorical, and as such does not contradict the serious doctrine of Plato, that "the soul is essentially simple and incomposite." This doctrine, obvious as it may soon appear, is, we believe, entirely due to the editor, and is, in our judgment, already made out, which it would perhaps be premature to affirm of the striking theory sketched in the last paragraph. Not less new, and scarcely less interesting, is the clearing up of Chap. XLVIII. in the Phædo, part of the narration by Plato's "Sokrates" of the history of his own mind.

* The Phædo of Plato. Edited, with Introduction, Notes, and Appendices, by R. D. Archer-Hind, M.A., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. London: Macmillan & Co.

The editor holds that the study of "concepts" (λόγοι) which "Sokrates" proposed to himself was a substitute not, as commonly represented, for the study of nature by the methods of the physicists, but for the study of "the eternal ideas" and in particular of "τὸ ἀγαθὸν as the ultimate cause working in nature." In short, "Sokrates" made an essay at Platonism, and failing fell back upon the "concepts." Here, again, the editor has completely satisfied us, and this is but one among many points to which we would gladly direct attention, did space permit. We hope, however, that we have said enough to send the reader to the book itself. We recommend it, in particular, to those who may have persuaded themselves or others that "English scholarship is chiefly borrowed from the Germans." A consideration of those views only which are here reproduced from English sources, and of the dates of their first production, should suggest some wholesome reflexions upon the true causes of this curious belief.

Apart from his original discoveries the editor has done his work thoroughly well. The English style is clear, and, as a rule, singularly graceful, and, whether upon the arguments or the language of the author, he is, speaking generally, a safe guide. As we put this statement so widely, it may not be impertinent to add that we have studied minutely the whole of his introduction and commentary. We like him least in some of his remarks upon the reading of the text. He seems a little impatient of these questions, a feeling with which we can thoroughly sympathize, while we deprecate it. Chapter XLVIII. will again serve for an example. We have already said that his exposition of this chapter seems to us perfectly sound. A certain clause, however, is likely, thinks the editor, to be made the basis of objections. No just objections can be founded upon it, and we are glad that the editor has carefully avoided the appearance of staking his exposition upon the strength of his criticisms against the genuineness of this clause, which appear to us quite unsubstantial. It is curious that the only place in which we find the editor confused in thought is in a passage which he suspects of interpolation. The notes on ὑπόθεσις and τὰ ὡρημένα (to D, E) are inconsistent, and if the true interpretations of the second note be extended to the former, "the most serious objection of all" falls to the ground. The text remains faulty, but the editor's treatment of it is arbitrary, or at all events inadequately supported. And so in some other places. On the other hand, we entirely agree in the rejection of the glosses in 75 B and 76 E, which betray themselves by misuse of Platonic language. As glosses they are highly interesting, and the probable origin and motive of them would be a suggestive theme.

As we have demurred to a few of the editor's textual criticisms, we propose to give him what he may perhaps consider an excellent opportunity for retaliation. At page 66 B Sokrates observes that the genuine philosopher will regard death as the short cut to the goal of his life's endeavour—namely, the withdrawal of the soul from its embarrassing communion with the body. With the editor's explanation of this passage we agree. But what of the text? For the sense that "death is a short cut, &c." we find simply κινδυνεύει τοι ὥσπερ ἀτραπός τις ἐκφέρειν ἡμᾶς, that is to say, the word "death," the point and subject of the sentence, is omitted. The editor thinks that "possibly something like ὁ θάνατος" is still missing, and this assumption is surely indispensable to his view. Now, that this excluded "something" was in letters "like ὁ θάνατος" is on scientific grounds utterly improbable. We, therefore, aid the editor (though we are not sure of his recognition) when we offer the explanation, that as Plato in another part of the dialogue avails himself of the unforeseen meaning (τὸ ἀειδές) to be detected in the popular phrase (εἰς Ἅιδου) for the place of the dead, and as elsewhere he often delights to quote the undesigned witness of language to the truth he would enforce, so here he is pointing out that the philosophic view of death as the path straight home was unconsciously foreshadowed in popular speech when, among other names, Death was called and figured by the name of Ἄτροπος. Thus the missing thought is found; and, whether we leave the text as it stands, taking ἀτραπὸς, as it were, in both senses, or whether we write κινδυνεύει τοι ὥσπερ ἀτραπός τις ἡ Ἄτροπος ἐκφέρειν ἡμας, restoring the words ἡ Ἄτροπος to a place whence they would have easily dropped, is a subordinate and not important question.

We have almost filled the space at our disposal, and yet we have not half represented this pleasant and valuable book. Like all good books, it cannot be represented, it must be read. We return finally to our first judgment—the commentator is worthy of his text. Nowhere does he better approve his tact than in his comment on the conclusion—ἥδε ἡ τελευτή, ὦ Ἐχέκρατες, τοῦ ἑταίρου ἡμῖν ἐγένετο, ἀνδρός, ὡς ἡμεῖς φαίημεν ἄν, τῶν τότε ὧν ἐπειράθημεν ἀρίστου καὶ ἄλλως φρονιμωτάτου καὶ δικαιοτάτου. Innumerable must have been the tearful eyes which have spelt doubtfully the words of this simple sentence. We are glad that Mr. Archer-Hind protests against a single omission or alteration which would mar "the sad music of this solemn close."

CAVE-HUNTING IN SOUTH POLAND.*

THE pursuit which Professor Boyd Dawkins has happily designated "cave-hunting" has rendered such valuable results to science that we gladly welcome any account of fresh labours in the same field; especially when, as in the present instance, the work was carried on in caves the privacy of which had not been invaded since the far-off days when the last human successor of the cave-bear discarded flint flakes and bone ornaments, and, exchanging his hill-side fastness for a cottage in the plain, became a tiller of the earth, instead of a hunter of beasts only a trifle more savage than himself. The nine caves of which Professor Römer describes the exploration in the volume before us are situated near the village of Ojcow (pronounced Oizoff), just within the Russian frontier, a few miles to the north-west of Cracow. They all occur in a white limestone of the oolitic formation—the prevailing rock of the district—which bounds the narrow valleys trending in a south-easterly direction towards the main valley of the Upper Vistula. The author admits that "the character of the caves is exactly like that of other caves in limestone rocks," and that they "more particularly resemble those of the Franconian oolite in the district of Streitberg and Muggendorf," which have yielded such wonderful rewards to their explorers; but, though the general result of the investigations of these caves may not present any novel features, we quite agree with him that it was well worth while to have undertaken it, as they are the most easterly of any European caves north of the Carpathians, and it is important to determine the conditions under which mammalian life was developed in all parts of the world where it is possible to study its evidences.

The caves began to be explored in 1872, for the purpose of removing the earth with which their floors were covered to the depth of several feet. It was expected that, as it was full of bones, it would form an excellent manure; but the expense of removal was too great, and the scheme was soon abandoned. In the course of the works a few bones and prehistoric flint implements were discovered and sent to Professor Römer, at whose instance the Royal Prussian Ministry of Instruction, and afterwards the Royal Academy of Sciences at Berlin, granted funds for a thorough scientific investigation of the caves. So far as we can make out the history of the proceedings, the Professor first visited the caves in 1874; but matters moved so slowly that the grant of funds was not made until 1878. It is not, therefore, surprising that many valuable specimens had been lost in the interval, during which we may suppose that the removal of the earth for agricultural purposes was still going on; but it will hardly be credited that, even after two scientific bodies had taken the work under their imperial protection, it was conducted so carelessly that the author admits that it cannot be always positively stated from which bed in the caves the specimens found were taken. In all work in caves this is the most important point; for, as they were occupied successively by different inhabitants, whose remains lie in distinct and separate beds, it will be at once recognized that our knowledge of the relations of one set of occupants to another must depend on the exact notation of the objects discovered. One of the caves, however—that of Wierszchow, called Mammoth Cave, from the number of remains of that animal found in it—was fortunately explored with the greatest care between 1873 and 1879 by a private gentleman, Count Johan Zawisza, of Warsaw, who has recorded his observations separately in a series of papers contributed to various scientific journals. If we may assume that the condition of this particular cave did not differ essentially from that of the others near it, we are in a position to estimate with tolerable accuracy the value of the evidence obtained throughout the district.

In the most ancient times to which the investigations conduct us the caves were evidently the dens of bears (Ursus spelæus). If we take the largest of the caves—that of Jerzmanowice—as an example, we meet with the following account (p. 5):—

> The remains of this animal were by far the most abundant. Bones, skulls, and single teeth occur in all parts of the cave in great abundance, and in fact both in the upper and lower beds; they were most plentiful in the lower beds, at a depth of five metres. No perfect skeleton was ever found, but only single bones and skulls. The number of individual animals buried in the deposits of the cave is extraordinary, and may be reckoned by thousands. Although only a very small portion of the floor of the cave was excavated by us, yet the bears' canines collected by us formed a heap a foot high. Besides this, a very large number of teeth of this description must have been found and given away in the country by the labourers when digging the brown earth for manure; the regular form and shining smooth crown of the tooth must have attracted their attention. My belief is that we should not be far wrong in estimating the whole number of canines of the cave-bear found in the cavern as at least 4,000; so that, as each animal had four canines, this would make the number of individual bears 1,000. But, as only a third of the floor of the cave has been hitherto excavated, the whole number of animals ought to be reckoned much higher. We cannot, of course, imagine that so large a number of those animals lived at the same time in the cave, or even in the surrounding district; but there was doubtless a period of extraordinary length during which a long series of many succeeding generations of these animals lived in the cave, and, when they died, their remains were covered by the debris of the rock. If we could venture to imagine that, like recent bears, only one family could live at the same time in the cave, and that the lifetime of the cave-bear was of the same duration as that of the brown bear, to which it is so nearly allied, we should have some kind of data on which to found the length of the period when the cave was inhabited by bears.

The observations of Count Zawisza led to the same conclusion in the Mammoth Cave, where the remains of bears "were especially abundant in the lowest bed of the floor"; and the number of their bones found in the remaining caves renders it more than probable that their destination was the same. A remarkable fact was, however, established by the exploration of these caves, and more especially that of Jerzmanowice—namely, that man and the bear had certainly been co-existent. Bones of bears were found among those which had evidently been split for the purpose of extracting the marrow, and were charred by the action of fire and mixed with charcoal and pieces of pottery; and "a bed of solid stalagmite lying several feet deep contained a vertebra of the cave-bear firmly imbedded, and also an undoubted flint implement made by human hands." It is probable therefore that after this cave had been occupied by many generations of bears it became a human habitation, and that its new inhabitants fed upon the bears which were still living in the neighbouring caves. Another proof of this was afforded by the cave of Kozarnia, which yielded a bear's tooth bored with a small hole, as though it had been worn as an ornament upon a string. The cave-hyæna (Hyæna spelæa), which was evidently so plentiful in other parts of Germany and in Britain, at what we may take to have been a corresponding period, was here extremely rare; and so was the great cat of the caves (Felis spelæa). On the other hand, important evidence occurred to show that the mammoth (Elephas primigenius) had been contemporary both with the bears and with man in this district. The now classical explorations of the cave at Gailenreuth in Franconia, of which Dean Buckland has left so graphic a description, attested the former fact; and the latter has been amply proved by the examination of various caves in France; but we believe that this is the first time that the two facts have been brought together in such close juxtaposition. Five of these caves yielded bones of the mammoth, and in one of them, that of Wierszchow, five contiguous vertebræ belonging to the same animal were found together. Professor Romer considers that this fact proves that "the whole body had been brought into the cave and buried there." We cannot accept this conclusion, but would rather suggest that the discovery proves that either man or the bears had brought what would have been a dainty morsel to either of them into the cave, and there eaten it at their leisure. There is nothing in the habits of the elephant to indicate a wish to retire into a cave at the approach of death; and no one would have been at the pains of deliberately burying an animal of such a stature. Moreover, a rib of a mammoth, one end of which had been worked into a handle, and numerous ornaments of ivory, were discovered; especially some curious staves a foot long, the destination of which is very perplexing, which were found in the cave of Wierszchow, associated with rough flint implements, and with bones of the reindeer wolf, and Polar fox. These may, of course, have been made out of tusks of animals which had died long before, discovered on the hill-side; but we think it is more likely that a race of hunters, such as these men must have been, would carve them, as trophies, out of the tusks of animals which they had themselves slain. The other animals whose bones are usually found together in caves were nearly all represented here, but their numbers appear to have been comparatively small. Of the rhinoceros only a few teeth and some single bones were discovered; of the elk there were bones and antlers in abundance; the reindeer and the urus (Bos primigenius) were both rare. It may be conjectured that all these animals had been killed, and their bones gnawed to pieces by the bears. The fragments would become gradually decomposed during the long period which must have elapsed since the bears were in existence, and help to form the bed of earth which first attracted explorers to the caves. We cannot agree with Professor Romer's theory that the discovery of a reindeer's antler attached to the skull proves that the animal died a violent death. Such a condition of the bone merely shows that the animal died at a time of year when the horn was attached to the skull.

The articles of human workmanship do not present any peculiarity. The most important of them are figured in the plates. There are flint flakes, flint knives, spindle-wheels of baked clay, boring instruments of bone, bone needles and arrow-heads, and various ornaments. It must not, however, be supposed that these are all of the same date or belonging to the same race; but, as in one of the caves a coin of Antoninus Pius and a bronze fibula were discovered, it may be presumed that the caves were used as places of sepulture down to historic times. The human skulls have been examined by Professor Virchow, who decides that none of them indicate a very remote antiquity, or a marked difference from those of the present inhabitants of the district.

MOUNTSTUART ELPHINSTONE'S LIFE.*

MOUNTSTUART ELPHINSTONE landed in India some ten years after Warren Hastings had left it, and he lived long enough to know that the Sepoy Mutiny was at an end. He had served in confidential positions under the Wellesleys, and some of his latest correspondence is taken up with the policy of Dalhousie and Canning and with the elements indispensable for a Council intended to fill the gap of the Court of Directors. His career in its main incidents is linked with the most remarkable diplomatic and military events that took place in Central India and in the Western Presidency between 1800 and 1818. His early years were passed at Benares in the Judicial Department; and then, by one of those fortunate chances of which young men of ability know how to avail themselves, he was brought down to Calcutta with the view of perfecting his knowledge of Oriental languages in the College of Fort William lately established by Lord Wellesley. But he was only a few months at the Presidency when he was transferred to the diplomatic service and acquired valuable experience at Poona and Hyderabad. Then he joined General Wellesley as a sort of political secretary in the field, and actually witnessed the engagements of Assaye and Argaum and the capture of Gawilghur. When not ten years in the service he was made Resident at Nagpore. In 1808 he was deputed on a special mission to Cabul, but it is important to note that he never reached the capital at all, or saw more of the Khyber Pass than its entrance. It is interesting to find in his journals the names of such places as Kohat, Hassan Abdal, Rawal Pindi, and others, then sine nomine, but now familiar to scores of civilians and military men. The envoy to Afghanistan next became the Resident at Poona. Here he detected native intrigues, anticipated Mahratta treachery, and may be said to have directed the movements of troops which resulted in our victory over the Peshwa at Kirkee. When the campaign against Mahrattas and Pindarries was followed by a large territorial increase to the Bombay Presidency, no one had a better claim, not even Sir John Malcolm, to the post of Governor. In that capacity he remained for eight years, controlling our relations with native States of which he knew everything, and supervising Settlements of which he knew little or nothing, but leaving behind him the reputation of a wise, paternal, and far-sighted administrator. At the close of 1827 he left India, never to return to the East again, though he was once offered the post of Minister at Teheran, and twice that of Governor-General of India. The remaining thirty years of his life at home were passed in travel, in society, in the pursuit of literature, and in the production of his well-known History of India. For Parliament he thought himself unfitted; but he was more than once consulted on important Indian questions.

The above is a summary of a political career which deserved a biographer from its mere connexion with the splendid feats of English captains and with the collapse of native thrones. If Elphinstone had been no more of an administrator than old Sir Colin, Lord Clyde, or if his idea of the Balance of Power had been taken from Sir John Shore, some record of his adventures, his diplomatic skill, his hairbreadth escapes, his appreciation of native character, would have been perfectly justifiable. But there is so much of political wisdom and warning in his minutes and journals; his training and qualifications were so peculiar; his readiness in emergencies so conspicuous; and his forecast of the perils and contingencies of Indian administration so clear, that the gallery of national portraits would have remained incomplete had it not been for the labours of Sir Edward Colebrooke. A memoir of Elphinstone's life and services had already been published in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society in 1861. But, not to say that he was distinguished as a politician rather than a Pundit, the biographer has since had access to more copious and valuable materials than when he wrote his first sketch. A very wise discretion has been shown in dealing with a "large collection" of "private correspondence" arranged and docketed, but clearly never intended for publication. Such letters have not even been opened by the editor, and will not in this generation at least ever be seen by the public. There is quite enough in the journal and the despatches to satisfy all legitimate curiosity. And we are spared anything that might offend the living or cast a slur on the dead. In all other respects Sir E. Colebrooke has discharged what has doubtless been a pleasure as well as a duty, with excellent judgment and perfect taste. The labour of deciphering the manuscripts could not have been slight. Many Indian statesman have been excellent penmen. Lord Canning's was a fine bold hand. Lord Lawrence's character might be read in his handwriting. It was occasionally rough, but always legible, firm, and distinct. Lord Dalhousie's longest minutes hardly contain an erasure and are as beautiful as copper-plate. But Mountstuart Elphinstone would never have made his livelihood as a copyist, or in Anglo-Indian phraseology, as a section-writer. Even his English was a scrawl, and though his classical quotations are accurate, his scraps of Persian, whether based on Gilchrist's plan of spelling or his own, were not always consistent. Some valuable aid has been afforded to the biographer by competent Oriental scholars and Indian experts, and Sir Edward Colebrooke had himself the advantage of an early training in the Bengal Civil Service at Allahabad. But he may thank us for pointing out some errors and suggesting some explanation of doubtful words and places. "The Mount" is a familiar term for St. Thomas's Mount, near Madras. Jomanes for Jumna, Gore for the Gaur or Bison, Glab for Gharáb an Arab vessel, Kaukee for Kaukoon a Mahratta clerk or inferior revenue officer, Kanir for the Kaira district, and a few others are obvious mistakes owing to the printer or to Elphinstone himself. A Cherry Fouj is rather a puzzle. Fouj is, of course, an army, and Cherry may be meant for Chaoni, the cantonment. By a Zillah Reyship is obviously meant a Zillah or Civil and Sessions Judgeship. Sir John Kaye is spoken of by the Editor throughout as Sir W. Kaye. And the Judge of the Supreme Court at Bombay, who came into collision with that Government and was denounced by Lord Ellenborough then President of the Board of Control, as "the Wild Elephant between two tame ones," was the late Sir J. P. Grant. There was a Sir R. Grant at Bombay, but he was the brother of Lord Glenelg, and was sent out afterwards as Governor and not as Judge. Russa seems to have perplexed the biographer, but we have no doubt that Elphinstone meant Russapagla, south of Alipore near Calcutta. In the last century it was often the residence of Anglo-Indians who preferred a country house with a large garden and groves of trees to a mansion near Tank Square or on the Esplanade. Subsequently for years it was the seat of Prince Ghulam Mahommed, the son of Tippoo, and his tribe of nephews and grandnephews.

Readers, whether familiar or not with the outlines of Indian history for the first thirty years of this century, ought to find in Elphinstone's letters and journals an unfailing source of delight. We scarcely remember any public man who read so much without allowing literature to usurp the place of politics. Macaulay and Sir George Cornewall Lewis, and one or two others, are not quite in point. They were men of letters rather than statesmen. Elphinstone was a politician of the highest rank. In action he was resolute, prompt, and decisive. His conjectures and warnings were often sound and sometimes prophetic. Native character and its good and bad qualities he had gauged accurately. Yet he was always turning to his books for refreshment and consolation. In spite of imperfect early training at the High School of Edinburgh, and at a school in Kensington of "some repute," he managed to become a very fair classical scholar. He was a proficient in more than one Eastern language, and his Persian quotations are invariably pointed and apt. It is amusing to find in his letters to his friend Strachey how he flies from Oriental intrigues to classic studies; from hawking and hog-hunting to Thucydides and Tyrtæus; from Bernier's Travels to Babur's Memoirs: from Blacker's Mahratta War to Jain inscriptions; and from Trimbakji Danglia who assassinated Gungadhar Shastri, to apply a sentence from Xenophon's Hellenics to the downfall of Buonaparte. No wonder that when he gave up the Government of Bombay he spent more than a year on what was then hardly known as the Overland route, felt the scholar's emotion at the sight of Athens and Ithaca, and visited the birthplace of Ovid and the scene of Hannibal's greatest victory.

It may be conceded without any disparagement to him, that Elphinstone failed in his mission to Cabul. In the first place, as we have mentioned, he never got there at all. And in the second he could not convince the Afghan Wali and his Sirdars that an English alliance or treaty was worth having. But his account of the court of Shah Shujah, of the limited power of the ruler, of the rival factions, and of the independence of the remoter clans, would fit the state of the country at this hour; while it is remarkable that in 1808 he contended that "to defend Afghanistan against an invasion from the west, it was essential that we should come in as allies, and not as conquerors." The late Lord Ellenborough was fully justified in asserting that, had Elphinstone gone to India as Governor-General instead of Lord Auckland, we should have had no Afghan War and no Cabul disaster. We doubt whether Elphinstone fully appreciated the soundness of all Lord Dalhousie's splendid measures, but in 1816 he clearly foresaw the necessity of "establishing an ascendency over the whole of India," and he was disinclined to have all the "odium without the energy of a conquering people, and all the responsibility of an extensive empire, without its resources or its military advantages." Others, in many ways inferior to Elphinstone, have either misapprehended or scoffed at the doctrine of the Paramount Power. But it is our true policy for India, and Lord Canning's mixture of control and conciliation to lesser chiefs was only possible because Lord Dalhousie had conquered or annexed the greater States. Readers familiar with the early experiences of Munro in Madras and of Lawrence in Upper India will not fail to detect in Elphinstone a want of experience of such tough questions as Revenue, Settlements, and Rent. He himself was quite conscious of this omission in his career. He had been reared as a diplomatist and not as a district officer. More than once he laments his possible inability to grapple with the details of civil government. A good deal of this anxiety was needless. But it led him to put the cart before the horse, when he was contemplating the pacification of the Provinces taken from the Peshwa after the war of 1817. In administering a ceded or conquered province, he says truly that the two main points are the "manner of administering justice, and the rights to be recognized in the different classes, including the Government, entitled to share in the produce of the soil. The first of these is the most important of the duties of the Government." And then he goes on to talk of codes and institutions, native Punchayats, and Hindu law. Had he served for a cold season in tents with Munro he would have exactly reversed the above order of duties. Things go on when justice is administered with venality and oppression, and villagers may be left to settle their own feuds by arbitration or the stick and spear; but the first and paramount duty of the conqueror is to say when, how, and to whom the Government land-tax or revenue is to be paid. Other reforms can wait. Nothing will be done until the new master has informed the agricultural community whether they are to cultivate their fields and to pay their dues under a Zemindary, a Ryotwary, or a village coparcenary system. But we do not blame Elphinstone for not adding to his political experience that of Thomason or R. M. Bird. And here, by the way, one of Sir E. Colebrooke's coadjutors has failed to give him the right rendering of such a phrase as dustoor-al-Amal. In a footnote we are told it is "instruction." It is something much more, being the rough-and-ready set of rules for the conduct of business—judicial, police, or revenue—which precede the compilation and issue of a regular and formal Code.

It will never do for advanced thinkers to reckon on Elphinstone when they wish to sweep away anomalies and invidious distinctions. He was sadly behind the Ripon and Ilbert age. When the territories of the Peshwa were annexed and became "Regulation Provinces," it was found that a set of chiefs known as the Sirdars of the Deccan were perfectly horrified at the prospect of being placed under the ordinary courts of law. To please and pacify them, a special officer was appointed to decide their disputes, and in the case of the highest chiefs an appeal was given them to the Governor of Bombay in Council. With the lesser potentates an appeal lay to the old Sudder Court at Bombay, but the jurisdiction of the local Civil Courts in all cases was barred. Sir E. Colebrooke may find some little difficulty in making it clear to his Liberal friends and supporters that this privilege, so far from being "invidious," "offensive," or "inconvenient," was, as he shows to us, universally popular and was accepted as a boon by all classes. But we fear much that Elphinstone would have thought the English merchant at this day as fully entitled to exceptional consideration as any Mahratta chief in 1818.

When in the fulness of his powers he surveyed an empire at peace, as it was between 1818 and 1838 with the exception of the campaigns in Burma and Coorg, the real dangers did not escape his keen glance. He was for keeping up such States as Mysore and Gwalior, if they behaved themselves decently, but he foresaw trouble if some dashing leader ever gathered a predatory host round his standard; and a few pages further on we have this significant warning:—"If our Indian Empire escapes the Russians and other foreign attacks, I think the seeds of its ruin may be found in the native army, a delicate and dangerous machine, which a little mismanagement may easily turn against us." The ability of natives to govern themselves he put at an "immeasurable distance"; and he was fully aware of the dangers and difficulties of any so-called colonization or settlement by Englishmen. But, while he deprecated a rush of English adventurers who would offend native prejudice and monopolize native employment, and while he rated rather too highly the state of the country under the old Mahratta rule, he had no hesitation in resorting to the sternest measures when British supremacy was threatened. Certain conspirators who would have murdered Englishmen at Poona and surprised local fortresses were summarily tried and blown from guns. And Elphinstone scorned to ask for an indemnity when he had only done his duty. Though, as we have shown, he was no Revenue officer, his remarks on the Cornwallis policy have a special value at this time. He was not democratic enough to insist on a Ryotwary system. He was for keeping up an aristocracy whether made up of Heads of villages or Heads of Zemindaries, but he would have defined and defended the rights and privileges of these classes as well as the "opposite rights" of the tenants. In fact, there are very few points which he did not handle with an acute perception of their immediate and eventual bearing on the permanence of our administration and the contentment of the community. The gradual employment of natives in positions of trust and responsibility; education in all its branches; the claims of the classical languages of the East and of European science; the retention in our own hands of military and political power; the difficulties of an unfettered press; the danger of acquiring territories beyond India Proper; the preparation of a code of law, and the deciphering of ancient inscriptions—on all these subjects Elphinstone, if not absolutely convincing, is full of leading and light. By way of attaching natives to our rule he suggests endowing them with lands as well as pensions. Under proper financial and administrative safeguards, a grant of lands at a quit rent, say for thrice ninety-nine years, to meritorious Rajas or eminent public servants, might be well worth a trial. It is far better than hoisting Young India into Commissionerships or flooding the Civil Service with Chettys and Modeliars from Madras, Cursetjees and Muckatjees from Bombay, and Ghose, Bose, and Mittra from Bengal. Elphinstone's character is outlined and sketched rather than coloured by his biographer. A portrait, a statue, and a College, to this day attest the gratitude of a past generation for eminent services in council and in camp. Ancestors of the house of Elphinstone fought at Flodden and at Pinkie and filled with credit high offices of State. Their reputation will certainly not suffer by the talents and character of more than one of their name displayed in an Empire which Scotchmen have done so much to create and maintain.

PRACTICAL GAME PRESERVING.*

THE sportsman opens such a book as this with mingled sensations. How much longer, in an age of confiscation, will the preservation of game be permitted, and how long will game survive the repeal of the law by which it is protected? There is too much reason to apprehend the day when what is now known as trespass will be a thing of the past (the attack has already been made in Scotland), when the landowner, if he be permitted to retain any interest in what had been once regarded as his own, will not be allowed to exclude the sovereign people from the parks and coverts. Who can say that the time will not come when holiday-makers will be at liberty to hire guns and to shoot what and where they please? That they would do more mischief to themselves and their companions than to the partridges and pheasants is highly probable, and this reflection will not grieve believers in the rights of property. We fear that Mr. Carnegie's book is born out of due season, but can only hope that honesty will linger in the land for a few years more, and that the valuable hints contained in the volume will have good results. We have one ground of complaint against Mr. Carnegie, and will get it over at once. He constantly dwells on the necessity for good feeling among neighbours, and between masters and dependents on estates, and here we are warmly with him; but in one particular the author recommends, and announces that he practises, a course of action which is assuredly not calculated to make a man popular in his neighbourhood or to promote that good feeling the extension of which he professes to seek. On the question of foxes Mr. Carnegie gives currency to views which we are glad to know are not shared by many country gentlemen, even when they are keen game-preservers—men, that is to say, who shoot, but do not hunt. "Some, we know, want both pheasants and foxes," the author writes, "and these should have their wish; but what we see no reason for is the preservation of foxes by those who never take part nor interest in the hunt. . . . Why should we dwellers in hunting countries be compelled to foster, or appear to foster, the vermin whose existence in our coverts we most dread, or whose entrance into our poultry-house is most destructive? For our part, we fail to see a conclusive reason; and when we catch a fox, that fox either goes to a distant part of the country, from which it may be no easy task to return, or is despatched to a 'happy hunting-ground,' the entrance to which is through a noose of cord." If Mr. Carnegie "fails to see a conclusive reason" by the light of nature, he will probably fail to recognize it when it is pointed out to him; but the reason nevertheless exists, and it is directly connected with generosity, unselfishness, and the desire to promote the amusement of others which does so much to establish that good feeling concerning which the author is eloquent. We know equally well the annoyance of finding no birds where there has been good reason to expect a good show, and of drawing covert after covert blank; but whereas in one case we share our disappointment with two or three friends, in the other case a hundred men or more are deprived of their sport. If foxes are troublesome in a hunting country, a note to that effect sent to the nearest M. F. H. will receive prompt attention; and it must be furthermore insisted upon that many sins are laid to the fox's charge of which he is not guilty. We do not mean to say that he has not a taste for game, and that he will not save himself the trouble of hunting a rabbit, which he much prefers if it comes in his way, by snapping up an incautious pheasant; but it is certain that the fox is very frequently suspected of destruction which is committed by stoats, weasels, cats, polecats, birds, or by human agency. The fox is a standing excuse with the lazy, dishonest, or incompetent keeper, while the ravages committed by other vermin, notably perhaps by the stoat, are generally under-estimated. He and his loathsome congeners kill for killing's sake, and they are so wary and so numerous that, unless battle be unceasingly and most vigorously waged against them, they multiply in a marvellous manner, and game suffers correspondingly. If at the same time a keeper whose preserves are infested with the smaller vermin be careless in the matter of poachers, if it be within his conscience to help himself, or to let his friends help themselves, to a few birds now and again, a man finds about a tithe of the game that should be found; and the keeper vows and maintains that the foxes are alone to blame. We remember on one occasion, when the chicks were running about, congratulating a keeper on his show of birds, and being told that he had lost forty-five since the day before. Their heads had been bitten off in every case, and of course it was those "foxes that master would have." We felt certain that foxes were not guilty, and suggested to the keeper that he should watch the run. He did so, and at length observed his mistress's dachshund trotting towards the place. The little brute suddenly turned aside, and snapped off a chick's head. He had killed four or five before he could be stopped, and was undoubtedly the culprit. Mr. Carnegie is too well acquainted with country life not to know all this perfectly well, and let us do him the justice to say that in the chapter on "Fox Preservation" he writes in the strain that might be expected from a country gentleman. Chapter xxxvi. and chapter xlix. are contradictory in tone, and we should have liked the book much better if the passages we have quoted from the former, and a few others, had not been written.

The author begins—we have been forced to unburden our minds on the fox and bird question first of all—with chapters on the natural history, the breeding, rearing, maintenance, and increase of pheasants; and he at once succeeds in making it clear that he has a sound and comprehensive practical knowledge of his subject. All that he says points chiefly to the urgent necessity of finding a really good keeper, but there is nothing superfluous in his remarks, as it is his object to instruct readers how to become competent amateur keepers themselves. Of the prepared pheasant foods for young birds he speaks coldly, though he suggests the use of two or three manufactures "as an occasional change." We distrust all these preparations, believing that ample variety of food can be easily obtained without having recourse to any of them; and if no prepared food is used, a man knows precisely what the birds have to eat. All that Mr. Carnegie says of the necessity for cleanliness in the vessels out of which the young pheasants feed, of the dangers of foul water, and the risks that arise from standing coops in damp places will, if his instructions are followed, make a considerable difference to the entries in the game-book at the end of the season, supposing always that men shoot straight. There are few poachers' devices with which the author does not show an intimate acquaintance, and he insists upon this axiom, which cannot be insisted on too strongly, "To destroy vermin is to preserve game; if you don't do the one, you can't the other." With regard to partridges, as a rule—a very general rule—the assertion is correct that "where partridges already are they can be increased, and an occasional covey or two in a given locality may always be taken as a proof that it is a suitable one whereon to attempt their introduction." Yet we know districts where the occasional covey is to be found, and yet all attempts to provide good sport in September are disheartening failures. The partridge has many enemies. Vermin, ground and winged, are sources of danger. During the nesting season it is easy for the dishonest labourer to steal eggs, or for the malicious one to set his foot in a nest. Wet weather, want of warmth, and sometimes of food, are fatal to innumerable chicks. Mr. Carnegie very properly dwells on the need of beating clover and meadow-grass, so that the position of nests may be ascertained, and when the fields are mown they may be spared. Of grouse disease the author has little that is new to say. The remark is very pertinent, however, that "over-preservation includes over-stocking and bad food." As an illustration of the dog's sagacity in the demoralizing profession of poacher, the following description of the proceedings of a lurcher, an old sheep dog, or an unbroken pointer, as it happens, may be quoted:—

> We will suppose that we have arrived at the gate of a field opening out on the road or avenue leading up to the house; in this field there are several hares, either still feeding or retired to their forms for the night; the evening is fine, a heavy mist is rising, and it is just getting as dark as it ever becomes on a fine summer night. The gate is carefully opened and put back, and one of the men produces from his inside pocket a large net, which he proceeds to extend across the gateway, making the lower part lie on the ground about six inches, on the side next the field. The other now brings forward the dog, which, in the uncertain light, seems to be of no breed at all, or of every breed combined. As soon as the net is ready a sign is made to the dog, and off he goes. Meanwhile the men crouch on each side of the gate, one inside and the other outside the field. Now let us endeavour to follow with our eyes this intelligent dog; making a start, he goes off at a gentle, silent trot, keeping about 5 yds. out from the hedge and working in zig-zag form round the field. Having found nothing by the time he returns to the gate, he turns and goes back, keeping this time about 15 yds. out from the hedge, but still working in a zig-zag. This he continues to do, covering all the ground that he has passed until at length a hare is found. It is then that we see the wonderful sagacity of the animal, that is if it be not too dark. Let us mark him closely: he approaches the hare, until at length with a bound he puts it up. No vain endeavour is made by the dog to catch the hare; no! all that he has to do is to drive it to the net, and prevent it from escaping at any other point of the field. First he is on one side of the hare and then on the other, until at length, after turning her several times, he considers that she may be chased into the net. Being now tired of trying to escape by the hedges, she notices that the gate is open, and accordingly makes a rush for it, but just as she goes to leave the field some invisible substance bars her further progress, two of her long-legged enemies jump up, and before she has time to give one cry, poor puss is caught, seized by the hind legs, and then "does not remember anything more." A look round is made to see if all be right, and the dog starts once more. Again a hare is found, but this one is more determined to escape than the other, for she has some faint notion that all is not as it should be, and she accordingly makes headlong for the hedge. In vain our dog tries to turn her, but in vain does she try to get to the hedge. Why? because "Jeup" keeps edging her gradually parallel with it until at last she sees no chance but the gate, and an unhappy chance she has there.

The author has collected much information about ground vermin, the polecat, the stoat (which, as he points out, is the veritable ermine, a fact not generally recognized), the weasel, the martens, and the wild cat. That stoats and weasels have a habit of hunting in small packs is mentioned. A record that as many as fifteen stoats have been observed in one pack is quoted, but the authority is not given. The author of The Gamekeeper at Home, however, observes that stoats "hunt in couples, seldom in larger numbers." Mr. Jefferies had seen three, and thought it exceptional; but he once saw five weasels in a pack, and heard of eight. We never happened to see more than a couple of either stoats or weasels; but Mr. Carnegie relates how he once came across three stoats in a state of great excitement on the branch of a tree, while four more were on the ground, a squirrel on the highest part of the tree being the cause of their animation. The best ways to capture these offensive little brutes are fully described, and the peculiarities of many traps are explained. With Mr. Carnegie's views on traps we are in the most hearty accord:—

> As trapping animals is beset in itself with a certain amount of cruelty [he says], such care as may be necessary to lessen the pain caused is well expended, while carelessness is . . quite unpardonable. We once saw a fox which, after having dragged about a trap for nearly a week, had laid down to die of starvation and disease, virulent mange having followed the loss of food and exercise to which it had been subjected.

It is strange that any one who has ever heard the pitiful cries of a trapped hare can set another gin. It is most melancholy to think of the hare, the rabbit, or even the fox, with all his felonies on his head, struggling or lying for hours—in the case quoted it was for days—in agony and terror. The very least that can be done, if humanity be considered, is to use some of the "mitigated" traps—as few of them as possible—and to visit them frequently. We are speaking in this connexion rather with regard to hares and rabbits than to vermin, as to which there are difficulties which we cannot at this moment pause to consider. The latter, the badger—a creature with some very gentlemanlike instincts, by the way—and the tribes of winged vermin, ravens, crows, jays, magpies, and hawks have full attention paid to them. Rooks and wood-pigeons are also included in a very liberal definition of vermin, with which we should not have been inclined to class either. Amongst other subjects discussed is the question how foxes hunt, and the author says there has been some argument as to whether they do so by sight or by smell. There surely need have been no argument about this, as it is certain the fox utilizes not only his eyes and his nose, but his ears in addition.

The book is described as "illustrated," but the illustrations merely consist of a few diagrams of traps, with plans of hatching-houses, a fox earth, and suchlike designs, which scarcely come under the head of what is understood as illustration. The sketches, however, are serviceable in their way. On the whole, although we regret to find that Mr. Carnegie is not sound on the question of his neighbour's fox, Practical Game Preserving is a book which may be studied with great advantage by every resident in the country. Few who have an interest in sport will fail to derive instruction from its pages, for the author is an exceedingly shrewd observer. Those who are in no way sportsmen, and have not an intimate acquaintance with country life, will gain a knowledge of the habits of the birds and beasts around them which will add a new pleasure to their rambles in the fields and woods.

CHURCH'S BACON.*

DEAN CHURCH'S treatment of Bacon shows with curious exactness how much Mr. Spedding's lifelong work has effected, and how far it still is from having produced its full effect. Macaulay's glittering antitheses and commonplace indignation are indeed for ever discredited. We have learned that Bacon as a statesman is not to be judged from the point of view of the Reform Bill, nor Bacon as a philosopher from the point of view of the Learned Friend and the Useful Knowledge Society. Macaulay put himself at exactly the wrong point of view for both purposes, and brought out results which were not only erroneous in detail—such things can always be set right, and perhaps Mr. Spedding laid too much weight on some of them—but fundamentally perverse. It is no longer possible for a scholar like the Dean of St. Paul's to follow Macaulay as an authority for Bacon's life. The Edinburgh Reviewer's indictment has been conclusively shown to be bad in substance and in form. But the refutation has not yet sunk into men's minds. A cloud of suspicion and prejudice remains, and the prevailing opinion, even among competent people, seems to be that where there has been so much smoke, and for so long, there must be real fire.

So it is that Dean Church's estimate of Bacon, though a very different thing from Macaulay's, is, in its result, as a whole nearer to Macaulay than to Spedding. Bacon's life, we are told, was a poor life. He was not true to what he knew; he cringed, he sold himself, he shut his eyes to evil. His character had the deep and fatal flaw that he was a pleaser of men. All this reads very well; it is an excellent setting forth of the legendary Bacon, much more delicately touched than Macaulay's monster. The only drawback is that it does not apply to the real Bacon as shown in his authentic words and acts. The legendary Bacon cringed. The real Bacon addressed persons of high rank in the language which in his age was required as a matter of common courtesy. The legendary Bacon sold himself. The real Bacon thought it better to serve his country with and even under men inferior to himself than not to serve it at all. The legendary Bacon was a pleaser of men. The real Bacon knew very well the arts which pleasers of men cultivate; one need only open the "Essays" to be sure of that. But in his own person either he tried to please men and failed (which does not look probable in a man of his capacity), or he preferred something else to pleasing them. Certain it is that for the best years of his life he pleased great men, on the whole, rather ill than well. The slowness of his promotion is notorious and common ground. What has the Dean of St. Paul's to give by way of explanation? Only a series of speculative questions.

The crucial point in Bacon's career, with regard to his character, is no doubt the fall of Essex. And whether Essex entered on the fatal Irish expedition with Bacon's encouragement or against his warning is a matter of some importance in the events leading up to the catastrophe. The Dean of St. Paul's thinks that Bacon deceived himself, if not others, in after years, when he maintained that he had disliked that enterprise and warned Essex of its dangers. At the time, he says, "Bacon wrote only in the language of sanguine hope." This refers to the "Letter of Advice to my Lord of Essex, immediately before his going into Ireland." We can only say that the language is of hope indeed, but to our mind nothing like sanguine hope, and that the general colour of the letter is to us that of grave anxiety. Remembering that the expedition was then finally decided upon, and that Bacon was not in a position to speak to Essex as an equal, much less a preceptor, we fail to see what stronger warning he could have given. The time for dissuasion was past. All that could be done was to indicate the chances and the perils, the just path of honour to be followed and the false path of ambition to be shunned. And this Bacon did with perfect sincerity. He told Essex that the opportunity was one of splendid promise for the retrieving of fame and fortune, if rightly used. And surely this was true. But he feared, and did not conceal the fear from Essex himself, that it would be used no better than former opportunities. And the fear was only too well grounded. Then we have the question of Bacon's conduct in the proceedings against Essex afterwards. The Dean of St. Paul's hardly disputes that it was in itself dignified and moderate. But Bacon, it is said, ought to have refused to appear against Essex. In whose interest? It would have ruined Bacon, without doing Essex any good. Nay more, the conclusion of Bacon's first speech looks very much as if, until the last moment, he were doing what he could to hold out to Essex a way of safety, or, at any rate, a possibility. "Methinks it were best for you to confess, not to justify." So it would have been, and to say it then and there was the best thing Bacon could do for Essex. These words are, in truth, the keynote of the whole speech. If even then Essex had frankly thrown himself on the Queen's mercy it might not have been too late. There was still a slender chance that Bacon, as an independent and trusted public servant, might have some influence in saving Essex from the extreme consequences of his unwisdom. It may have been a better one than we can now know. In any case, Bacon, if he had not "sacrificed his friend and his own honour," as Dean Church calls it—in other words, if he had made himself the discredited and powerless partisan of an avowed rebel—would have thrown away the last chance, better or worse, of shielding his friend in any way. It was Essex who ruined his own cause at every stage. Not that Bacon was of the stuff that martyrs or leaders of revolutions are made of. A man of that stamp would have acted differently, though it is by no means clear that his action would have been better; but then such a man could not have been a public servant in the England of Elizabeth at all.

We have nothing to say against the treatment of Bacon's philosophical work. The Dean of St. Paul's is there in a more congenial element. But it is curious how much discussion there is about the nature and extent of Bacon's influence on the scientific advance of the seventeenth century, and how little trouble has been taken to ascertain what the men of science thought of it themselves. It is worth knowing that such masters as Descartes and Huygens really studied Bacon, and, widely as their practical experience often compelled them to differ from him, differed with respect. Christian Huygens wrote thus in 1687 concerning the future of the problems of physics (his purpose was to moderate the sanguine expectations of his correspondent Tschirnhausen):—"In quibus ego tamen summam difficultatem restare existimo, nec aliter eam superari posse quam ab experimentis incipiendo . . . deinde hypotheses quasdam comminiscendo ad quas experimenta expendantur; qua in re egregia mihi videtur Verulamii methodus, et quæ amplius excoli mereatur." He adds, with a light but sure hand, the important qualification which the knowledge of later generations has confirmed to the full:—"Sed ita quoque permagnus labor superest, nec solum sagacitate insigni opus, sed sæpe et felicitate aliqua."

RECENT VERSE AND TRANSLATIONS.*

COLLECTIONS of English poetry are already so numerous that it might be thought there was no demand for more. There exists in America, however, a very genuine interest in our poetry, and the volumes of English Verse, edited by Messrs. W. J. Linton and R. H. Stoddard, though published here, are apparently issued from New York and intended for a young and susceptible people. It is a defect in their editing that they are prefaced by no statement of aim or standard of excellence by which the whole collection may be judged, such as Mr. Palgrave sets forth in his admirable Golden Treasury. The selections from early English poetry evince considerable research and excellent taste; but the excessive representation of contemporary verse is as extraordinary as the editors' neglect of eighteenth-century poetry. Mr. Stoddard's introductory essays are occasionally agreeable and even picturesque, but his criticism is without distinction and often unhappy, as when he says, "No reader of English verse need be told that every Elizabethan poet of note except Spenser was a writer of lyrics," as if the author of the Four Hymns and the Epithalamion was no lyrist. He is habitually unjust to Dryden. His remarks on the influence of the Restoration are entirely misleading; it is not merely vague, but inaccurate, to speak of "the Restoration which turned the grandest drama in the world into opera, the blank verse of Shakspeare into the rhyming couplets of Dryden." Mr. Stoddard's observations on the anomalous position of Gray's Elegy and the more striking and reactionary instance of Thomson's Castle of Indolence, would have acquired some force if he had not omitted to make in connexion with them any reference to the far more phenomenal Rowley poems; this would also have effectually corrected his view of our eighteenth-century poetry being an imitation of the topiarian art of Boileau. He actually speaks elsewhere of "the dearth of good contemporary poetry in the seventh decade of the eighteenth century," thus ignoring that pregnant epoch which produced the sublime ode in Goddwyn and the exquisite lyrical faculty of Chatterton. In the volume of Dramatic Scenes the reader passes from Shirley to Landor without a single scene from the characteristic Restoration drama, which Mr. Stoddard regards as a distortion of the Elizabethan drama, instead of a novel growth of peculiar originality. When such poor stuff as Keats's King Stephen is considered worthy of association with the Elizabethan drama, we might reasonably expect a scene from Dryden's All for Love or Aurengzebe. It is difficult, too, to appreciate the editorial subtlety that admits Landor's Dialogues in Verse, which their author considered closet plays, and rejects works of such genuine dramatic power as Coleridge's Remorse and Byron's Sardanapalus and Werner. When, however, the volume of Lyrics of the Nineteenth Century is considered, the aims of the editors are very forcibly divulged. A large portion of this volume of English Verse is occupied by American verse, and, with a strong protest against this strained interpretation of the title, we think it would have been well if some frank indication of the contents had appeared on the title-page. We cannot detect in the majority of the numerous extracts from more than thirty American poets the slightest justification for their publication. It is of course very pleasant to be associated in a century anthology with such lyrists as Shelley and Coleridge, and such Americans as Poe and Longfellow and Whittier; but these agreeable diversions should be confined to the private press of a provincial coterie and not be permitted to mar the continuity and representative character of a series which includes volumes of such genuine value as the Chaucer to Burns and the Ballads and Romances.

It is perhaps owing to the decay of the Byronic legend that the wealth of modern Greek poetry has attracted so little attention in this country, and Miss M'Pherson's pretty volume, which reflects so much of "the glory that was Greece," should remedy a most unmerited neglect. The beauty and glowing inspiration of many of the poems by writers of the present century are strikingly displayed in these translations, which are scarcely less eloquent of the genius of the originals than the skill and poetic gifts of the translator. If the difficulties of poetic translation appeared insuperable to so accomplished a poet as Shelley, the excellence of much of Miss M'Pherson's work shows she possesses something beyond the mere linguistic qualification. The beautiful "Death Song" of Valaóritès, the extracts from Kyra Phrosyné and Euthymios Vlachavas, and the spirited version, "Demos and his Musket," successfully reproduce the delicate fancy and patriotic ardour of the Leucadian poet. The translations from living poets, such as Mr. Rhangabès, Mr. Achilles Paraschos, and Dr. Aphentoulès, are full of interest; the extract from the Τὰ Κρητικὰ of the latter poet admirably expresses the spirit that animated the Cretans of 1866. In addition to specimens of Solomos, Zalakostas, and others who gave brilliant lyrical expression to the enthusiasm of War of Independence, the volume contains examples of the older popular ballads which are so full of touching lament, so richly compacted of folk-lore, and so deeply imbued with the primitive attributes of poetry.

Although there have been educational reformers who would lure unwilling youth into the rigid paths of Hume by advocating the early study of Shakspeare's historical plays, the expedient is of doubtful value. History is seldom attractive in the garb of poetry or fiction, and nothing less than genius of a high order can render its dramatic presentment tolerable or profitable; even in Shakspeare it is the poetry and humour and pathos that delight, and not the historical transcript. Lear and Othello are not less, but rather more highly endowed with actuality than are the historical Richard II. and Henry V. Mr. Grindod has dramatized a considerable portion of English history with too little attention to characterization. To read one of his plays is to make the acquaintance of all; the persons of the drama are not boldly projected in the stirring atmosphere of their times; they are deficient in colour and force, and speak one language; one king is much like another; Mortimer is own brother to Montfort, and the sole exception to this monotony is the sketch of James I., the distinction of which is, however, very superficial.

The sixty spurious sonnets which were so romantically entrusted to Mr. Grindod by the Stranger of Malvern Hills were written, according to the author, "All at once, at the dull height of my grief," which perhaps accounts for their dreary sameness, in which particular they strangely resemble Mr. Grindod's plays. They illustrate the danger to the amatory poet of dallying with the hour of inspiration; passion dies, and with it the poetic afflatus, and there is nothing left but the dull height of grief, which is apparently more fatal to eloquence than the marsh of stupor, and far less inspiring than the depths whence often have arisen divinely-attuned suspiria.

Anima Christi portrays the passage of a soul from the material assurance of Agnosticism into the bosom of the Church through the interposition of the ewigweibliche influence. A certain rude vigour distinguishes the expression of the Agnostic's gradually awakened doubts; but the poetic conception is treated with too little subtlety. The poem is coarse and rough in execution; there is much strenuous wailing, yet the infinite longings of a soul in pain are but faintly delineated; the conversion is too melodramatic, and the final state of ecstasy occasionally suggests mental prostration rather than the pure and delicate exaltation of the regenerate spirit. This result is due to deficient refinement and finish, and a want of skill in harmonizing the three phases of experience depicted; the verse, too, is not free from terribly prosaic lapses, that shock the sensitive ear not less than the defective unity of the poem offends the artistic sense. Mr. Fletcher's conception is, however, worthy of realization; and his work contains sufficient indications of the poetic faculty to make us hope he may attain to more adequate and perfect fulfilment of future conceptions.

Daria is a romantic tale, prettily told, of a noble Italian girl, who, for her love's sake and the pity of it, surrenders a life of luxury to become one of the people. Amid the glory of her high estate she pines for some free existence beyond her castle walls, and Love, ever ready to aid distressed damsels, delivers her. Let her unselfish enthusiasm plead for her that she married her gardener; nor let it be forgotten that the poet has a precedent for her conduct in the Duchess of Malfi. Among Mr. Johnson's other poems is one that celebrates the loves of Daphnis and Lyce with considerable grace and charm, and with a simplicity that well accords with the beautiful fable.

Mr. Skinner's verse is decidedly Tennysonian. Not only does he indite "Stanzas to Maud," which, in spite of his declaration that the young lady is his own and not Tennyson's Maud, are undoubtedly inspired by the Laureate's poem, but, also, a lengthy blank-verse poem, "A Song of the Sea," which is scarcely a less obvious self-impeachment. It contains some passages of vivid description, and the story is related with tolerable skill and facility. In the Lily of the Lyn occurs the following singular simile:—

> Ribbed and grim,
> The little church roof, like a martyr's back,
> Bared to the bitter thong of bigotry,
> Quiver'd from lash of branches in the storm.

The Hon. Mrs. Knox's Four Pictures from a Life is a vague little poem without the picturesque elements attributed to it; some of the lyrics are superior to it in feeling and execution, and possess the excellent quality of unaffected sincerity. The translations from Goethe—though of songs very familiar and frequently translated—fairly reproduce the spirit of the original.

The quaint nursery rhymes and jingling verses of Mother Goose form the motif of Mr. Henry's volume, and these old humours are elaborated to suit our wiser and sadder days. In their masquerade dress such old friends as "How does my lady's garden grow?" "Hark! hark! the dogs do bark," and others of the motley company, are presented in very pretty and piquant fashion. "Daffy-down-dilly" is an attractive version of the text; so also is "Cock-a-doodle-do," with its graphic picture of the departed Carnival. Some of Mr. Henry's modern versions would perhaps cause Mother Goose more surprise than satisfaction, as when he inculcates moral lessons in "Humpty Dumpty" and "Little Boy Blue," or is satirical, as in "Margery Daw."

Many of the specimens of Catullus translated by Mr. Howell successfully realize his ideal of presenting with some approach to exactitude the impression conveyed to the student by the original; others, not less certainly, suggest the vexed question as to what extent a literal translation is preferable to one more free, which yet catches the volatile spirit of the original. Leigh Hunt's well-known translation of the poem "De Acme et Septimio," for instance, is exceedingly loose and verbally inaccurate, yet it reproduces, it seems to us, the Catullian charm and elegance more happily than Mr. Howell's more scholarly version. Mr. Howell occasionally expresses the juste milieu, however, with effect, as in the poems to Lesbia, the "Conversation with Varus," and in the poem "Ad Colonium," in which, however, he strangely—perhaps ironically—translates ponte longo by "big bridge." The longer poems, the "Peleus and Thetis," with the prophetic hymn of the Parcæ in particular, are rendered with considerable spirit and intelligence; and the translations generally evince taste and discernment.

The translation of the Alcestis of Euripides by H. B. L. is a metrical experiment which, while not without interest, is more likely to repel than attract the English reader. The attempt to give the original metres and to indicate the Greek inflections by arbitrary accents, renders the version almost grotesque in appearance, an impression which reading only deepens. As a crib the translation will doubtless be appreciated, while the introductory matter is carefully compiled and copious of information.

Mr. Wilkinson's translation of Schiller's Kabale und Liebe is a tolerably effective version of that strange compound of conflicting passions, the powerful and painful dénouement of which is vigorously rendered.

PROGRAMMES AND MUSIC.

OF the making of analytical concert programmes it may now be said there is no end. Our forefathers had to be contented with the bare announcement of the name of the work which they were called upon to hear; and in most cases they were fortunate if the concert impresario vouchsafed to indicate the key in which the piece was written. "Symphony—Mozart," or "Symphony—Beethoven," or even such misleading headings as "New Grand Overture—Haydn," when one of the symphonies produced at Solomon's concerts was intended, was considered sufficient information for the enthusiastic amateurs of the latter half of the last century. "It is not until the fifth season" of the Philharmonic Society "(1817) that the number or the key indicates which works the audience might expect to hear," says Sir George Grove, himself one of the masters of the art of analytical programme-writing; and it was not until 1859 and the establishment of the Monday Popular Concerts that a concert audience could revel in the luxury of the little blue-covered programme, with its fund of technical and biographical lore. At first, no doubt, the analytical programme was "caviare to the general"; but its possession was accompanied with a sense of superiority in those who were able to follow the musical references therein contained, a pleasure which was not lightly to be foregone by those who were not able to do so; and thus, if only for the sake of appearances, every one patronized the programmes, and their success was forthwith insured. The advantage of having the words of the songs which were sung, it must be remembered, was also no small benefit. In the early days of these programmes it was a source of considerable amusement to watch the eagerness displayed by some in following the fragmentary musical quotations; and it has happened that, after repeated efforts to accomplish his purpose, the bewildered searcher after technical musical knowledge has given up the task with a look of despair most pathetic to witness. But time and, let us hope, increased knowledge, has changed all this, and now no concert is complete without its special analytical feast. The "Wagner Handbook," to give it its short title, is a volume of "analytical programmes with English texts, biographic and critical essays," designed to enlighten the audience at the Wagner Festival Concerts lately given by Mr. Theodore Thomas in New York. A large octavo volume of 128 pages, it is typographically a work of art, embellished with wood engravings illustrating scenes in Wagner's different operas, and giving a very fair portrait of the composer, and we suppose an equally good one of the conductor of these concerts. Although not overburdened with technicalities, it gives in a series of short essays a very succinct and popular analysis of Wagner's method and theory of music-drama, and the biographical portions are sufficiently interesting. Mr. Theodore Thomas is undoubtedly a very energetic and efficient conductor; but we think the writer of this programme would have shown better taste had he "puffed" him somewhat less enthusiastically. Certainly a man who "conducts a Bach fugue, a Mozart symphony, a Strauss waltz" (observe the gradation), "a Handel oratorio, or a selection from Wagner's Götterdämmerung, with the same technical finish and the same sympathetic realization of the composer's intentions," and who "last summer gave seventy-four concerts within as many days, extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific," is a remarkable personage, but we think hardly even for these achievements deserves double the space allotted to Mme. Nilsson, Frau Materna, or Herr Winkelmann, in these pages. On the whole, however, this gigantic programme is very well done, and will have been useful to those who require aid in forming a judgment of the music presented to them at these concerts—a vast majority, doubtless—for we still believe with Puff, in The Critic, that "the number of those who undergo the fatigue of judging for themselves is very small indeed."

How to Excel in Singing and Elocution is the title of a very valuable little brochure on the art of singing, by Miss Jessie Murray-Clark. Although it bears the second title of "A Manual for Lady Students," it will be found to be useful in its general remarks upon the education of the voice for male as well as female aspirants. Miss Murray-Clark does not pretend to originate any new method of instruction; but endeavours in a short and lucid treatise "to place before the student those principles which have been advocated by musicians of eminence, and on which the best methods of teaching singing are based." Her authorities she frankly acknowledges in her modest preface to the work, and places deservedly much trust in Herr Emil Behnke's Mechanism of the Human Voice as a guide for the non-technical reader. In ten short chapters the author deals in an eminently practical way with all the various departments of voice-production, and though it may be said that she does not perhaps develop any new methods, there is not a chapter that does not in some way or other place the known practice in a new and practical light. Above all, we are glad to hail in Miss Murray-Clark another denouncer of the pernicious habit of straining the voice and an advocate of "the extension of the compass through the exercise of the notes which are well within its natural limits." It is all very well to say that every practical singing-master or mistress is aware of this fact; but, owing to the ignorance of the students or their friends, teachers are obliged to practise an opposite method for their credit's sake, and in ten or a dozen lessons to add a note or two to the already impoverished voice by hook or by crook, to what advantage to art may be better imagined than expressed. If intending students will carefully study the principles laid down by Miss Murray-Clark, the teacher's task will be lightened and the student will advance in her art proportionately. The author's remarks upon "Elocution" are exceedingly clear and much to the purpose; and her insistance on the golden rule of keeping the mouth firmly closed, except to sing, to speak, to eat, and to drink, is one of those simple but all-important points which are too often passed over as trivialities. As a valuable vade-mecum to the art of singing Miss Murray-Clark's little book may be highly recommended. There is much humour also in the choice of the stanza from Byron and the epigram from Coleridge which stand as mottoes to the little work.

Of sheet music we have six songs from Messrs. Stanley Lucas & Weber. "Bygone Days," by Mr. Halfden Kjerulf, is a pleasing setting of words by Robert Burns, in which the composer has attempted, with some success, to reproduce the peculiar Scotch rhythm; and "When all around is still," by Mr. William Harold, is an effective song simply treated, but displaying considerable originality. Lady Benedict's "Castles in Spain" has a singular charm in its simplicity and straightforwardness, and is a type of the genuine English ballad which, while thoroughly artistic in treatment, depends much more upon the powers of the singer than upon any extraneous effects of the accompaniment. "Fetter'd yet Free," by Signor Antonio L. Mora, is a graceful song which will doubtless become popular, while Miss E. J. Troup's two songs, "Spring Showers" and "Portuguese Love Song," both display high artistic power, the latter being remarkably characteristic and effective. Mr. Theodore W. Barth has written a very effective song called "The Carver," which we have no doubt Mr. Santley, to whom it is dedicated, will make popular; and another to the words of Cardinal Newman's hymn "Lead thou me on," which is both musicianlike and impressive in treatment. Both songs are published by Messrs. Weekes & Co.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE publication of the letters of George Sand (1) pursues its way with remarkable slowness. Nearly two years have passed since the first volume appeared, and this present (the fifth) only brings us to the year 1870. As the editorial work is almost infinitesimal, as the difficulty of arranging all obtainable letters in exact chronological order would apply to the first volume as well as to the last, and as in any case it would be met, and must be met, if new material came in during publication, by the obvious expedient of an appendix, the delay is not very intelligible. The interest of the volumes continues to be very uniform. The letters are bright, excellently written after an easy fashion, and full of many-sided sympathy. But they never display very deep thought; in which respect, if George Sand's worshippers will pardon us, they exactly resemble her other work.

Somebody has said (or, if somebody has not said it, he ought to have) that a clever man never does a clever thing without more or fewer not clever men proceeding to do the same thing not cleverly. MM. Renan and Havet exemplify the axiom. We can tolerate M. Renan without much difficulty; we leave the toleration of M. Havet to those who are by nature tolerant. When he tells us that "the foundation of all criticism is to strike the supernatural out of the life of Jesus," we know what to expect from him in point of matter; and as he does not tell us this till his ninth page, we already know what to expect from him in point of form. A Life of Jesus (2) with the supernatural struck out of it can have no possible interest except as a well-written romance; and of a well-written romance M. Havet is evidently not capable. As for his remark that "les croyants" can do nothing with Strauss except abstain from reading him, that also tells a tale as to M. Havet's grasp of the merest elements of the matter. But this is not a review of theology, and we may content ourselves with recommending M. Havet to anybody who likes dull and conscientious unorthodoxy, which somehow or other busies itself with problems interesting only to the orthodox.

It is indeed difficult to know what to do with well-intentioned dullards, and among this class we fear that we must also count M. d'Ursel (3). He has filled nearly three hundred pages with the most estimable platitudes as to the characteristics, the dangers, the advantages of democracy, and this is his conclusion:—"Plus le citoyen a de droits et de pouvoir, plus il importe qu'il ait de mérite." True, O Viscount! it imports very much indeed. But it was, perhaps, hardly worth while to write three hundred pages to tell us this; and it would be well worth while to write three thousand if we could be told how this most desirable and important dead-lift to the "merit" of the human race is to be given.

Mme. Olympe Audouard (4) protests in her preface against being accused of "pretention." Far be it from us to do anything so rude in respect to any lady. Mme. Audouard, regarded as a writer of travels, has sometimes struck us as being a little imaginative, and we venture to take her "spiritist" experiences with a few—a very few—grains of salt. But she has been an adventurous person—which is by no means the same as an adventuress—and in some ways a successful. We do not see why any woman who has started and managed successful newspapers, and has been kissed (on the forehead, of course) by Lamartine and M. Victor Hugo on the same day, and has hobnobbed in "bocks" with Said Pasha, and has cured herself of chronic complaints by drinking ten dozen and three bottles of champagne, and sleeping for the greater part of a month, and has gained the confidence of Communists by administering to them "hot and well-sugared tea," should not write memoirs. Indeed, we see many reasons why she should. The book has a portrait in red ink which is full of character.

In a little book Baron Ernouf (5) has given a patriotic account

(1) Correspondance de George Sand. Vol. V. Paris: Calmann-Lévy.

(2) Le Christianisme et ses origines; le Nouveau Testament. Tome quatrième. Par E. Havet. Paris: Calmann-Lévy.

(3) La democratie et ses conditions morales. Par le Vicomte Philibert d'Ursel. Paris: Plon.

(5) Histoire de quatre inventeurs français. Par le Baron Ernouf. Paris: Hachette.

of some French inventors, with Sauvage at their head. Of course Sauvage did not invent the screw, as Baron Ernouf thinks he did. But he did a great deal of good work in connexion with it, and received even less than the usual amount of encouragement from his own country. He himself, it may be observed, anticipated and laughed at the absurd charge that "the English engineer Smith" sent "a very correct and intelligent Englishman" to pick his brains. The less known names of Heilmann, Thimonnier, and Giffard complete the list of Baron Ernouf's inventors.

M. Jouaust is becoming more and more enterprising in his reprints; and it is well, for literature gains by the issue of good books in pretty shape. He has now made a new start with Sacountala (6), the first of a series of "Foreign Classics for French Readers."

M. Reinach ought to bring a blush to the foreheads of the partisans of more than one religious and political dogma. His Gambettism knows no weakness and no falling off, and one scarcely ever takes up a parcel of French books without finding him at his post. His latest contribution to the literature of the Gambettist faith is a little book in the "Bibliothèque utile" (7), containing the legend of his master, put with all due conciseness and fervour.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

MR. J. E. HODGSON, R.A., has added another to the shelf-full of published lectures which he informs us adorn the library of the Royal Academy. These works, it seems, moulder away in neglect; and Mr. Hodgson cheerfully faces the prospect that this will also be the fate of his Academy Lectures (Trübner & Co.). We will not prophesy; but it is at least possible that he is right. His lectures do not seem to be directed to any class of readers in particular. They are not technical enough for the art student, and the reader who likes talk about art may perhaps not find them eloquent enough. There is very little profit to be got out of vague generalities about the state of Greece in the great artistic time and the condition of mediæval Europe. When it is all read we are as far as ever from understanding how it affected painting and sculpture. Mr. Hodgson's practical knowledge has not, apparently, made it easier for him than for the mere literary art critic to tell in words what is the essential artistic quality in a statue or a picture. Now, if talk or writing about art cannot do that, what does it avail?

In these days, when American literature is so carefully studied, we all know to what an unpleasant place Texas is the alternative. It has always been suspected that this is an American joke, and so it appears from a little book edited by Mr. T. Hughes. G. T. T.: Gone to Texas (Macmillan & Co.) is a collection of letters from various young men who have gone to the dreaded State, and have not made such a bad business of it. They were Englishmen and gentlemen; but they did not object to hard physical work, which completely explains the mystery. Mr. Hughes, who edits these letters of his nephews, is a little inclined to overrate the novelty of what they have to tell. As a matter of fact, one newly-published book out of twenty taken at random gives very much the same story and the same moral. They begin by asking what is to be done with our boys, and then proceed to prove by example that they had better emigrate—if they possess the necessary qualities. Unluckily, that is just the difficulty. The number of young men who are gentlemen by birth and yet fitted to be emigrants is small. Probably they are not more numerous than the young men who are able and energetic enough to succeed at home.

"Nothing is more remarkable than the carelessness and apathy of Londoners concerning all that appertains to the organization and arrangement of the sanitary machinery of their great city, and this is more especially the case with regard to the water supply, upon which the daily health of every family in the metropolis depends." These are the words with which Mr. G. Phillips Bevan, F.L.S., opens his treatise on The London Water Supply (E. Stanford). For our part we incline to think that the said "carelessness and apathy" do not exist at all, but that Londoners are simply conscious of the fact that they live in one of the healthiest cities in the world. Mr. Bevans' treatise, however, is not the less useful because the abuses of the sanitary reformer's imagination exist nowhere else. It ought to be welcome to anybody who wants to know the facts, and it is illustrated by an instructive map.

Whoever is not fastidious about looking into human vulgarity, stupidity and brutality, may find a certain pleasure in reading How Shakespeare's Skull was Stolen and Found, by a Warwickshire Man (Elliot Stock). Whether the story be true or false, or partly one and partly the other, it is equally disgusting.

All sorts and degrees of centenaries produce their crop of books. The Wyclif Quincentenary is naturally no exception to the rule, and accordingly a neat little white bound volume on the Reformer has duly made its appearance, under the title of John Wyclif, Patriot and Reformer, by Rudolf Buddensieg (T. Fisher Unwin). It is uniform with the same firm's edition of Luther's Table Talk.

The excellent Academy Notes, No. X., and Grosvenor Notes, No. VII. (Chatto & Windus), are by this time in everybody's hands.

"A Friend" has made a fat volume of quotations from the numerous works of the author of The Schönberg-Cotta Family, under the title of Thoughts and Characters (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge). Dr. Barry, Bishop of Sydney, has yielded to human weakness, and published a volume of Sermons preached at Westminster Abbey (Cassell & Co.). The Miscellaneous Essays of Mr. W. R. Greg (Trübner & Co.) in his second series range in subject from the state of France in 1848 down to the employment of our Asiatic forces in European wars—an article contributed to the Fortnightly Review.

Political satire of the allegorical kind is a tempting but difficult branch of literature. Whoever would succeed in it has need of very much more than excellence of intention. The Immortal Schoolmaster, by G. T. Lowett (London: Kerby & Endean; Windsor: William Clarke), is full of good intentions, but they are not adequately carried out. The story tells how a Dr. Bledstano, a great reader of Homer and most worthy man, came to be head-master of his old school, and how he tried to govern it on principles of justice. His method was to relax discipline and trust to the moral elevation of the boys to keep things straight. The consequences may be guessed. It is clever and bright, but the applications are not always obvious. "The Round Table Series" is the title of a new course of pamphlets designed to give the "views of a number of writers who, while representing divers and even antagonistic schools of thought, desire to give temperate and reasoned statement of their beliefs." It opens with a sketch of Emerson (Edinburgh: William Brown), which is doubtless temperate, but just a little bit hazy. Perhaps that only makes it in better keeping with the subject.

From Grave to Gay (Longmans & Co.) is the title chosen by Mr. Cholmondeley-Pennell for a selection from his poems. It is nicely printed on delightfully crumby paper and adorned by an etching of the author, who looks the very ideal of a bard in a fur-coat. The Charities Register and Digest (Longmans & Co.) is republished in a second edition brought down to 1884, with an introduction by C. S. Loch. Mr. J. R. Lutin, member of the Wordsworth Society, has compiled another Wordsworth Birthday Book (Hamilton, Adams, & Co.). Messrs. Cassell & Co. have published a cheap illustrated Paris Guide. The number of L'Art for the 15th of May is most remarkable for a paper on Old Brussels, illustrated by drawings from the sketch-book of a certain Paul Vitzthumb.

Three well-known novels appear, one of them at least not for the first time by any means, in cheap and portable form. The evergreen Cranford (Smith, Elder, & Co.) comes accompanied by a selection from Mrs. Gaskell's smaller prose tales. Ben Milner's Wooing (Smith, Elder, & Co.) reproduces one of the pleasantest of Holme Lee's quiet and unpretentious, but excellent, stories. No New Thing (same publishers) was, at its first appearance, perhaps more popular than any other of Mr. Norris's books, and it exhibits his style fairly, if not quite to so much advantage as Matrimony.

A thoroughly satisfactory County Atlas is an impossibility while the survey of England is in its present incomplete or antiquated state. Messrs. Letts, however, have judged wisely in doing what can be done with present appliances, and issuing a desirable appendix to their popular Atlas. Each number of the County Atlas contains four maps, and is issued for one shilling, the maps being on the scale of four miles to the inch, clearly printed and neatly coloured. The specimen before us includes the Eastern Counties, and the localities of the recent earthquake in Essex have been carefully marked on it.

"The singular interest and beauty of these two East Anglian minsters and their singular difference give an excellent subject for both pencils and pen. Mr. Freeman's competence for his own part of the matter needs no comment. Mr Farren has executed his thirty-five plates with immense care and with great success."—Saturday Review.

"Mr. Farren's general views are on the whole charming; for instance, Plate II 'A View from the Meadows,' with Ely towering up beyond and Prickwillow, it sky, could hardly be better in its way. ... The 'West Front of Ely' Plate VI looks like a reminiscence of one of Turner's mezzotinters because of showing the low tower and white clouds brightly shining against a dark mass cloud. Some of the interiors are good. ... That sweeping touch which comes of large view and a fine sense of the harmony between English architecture and the history of the English people pervades every page of Mr. Freeman's Introduction."—Athenæum.

SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1,493, Vol. 57. June 7, 1884. [Registered for Transmission abroad.] Price 6d.

THE CONFERENCE.

IT is a position not perhaps entirely unexampled, but certainly strange in English political history, that almost all Englishmen of sense and patriotism, no matter to what political party they may belong, are earnestly hoping for the failure of negotiations in which an English Government is engaged. If the joyful tidings which have been spread more than once during the last few days to the effect that the French Government has finally rejected the English proposals were to be confirmed, there are probably not thirty men even among the faithful majority which saved Mr. GLADSTONE's Ministry the other day by less than that number who would not be heartily glad. It is needless to inquire into the exact truth of the story that certain Liberal members, like St. BONAVENTURA in a famous legend, have confidentially implored Mr. GLADSTONE not to do anything worse than he has already done in Egypt, "because "they will not be able to endure it." It is still less necessary to discuss the marvellous rumours which have apparently found favour with some serious politicians in France to the effect that English Ministers have actually pleaded for the acceptance of their proposals by French Ministers, because it would be such a very serious thing for France if they, the good French-loving servants of her English MAJESTY, were turned out, and bad men who preferred the interests of her English MAJESTY herself were to come in. Generally speaking, all rumours of this kind are false if taken as literal history, and most of them are true if taken as embodiments of current opinion. The recent policy of Mr. GLADSTONE's Government has been so obviously directed by disregard of English interests and respect for French susceptibilities, that the general estimate of it takes form—a grotesque form enough certainly—in such articles as that in Tuesday's Débats. The dissatisfaction of Englishmen—Liberals as well as Tories—with that policy is so unmistakable that it is formulated by report into a regular round robin. Meanwhile set persons say that Mr. GLADSTONE has already pledged himself to evacuation in two years. In that case even the proselytes of the Gladstonian "thorough" will probably experience some searchings of heart.

There is no real reason for feeling any regret at the falling through of the Conference, if it should fall through. It is true that, with the virtual withdrawal of all English attempts at reform in Egypt, the immediate results in that country might be somewhat disastrous, and might give any Continental Power which chose to be unfriendly the opportunity for awkward, and to England very humiliating, remonstrances. But it does not at present appear that any Continental Power is desirous of an open quarrel with this country, and short of an open quarrel England is still mistress of the situation on the Nile, shamefully as she has hitherto misused her opportunities. It cannot be too often repeated that, although, or rather because, the present distress of Egypt is mainly due to English mismanagement, English good management could in a very short time put an end to that distress. Although the financial part of the difficulty could be settled with more apparent ease, and certainly with less direct responsibility, by the proposed joint action, it will hardly be contended either that English credit is not good enough to set Egypt for the moment on her legs again or that Egyptian resources, if properly developed, are not sufficient to maintain and secure a healthy balance between receipts and expenditure, provided only that a reasonable system of internal and external administration is pursued. On the first point no argument is necessary to prove, even to persons unacquainted with the subject, that an English guarantee would produce at once money enough to float ten Egypts over shoals ten times more dangerous than those at present in question. Such a guarantee is, of course, open to objections, and is not to be advocated without restrictions. But it would have the threefold advantage of being at once applicable, of being certainly efficacious, and of stalling off yet further the pretended claims of any other Power on Egypt. Indeed, if Mr. GLADSTONE's Ministry had had the slightest grasp of the principles of foreign policy, it would have availed itself of French recalcitrance long before this to repeat the coup of 1882, and once more to place France in the situation of the man who would not when he might. But that would have been statesmanship, and this is apparently sufficient reason why it has not been done. On the second point—the ability of Egypt to bear her own burdens—the vast majority of experts are unanimous. With a firm and at the same economical policy towards the Soudan, keeping hold of what is worth keeping and letting the rest go, and with a complete reform of the present internal régime, which has been described as consisting of an Englishman to do the work, a Frenchman to prevent its being done, and an Egyptian to coquet with both and fill his own pockets when he can, Egypt can certainly pay her way. But this last reform is the most important of all, and, on the principles of interpretation above laid down, not the least instructive of the myriad rumours recently set flying is the rumour which attributes to France a stipulation that the Egyptian (that is to say, the English) Government shall dismiss no European official not a subject of the QUEEN. This, again, may seem literally unbelievable, but it is simply a formulation of widespread opinion with the aid of tolerably well-known fact. The rumourmongers have seen what Mr. GLADSTONE had not seen up to the rising of Parliament, that a multiple control in Egypt means a multiple control of England. As for the attempts at reassuring public opinion made by some Ministerialists, they may be dismissed almost without comment. The apologists have not understood the simple facts that if the pending negotiations were so harmless as they pretend, there could be no reason for secrecy about them, even if there were any reason for entering upon them at all.

Apart from the question of the negotiations Egyptian news continues to present the same monotonous and dreary record of confusion, intrigue, and disaster. Souakim, the scene of General GRAHAM's bootless expedition, is now seriously harassed, if not seriously attacked. The state of Upper Egypt is "alarming"; the state of Lower Egypt calamitous. It seems now to be generally admitted that, with the single exception of the Egyptian army, which has not yet been tried, every institution springing from the DUFFERIN scheme has been abandoned or has failed. Every one who was not besotted with political commonplaces, and who could read between the lines, could see that Lord DUFFERIN himself pretty clearly foresaw some such result. Except for the discredit it throws upon England, the failure is not perhaps matter of great sorrow. If the scheme had succeeded, it could not (to employ a contradiction of terms more apparent than real) have come to good; and if it had not been tried, the incurable faith of some English Liberals in the party nostrums would probably have led to its being tried some time or other. There is now nothing left except an anarchy which is every day becoming more intolerable, a more or le given in the Daily News by Mr. IRVING BISHOP. This genuine old English sportsman appears to think that pin-hunting and the detection of crime have something in common. As we understand Mr. BISHOP, his position is this—we must first catch a dynamitard. That is not always easy, though perhaps the Birmingham police have one or two under lock and key. Next we are to attach the dynamitard to Mr. BISHOP. Mr. BISHOP will then, by the exercise of his powers as a pin-hunter, hurry with the miscreant to the place where he has concealed his explosives. For success in this kind of detective work we fear it is necessary that the malefactor should kindly oblige by fixing his mind on his hidden materials. If he obstinately directs his attention to the Presidential election in America, the Manchester Cup, the prospects of the hay crop, or what not, then, we presume, Mr. BISHOP will not be so successful.

The meet at the Westminster Palace Hotel was duly held as advertised. There was a good deal of confusion and committee-meeting, and several gentlemen of the press made themselves conspicuous and had their names duly advertised. Mr. BISHOP then failed to find the number of a bank-note; but his failures were considered "highly "interesting." As the humblest of us can fail to find the number of a bank-note, it is pleasant to reflect that, as long as we have five pounds, this source of recreation and excitement is always open to us and our friends. If Mr. BISHOP is as clever as he thinks, a fortune is open to him in Italy. There an immoral Government weekly offers large rewards to any one who will read correctly the numbers that come out in the lottery.

Real sport began when Canon HARFORD thought of something outside the hotel. Mr. BISHOP now dressed in the traditional costume of the British pin-hunter or bust-hunter. His head was tied up in a black bag, his arm was attached by a copper wire to that of Canon HARFORD, and the pair ran out of doors and up and down the streets. Enemies of the Church (and who has not enemies?) must have been pained by the spectacle of this very canonical Canon spinning along at a merry pace, with a scent breast high, through street and court, in company with a person arrayed in evening dress and a black bag. It is by thus throwing themselves heartily into the amusements, however idiotic and puerile, of the people, that the clergy have acquired their remarkable hold over the working classes. Again, if we regard pin-hunting (and why not?) as a branch of psychical research, and carry our complaisance so far as to think psychical research a form of science, what can be more pleasing than to see the clergy in the van of progress, chevying pins and busts with Mr. DUNPHY and Mr. H. POTTINGER STEPHENS?

Mr. BISHOP jumped away on a false scent, and took Canon HARFORD to 5 Victoria Street, where the arrival of a clergyman, accompanied by an enthusiast in a black bag, must have alarmed the timid. After making a few casts in vain, Mr. BISHOP dragged his Canon into the library of the Society of Telegraph Engineers, where nobody wanted either of the sportsmen. Lastly, Mr. BISHOP placed his hands on a bust in this room, and the Canon admitted that this object was the one which had occupied his valuable thoughts. The hunt was now over, but some more attempts were made to read the numbers of bank-notes. Another meet was held for the purpose of testing Mr. CUMBERLAND'S powers of "muscle reading," and this entertainment, in which the object was the usual pin instead of the unusual bust, was not less successful than the sport shown by Mr. BISHOP.

We live in an uncommonly childish age. Our advice to householders intruded on by clergymen in black bags is to give the visitors in custody, and let them explain themselves to the police. They may be mere silly pin-hunters; they may be burglars taking advantage of the latest popular folly.

LORD SALISBURY AND MR. GOSCHEN.

BY a rather curious coincidence Lord SALISBURY and Mr. GOSCHEN have been heard almost together in important speeches several times of late. They are not in political agreement as far as party politics are concerned, but in not a few characteristics they are alike, and in others they are mutually complementary. Whatever Lord SALISBURY'S worst enemies may say of him, they will hardly accuse him of being given to gush or to cant; whatever those Radical-Liberals who are sorest at Mr. GOSCHEN'S candid criticism may say of him, they will hardly accuse him of being prone to fuss or to fad. Gush and cant, fuss and fad, these are the four main curses of English politics at the present day, and those who refuse and resist them, by whatever technical and nominal distinctions they may be separated, are in reality fighting the same battle, the battle of good government and good policy against bad policy and bad government. Both Lord SALISBURY and Mr. GOSCHEN have faults as practical politicians—faults which spring from a combination of the same intellectual superiority with different moral temperament. Lord SALISBURY often forgets the necessity of stooping a little to conquer a great deal, and the advisableness of humouring, or at any rate condescending to, the folly of fools. Mr. GOSCHEN'S constitutional timidity makes him occasionally prone rather to wash his hands of the madness of the people than to give the help of those hands in forcibly binding the madmen and keeping them from mischief. If, in the language of Euphuism, Lord SALISBURY and Mr. GOSCHEN could make a bargain on the terms "I will be your Valour and you "shall be my Discretion," the result would be admirable; but, even as it is, it is satisfactory that England possesses two public men, one of each party, whose theory of general politics is almost wholly sound, and their judgment on special points always independent and acute.

The greater part of Lord SALISBURY'S speech at Devonport on Wednesday (his subsequent speech on Thursday expressed a consistent theory of domestic policy, but, dealing almost wholly with the Franchise Bill, need not be handled here) necessarily dealt with Egypt, and it is unnecessary to follow it here in detail. But, if there were any finality in political disputes, it might be hoped that the Conservative leader's very clear and temperate exposition of the grounds on which the Opposition quarrel with the Government policy would put an end to the silly cavils which take the place of defence with Ministerial advocates. The Opposition have been charged with having no policy, and they have been charged with inconsistency in blaming such things as the bombardment of Alexandria and the slaughter of Teb and Tamasi while advocating a forward policy in Egypt generally. No one who combines political honesty with some intelligence and a little attention to the facts could possibly entertain these objections; but, unfortunately, it is possible in politics to make adroit use of the blind eye. In so far as the general policy of the Government has aimed at the establishment and retention of English supremacy in Egypt, it is good and to be approved; in so far as the particular acts of the Government have jeopardized that supremacy, or have been ill co-ordinated, or have in particular cases been unwisely designed and awkwardly executed, they are bad and to be disapproved. The distinction is not, one might have thought, so subtle that it should surprise or disgust admirers of Mr. GLADSTONE; while the subsequent reflection that, if all tales be true, the present policy of the Government is directly bent on the abandonment of our hold on Egypt makes the charge of factious criticism still more futile. But the point of most importance in Lord SALISBURY'S speech was not his exposition of the Egyptian question, nor his criticism of other political acts of the Ministry, but the clear and unhesitating manner in which he vindicated the necessity —the vital and absolute necessity—of an Imperial policy, as it is called; of "cultivating the garden," as it might be better phrased. The declared policy of many Radicals and of all Gladstonians pure and simple in respect of the foreign policy of England is that England has much goods laid up for many years, indeed almost more than she can manage, and that the sensible thing is to eat and drink and be merry with the remodelling of Constitutions and social systems, letting other nations prosecute their acquisitions as they best may. The policy which Lord SALISBURY formulated at Devonport, and which the great majority of Conservatives and a very considerable minority, perhaps more than a minority, of Liberals would approve, if the issue were laid before them as a matter of plain business, is directly the reverse of this. It is founded on the principle that national prosperity knows no stationary state; that a nation cannot be a mere rentier, a placid enjoyer of the dividends on the savings and gains of its forefathers; that the world and the good things of the world are to the active and the energetic; and that tinkering the franchise, and playing childish tricks with the management of private property, will never fill a single Englishman's mouth, and will probably leave several Englishmen's mouths with nothing to fill them. This, of course, is putting the thing in its hardest and least poetical form. There are plenty of other reasons for advancing, for holding high and steadily the banner of England; some of them more inspiriting by far to some people. But this reason at any rate is solid political rock; unshakable by argument, giving standing room to all comers, and admitting of any superstructure. If the enormous population which England has raised and sustained on a forward policy is to be kept in existence and in prosperity, English policy must still be forward. If England is to escape the fate of Venice and of Holland, she must avoid the mistakes by which scarcely less than by their intrinsic weakness Venice and Holland became insignificant. The Empire abroad is the livelihood no less than the glory of the kingdom at home.

The excellent speech which Mr. GOSCHEN made at Reading only belongs in appearance to a different order of subject, though, as has been said, Mr. GOSCHEN is not a political friend of Lord SALISBURY's, and though he has somewhat publicly declared his want of confidence in him. On the two most important questions of the present moment—Egypt and the Franchise Bill—there is probably not much difference between the opinion of the Conservative leader and the opinion of the most distinguished Liberal who uses his own judgment, and follows its dictates. And, far apart as the subjects of the two speeches now referred to may seem to be, they have in reality very close bonds of union. Statesmanship not confined to one political party has this principle, that it is as active as possible in foreign policy, and as little active as possible in domestic policy. One form, at least, of Radicalism avowedly contemns and dislikes foreign policy, and is perpetually meddling with domestic affairs. The one course of conduct is that of a householder and man of business who sees that his household goes on in orderly fashion, that the bills are properly examined and paid, the house kept in repair, and so on, but who devotes his main energies to managing his business relations outside the house; the other is the conduct of the man who lets his customers or his clients go elsewhere, resigns his just claims, neglects the progress of his lawsuits, and devotes his whole time to moving the furniture of the nursery into the drawing-room, turning the orchard into a garden, reducing the wages of the coachman and raising those of the housemaid, interfering with the governess, turning off the chaplain, lecturing the butler, and teaching the cook. These latter occupations are, it is true, more harmless than those of our Radicals who will still be doing; but they are not wholly unlike them. Now Mr. GOSCHEN's protest against State meddling is applicable to a good many other things besides Friendly Societies, just as his very pointed allusions to the Colonies and the Empire have a far wider reference than to the geographical distribution of Oddfellows' Lodges. Workingmen cannot make for themselves new markets abroad, protect those which exist from the encroachments of foreigners, occupy the vantage places of the earth to the forestalling of possible rivals, secure English trade and the English Empire by maintaining the position of England among nations. That is what Government must do for them, and what it exists for doing. But they can look after their own earnings and savings at home, and they need no Government to filch a little for them from the rich, to protect them here and there against their own folly or vice, to tempt them into useless and mischievous meddling with party politics.

ZULULAND.

THE coronation by the invaders of Zululand of CETEWAYO's son, DINIZULU, furnishes a mortifying comment on the policy of the English Government. The new KING is, of course, dependent on the adventurers to whom he owes his elevation; and it may be assumed that he has already recognized their title to the lands which they already occupy. The Boers who have exercised the highest of sovereign rights are not an organized or independent community. The Governments both of the Transvaal and of the Orange Free State have in the first instance censured the aggression, which they may perhaps nevertheless regard with tolerant complacency. The district which has been occupied by the Boer invaders is exactly or nearly the same which was formerly the subject of dispute between CETEWAYO and the Boers of the Transvaal. The conflicting claims were, by consent of both parties, referred to the English High Commissioner, who ultimately gave an award in favour of the Zulus. It happened by a disastrous fatality that between the announcement and the execution of the award the Government of the Transvaal was induced to transfer the dominions of the Republic to the English Crown. Sir BARTLE FRERE, who, having soon afterwards succeeded to the office of High Commissioner, was now a party to the litigation, construed the award of his predecessor as applicable only to territorial sovereignty, and not to proprietary rights. The Boers, who had taken possession of the debated lands, were consequently confirmed in their occupancy; and if the patrons of DINIZULU are the same persons, they may establish a plausible claim to their former property. The unexpected, and probably unintelligible, interpretation of the award was the main cause of CETEWAYO's alienation from the English interest. His formidable military force had been organized in the expectation of hostilities with the Transvaal; but he now found that his enemies had become English subjects, and that, at the same time, he was deprived of the fruits of a regular and legal judgment. Having converted a friendly potentate into an antagonist, Sir BARTLE FRERE thought it prudent to anticipate a not improbable attack. There is no doubt that he was cordially supported by the public opinion of the English population of South Africa; and after the victory at Ulundi his policy appeared to be justified by success.

If the English Government had then declared a protectorate in Zululand, the subsequent anarchy and bloodshed, with much loss and discredit, might have been averted. The Zulus themselves appear to have regarded the previously reigning dynasty as the product and symbol of the military organization which was shattered at Ulundi. CETEWAYO as a prisoner and an exile had therefore no hold on the loyalty of his former subjects; and the chiefs who succeeded to fractions of his power would lose nothing by acknowledged allegiance to England. The modern prejudice against the extension of Imperial responsibility deterred the Government from assenting to the more or less direct annexation which was recommended by Sir BARTLE FRERE and by almost all competent authorities. The division of the country into thirteen provinces, under as many petty chiefs, was perhaps the best alternative for simple annexation. The Zulus, being naturally intelligent, doubted the sincerity of self-denying professions, and took it for granted that the provincial chiefs would be controlled and protected by the Power which had brought them into existence. If their reasonable expectations had not been disappointed, the petty quarrels among some of the chiefs would have been from time to time adjusted without resort to arms. Repeated experience has proved that it is cheaper and more convenient to manage warlike barbarians as subjects than as nominally independent neighbours. The rough-and-ready arrangement which was effected by Sir GARNET WOLSELEY might have been tolerable, and, if not permanent, at least moderately durable, but for a sentimental agitation which was directed to the restoration of CETEWAYO. He had been harshly treated, and the gallant defence of his kingdom could not be punished or resented as a crime; but the interests of the Zulus had become irreconcilable with his own. No politician could have anticipated that an English Minister would be found to receive a dethroned savage as an interesting pretender, and then, with romantic sympathy, to restore him to his throne. Sir HENRY BULWER, the experienced and judicious Governor of Natal, urged upon his superiors the expediency of securing a retreat for the chiefs who were to be capriciously dispossessed in a territory to be reserved for the purpose. Lord KIMBERLEY, apparently for the purpose of thwarting a too zealous subordinate, drew his pen through the middle of the district which Sir HENRY BULWER had marked for the proposed Reserve on the map. It is in this diminished space that JOHN DUNN and other loyal chiefs have taken refuge under the protection of an English Resident. But for Lord KIMBERLEY's arbitrary interference, nearly half of Zululand would now enjoy the benefits which might well have been extended to the whole.

The Boer adventurers have not hesitated to appropriate supreme authority, as it has dropped from the nerveless hands which now administer a once vigorous Empire. It seems that they have effected at least a temporary reconciliation among the native belligerents. But USIBEPU and OHAM were represented at the ceremony which accompanied the re-establishment of the dynasty of PANDA in a mutilated and dependent kingdom. Many years ago an English agent exercised at the coronation of CETEWAYO the right of investiture which is now assumed without dispute by a voluntary gathering of settlers from the Transvaal. The new KING, or those who control his policy, may probably think it prudent to discontinue the menaces and occasional incursions which have placed the English RESIDENT on the defensive in the Reserve. Although the rule of hereditary succession is but capriciously observed among the natives of South Africa, there is no reason for objecting to the elevation of CETEWAYO'S son, except that he derives his title from the choice of lawless usurpers. If he keeps the peace, he will probably be recognized, after a reasonable delay, by the Imperial and local authorities. In the probable contingency of a revival of the struggle with the KING'S uncle OHAM and with his rival USIBEPU, the Boers will probably find an opportunity of occupying additional territory as a reward of intervention on one side or the other. According to their own convenience, the new settlers will either retain their political connexion with the Transvaal or set up a little Republic of their own, in accordance with the Stellaland precedent. Any attempt on the part of DINIZULU to restore the warlike organization which made his ancestors formidable will be summarily and sternly repressed by his new patrons; nor would such an experiment be regarded with favour by the English colonists. It is true that CETEWAYO during the height of his power always maintained friendly relations with the Government of Natal; but it is possible that his successor might rather incline to alliance with the Boers. Within a few years the military and political reputation of England in South Africa has been gravely impaired, and it is possible that native chiefs may exaggerate the decadence which better-informed politicians attribute to Cabinets at home, and not to provincial administrators.

The report that one of the ablest and most loyal officers of the Crown has tendered his resignation may possibly not be confirmed; but Sir HENRY BULWER has by a long course of public service fairly earned promotion. As Lieutenant-Governor of Natal he steadily protested against Sir BARTLE FRERE'S warlike policy; but he is not one of the pedants who regulate their conduct after the close of a war with exclusive reference to the original merits of the quarrel. When the Zulu dynasty was overthrown, Sir HENRY BULWER seems to have agreed with Sir BARTLE FRERE in the opinion that some kind of English Protectorate should be substituted for the despotism of CETEWAYO. The determination of the Home Government to reverse Sir BARTLE FRERE'S policy at all points must since have caused incessant trouble and anxiety to its unwilling agent. It would have been equitable, and perhaps it might have been safe, to avoid a collision with the Zulu King; but neither expediency nor justice required that no advantage should be taken of his fall. Soon after the end of the war Sir HENRY BULWER called the attention of the Colonial Office to the intrigues of officious philanthropists for the restoration of CETEWAYO. He must afterwards have been greatly surprised at the conversion of Downing Street to the sentimental theories of Bishopstowe; but he had perhaps become habituated to the rejection of his advice, when his proposed frontier line was capriciously shifted to the South. In the midst of danger and dishonour, arising from blind timidity, there is some consolation in the fact that English civilians and soldiers, removed from the influence of constituencies and Caucuses, are not inferior in capacity or courage to their predecessors. It was against the advice of the Commander of the forces that Mr. GLADSTONE capitulated to the insurgent Boers. The restoration of CETEWAYO was not recommended by a single competent and responsible advisor on the spot. It may also be observed that colonists who are exposed to the aggressions of savage tribes or of civilized neighbours seldom fail to urge on the Imperial Government an active and vigilant policy. The Australian Governments and Legislatures almost openly advocate the establishment of a MONROE doctrine in the South Pacific. The English inhabitants of South Africa for the most part approved of the Zulu war, notwithstanding the trivial nature of the alleged provocation. All the colonies from the Cape to Natal publicly express their regret for the death of Sir BARTLE FRERE, who was studiously neglected and disparaged by the dominant party in England. He may have made mistakes; but he was right in his fundamental conviction that the Empire would be best maintained by the bold and energetic policy to which it owes its existence. It is easy to sneer at a supposed devotion to "gunpowder and glory." If gunpowder means force and readiness to use it, the effect which it produces is with few exceptions pacific. "Glory" is not an ordinary English motive, and it assuredly had no influence on such a career as that of Sir BARTLE FRERE. Inglorious avoidance of responsibility is almost always dangerous.

M. RENAN'S MISSAL.

"THIS merriment of parsons," said Dr. JOHNSON, "is "mighty offensive." The Doctor, had he lived in our time, would probably have found something very distasteful in this piety of unbelievers. That a man should reject the doctrine of Christianity is his own affair; that he should regret and admire what he can no longer believe is very natural, for our instincts and sentiments endure after our opinions have altered. But when a sceptic continues to cherish, as poetical bric-à-brac, the notions which he declares to be false, and fondles the mysteries of religion as a China-maniac fondles Nankin porcelain, his conduct should be equally repulsive to believers and to people who, in losing their faith, have not lost the elements of good taste. Again to quote Dr. JOHNSON, SAINTE-BEUVE "could not think how "poor a figure he cut" when, in later life and in his letters, he explained the nature of his own new Christianity. He assumed his airs of being not far from the Kingdom, and of sentimental devotion, because he found that it made him acceptable to women, and, in his own words, "enabled him "to spin the thread of a more sentimental love affair." The love affairs of SAINTE-BEUVE were at no time pleasant to contemplate, and it is difficult to think of his confession without disgust.

Another queer unholy pose of sham piety and philandering religiousness has just been struck by M. ERNEST RENAN, in the preface to his new book Nouvelles Etudes d'Histoire Religieuse. We confess that M. RENAN'S devoutness has never been to our taste. There was some truth in the picture M. VEUILLOT drew of this priestly author, "with his pockets "still stuffed with ecclesiastical candle-ends." M. RENAN has tried, by no means unsuccessfully, to eat his cake and have it. He has revelled in the sentiment of religion, and got all the spiritual enjoyment that can be extracted from the most unctuous unction, without enduring one featherweight of the burdens of faith. Many people like to follow M. RENAN in his sentimental musings, and listen with pleasure to the church bells that chime in his emotional breast, like the bells of the city of Caer Is beneath the sea. To other minds good straightforward profanity seems a great deal less unpleasant, and they would rather laugh with VOLTAIRE than sigh and turn up their fine eyes with M. ERNEST RENAN.

In his new volume M. RENAN adopts almost SAINTE-BEUVE'S mixture of amorousness and true religion. If a French writer wishes to be popular, he must keep introducing women, in place and out of place. M. RENAN is a St. ANTHONY who does not resist the tempter, nor banish the beguiling siren from his thoughts in the hour of prayer and contemplation. Nay, M. RENAN rather presents himself as the tempter, and would fain insinuate his captivating personality before fair saints in their holiest moments. M. RENAN'S ambition is to compile a kind of Missal. He envies the fortunes of that work, and why? Because "choice beings press it with a fervent hand, and" (sly dog, M. RENAN) because they "sometimes bear it to their "lips." The lines of the Missal are lines "on which many "charming eyes are fixed." The volume has "the inestim-"able privilege of riveting the undivided gaze of a woman "at the moment that she believes herself alone with her "Creator." In the person of a good little book of his own pious fashioning M. RENAN would like to make a third in this company; he would enjoy being "borne to the lips" of the fair and "riveting their undivided gaze." "My "highest ambition would be satisfied if I could hope, upon "my death, to enter the Church under the form of a little "volume bound in black morocco, to be held between the "long tapering fingers of a finely gloved hand."

The most ferocious critic and satirist could not have more finely and happily hit off the characteristics of M. RENAN'S devotion. It is inextricably intertwined with his liking for fine eyes, fervent clasps, long tapering fingers, and finely gloved hands. This religiousness of sunsets, rose-colour, fine writing, and gloves is an eminently respectable form of the worship of Mr. MATTHEW ARNOLD'S great Goddess of France. There is, happily, a kind of brutal humour in Englishmen which preserves them, as a rule, from joining the Church of the Quartier Bréda, and worshipping saints arrayed by M. WORTH. M. RENAN is not likely, even if ever he publishes his amateur Missal, to glitter in black morocco among the devotions of our women, whom his peculiar piety can scarcely tempt. One of them might answer him, as DORINE replied to TARTUFE, "Mais à convoiter, "moi, je ne suis pas si prompte," and aver that, even in black morocco, M. RENAN "ne me tenterait pas."

MOROCCO.

UNLESS all the preliminary signs are completely untrustworthy for the first time, the legitimate interests of France are again about to be defended by another extension of French territory. M. ORDEGA has had a question with the Emperor of MOROCCO. They have fallen out and made it up again about the nationality of the Shereef of WAZAN. The upshot of it all is that the EMPEROR has had to yield; and M. ORDEGA, who had come home flaming with patriotic indignation, is on his way back triumphant, while a French squadron is, it seems, to be sent to cruise off Tangier, to make the Maroquins bethink themselves. It is only surprising that some business of this kind did not happen before; and, unless the nature of things has suddenly changed, it will not end here. For many years Morocco has been a kind of Turkey on a small scale. It has escaped being swallowed by France because Spain has guarded it as a preserve for its hunting some day, when CHARLES V. comes back from the grave, and because England has been vigilant not to allow an unpleasantly strong Power to approach Gibraltar. For various reasons France has not thought it worth while to quarrel with Spain for a long while past; and England gave all the world to understand so plainly that it meant what it said in 1859 that Morocco has stumbled along on its old barbarous courses in peace since LEOPOLD O'DONNELL took a Spanish army to Tetuan, and then marched back again by order of Lord JOHN RUSSELL. This sort of security is notoriously fragile. It depends on the pertinacity of the three dogs who sit watching to see that none of them gets into the manger. Now, for reasons philanthropic, liberal, and Egyptian, one of the dogs shows signs of not caring, or not being able to prevent, what may happen. Of the other two, one is a big and pugnacious beast; the second would be pugnacious if it dared, but it is very little. If they are left to settle it between them, it will be one of the most astonishing things ever seen in the political world if the former does not walk in and take possession. The barking of the little dog will be loud and angry, but its bite is not to be feared.

The merits of M. ORDEGA'S quarrel with the dread EMPEROR are obscure in detail, but clear enough as to the main issue. Morocco borders on Algeria, and is full of barbarous tribes very fond of fighting and of booty, and also very fanatical Mahometans in a slightly heretical way. The EMPEROR has no control to speak of over his unruly subjects, and accordingly they are addicted to raiding over the French border. Now there is a potentate called the Shereef of WAZAN, who is a descendant of the Prophet, and exercises great influence over these pious moss-troopers. He acts, it seems, as a species of Warden of the Marches to the EMPEROR, and has done the French some service in keeping the raiders in order. To reward him for this M. ORDEGA has granted him the protection of France, which of course extends to his family and followers. Hence has arisen the quarrel with the EMPEROR. By a treaty made at Madrid barely two years ago, European Powers are entitled to extend their protection to a limited number of Maroquins who have rendered them services. It was never supposed that the protection was to be given to the head of a confederation of tribes occupying an important part of the EMPEROR'S territory, but then neither does there seem to have been any stipulation that it should not. France is therefore technically in the right, and if it has broken the spirit of its own engagements, that is only in keeping with its usual diplomatic methods, and should have been foreseen. There are the usual stories of bastinadoings, drownings in boiling water, and killings by poison. The correspondent of the Standard, who told his version of the story on Tuesday, asked his readers not to think that he had taken his facts out of the Arabian Nights. That was an unnecessary precaution. He told of nothing which is not a commonplace of Oriental justice and Oriental intrigue. Whether it was technically justified or not, the fact remains that France, by giving protection to the Shereef of WAZAN, has practically extended its sovereignty over a considerable part of Morocco. The step has perhaps been hastened by the discovery that Italy has been carrying on intrigues of precisely the same nature in the same region. It is the first measure taken to prepare the way for a general protectorate. It is also, and that is by far the most serious aspect of the affair, a part of that general policy of aggression on which France has re-entered within the last two years. Neighbouring nations have one more warning that whenever an opportunity presents itself for extending the influence of their country, French diplomatists and statesmen at once throw aside every other consideration and escape from their own engagements by any chicane. There ought to be no need for a repetition of the lesson now, but, if it was wanted, there it is for the guidance of whoever has any dealings with the Republic elsewhere.

UNDERGROUND LONDON.

IN the Standard of Tuesday last appeared a letter bearing the title given above. The writer, the Reverend D. RICE-JONES, dates his letter from St. Giles-in-the-Fields. Other letters bearing on the same subject have also appeared in the same journal and elsewhere, confirming what is known to all who have with their own eyes looked seriously into the condition of the poor, both in London and in other of our large towns. Yet Mr. RICE-JONES can say with absolute truth that the facts he states "are little known, even "among those who are interested in the condition of the "London poor." It is one thing to be "interested," as is just now the fashion, in their state; it is quite another thing to see a practical remedy for the evils under which they suffer. Many of those who now go to see the dwellings of the poor in the East End of London are moved by exactly the same curiosity which led people to go and see the embarkation of Jumbo, or which leads people to go and see the excellent exhibition of wild beasts on sale at the establishment of Mr. JAMRACH. The picture which Mr. RICE-JONES draws is as true as it is sad. The question is often and rightly put, how we can provide the poor with better dwellings. But there remains another question, how we can house that large class of persons who have no homes at all, however bad. "The truth," as he accurately puts it, "is that many of them are "real outcasts. They have been cast out of the only "homes they ever had by their own fathers, not necessarily "for misconduct, but simply because they were felt to be "encumbrances." These children, as he goes on to show, have not even the advantages which sometimes fall to the lot of orphans. Benevolent people are often ready to spend money and take trouble for the sake of those who have no natural protectors. But when the parents are alive and able, if sober and industrious, to take charge of the children, the case of such poor outcasts is far worse than if they were fatherless and motherless. No sensible man, however open-handed, will readily give money for the support of those who both morally and legally ought to be supported by others able to do so. The sins of the parents are thus most cruelly visited on the children; and the mere fact that the parents continue to live, and do not either die, abscond, commit suicide, get into prison for a long term, emigrate, or somehow make themselves invisible, is the one which stands in the way of the children's good. But they keep alive on such wages as they can earn, and turn the children adrift. The life of the father or mother thus means in nearly all cases the moral ruin of the child. If the child struggles, in spite of all adverse circumstances, into a respectable position, the father or mother, made worse by age and confirmed ill habits, come upon him for support, and may often succeed in dragging him back into the abyss out of which he has succeeded in climbing. But the chance is infinitesimal that he ever wins his way to respectability. He becomes a street wanderer, and in those years of his life in which the character and habits are formed lives, not even in decent garrets, but in ownerless cellars, or under the arches of bridges, or in rotten tenements where his non-human bedfellows are rats, pigs, and vermin.

There is a large class of children growing up among us who live as we have described. There is a far larger class who are growing up in a way little better. The School Board, which was to have wrought such wonders, has not met, and cannot meet, such evils. Mr. RICE-JONES says:—"One of the most hopeless gamins I know—"a boy who, if he did not look so young, might well be "taken for the Artful Dodger come to life again—has "passed the Fifth Standard, and snaps his fingers with "impunity at the School Board officers. And there "are hundreds like him. Those boys have a literature "of their own—a literature which panders to the vilest "tastes, and boldly advocates the most extreme doctrines "of Communism." This is also true; and it would be indeed wonderful if literature of any better kind could appeal to these forlorn outcasts. All of them who are intelligent are, as they grow up, but too likely to look on society, according to their temperaments, either as a tyrant on whom to be revenged, or as a wealthy fool to be robbed. With a view to correct these evils, Mr. RICE-JONES urges, as others have done before him, that cultivated men should go to the East End, live there, and freely mix with those classes whose special home the East End is. We should be glad to see this done, whether by Oxford men, Cambridge men, or by any of the young men now living in the neighbourhood of Pall Mall who "belong," according to Mr. RICE-JONES, "to the upper classes who have nothing to do." They could hardly employ their leisure better than in proving to the ignorant the truth that the interests of the rich and the poor are not antagonistic, and by showing in their lives the common bond of humanity which ought to unite all sorts and conditions of men.

That much good may be done in such ways we do not doubt, and the good when done will be reciprocal. The "young men who have nothing to do in the neighbourhood "of Pall Mall" are not all of them refreshing specimens of mankind. Many persons might even prefer the society of a street arab to that of some among them. But there is undoubtedly now a widespread desire in the cultivated classes in England to aid those classes on whom fortune has not smiled. Putting aside all that may be due to the many forms of a fanciful philanthropy, there remains an abundance of genuine, modest, practical zeal ready to be used in this cause. The question arises how this zeal can be best employed. Suppose a young graduate of Oxford or Cambridge, or one of the young men who live in the neighbourhood of Pall Mall and who have nothing to do, were to go among the poor in the East-End, he would soon find specimens of two classes among them. He would find, to take an example, a capable and industrious foreman in a manufactory from whom he would assuredly learn more than he could teach. And he would find men and women so hardened in vice that nothing which he could say or do would make the least permanent impression on them. It is the latter class in England who offer the real and difficult problem. How are we to save those who seem past saving; those whose confirmed habits of evil seem to make precept, example, and self-interest all alike unavailing?

As a class, it must be confessed by all practical people that there is no hope for them. Some few may be reclaimed; some few may be bettered; but the mass will spend the second half of their lives as they did the first. But, though this is unhappily the case with those who are grown up, it is not so with their children. There only lies any true solution of the difficulty. Sever the children from their parents and former associations, educate them for a time, and then transplant them to those colonies where they will have a future, and where, even as children, they are welcomed from the mother-country. The only evil of emigration is, that in many cases it is just the most capable and enterprising men—those whom we most wish to keep at home—who leave us. The class which we want to get rid of has not the energy to begin a new life in a new country. The parent is past help, and the child, if left to his care, grows up like him. But, though the parent is a nuisance alike in England and in the Colonies, the child, though sure, if he grows up, to be a nuisance here, can be turned into the most valuable of colonists. The attempts hitherto made in this direction have shown it to be for the present the true line to work upon. The child is removed—the earlier the better—from the influence of the parents, is trained for a few months or a year (or, in special cases, for a longer period) in decent and orderly habits, and can then be taken out to Canada, and adopted or apprenticed to those who are only too glad to receive him. Both the people and the Government of the Dominion combine to aid those in England who are engaged in carrying out this work, which (small at present) is certain of a great future. It is not in London only that it is being carried out. In Birmingham, for instance, a gentleman has for ten years been engaged upon it. Devoting his whole time to the work, he has extricated from the criminal classes some eight hundred children, has trained them, has transplanted and settled them in Canada, where, with a very few exceptions, they are all doing well. His work is aided by the Canadian Government, and children who in England would certainly have turned out for the most part criminals are there prosperous and successful. In the case we mention the gentleman has given his attention almost exclusively to the children of the lowest and vilest classes, of whom some are now thriving men of property in Canada. The mature criminal, except in rare cases, cannot be greatly bettered. But the legacy of evil which, in his children, he leaves to England we can turn into a legacy of good for our Colonies. [illegible] children, rightly and wisely trained here, are, as experience shows, welcome and desirable colonists; and it is just in the fact that while they are still young the ocean is put between them and their old associations that the success of this method of emigration depends. We wish every good fortune to those young men who may go and labour for the benefit of East London; and we trust that their good intentions may not be frustrated by mistaken methods. But to meet the evil suggested by our title, and which prevails in all our large towns as well as in London, we can see no better remedy than that which we have suggested, and which already has been tried with signal success. We may hope that Town Councils and Parliament will think it worthy of serious discussion.

"THE HOUSE" AND THE HOUSE.

THE House of Commons does not belong to that rare class of holiday-makers who usually show to an advantage after an "outing." In too many cases it returns to its duties not refreshed, but apparently used up; and the first night after a recess is commonly remarkable either for the languor or for the ill-temper of the reunited Assembly. Everything, however, has its compensations, and if too many members come back from their holiday in a mood not conducive to the progress of public business, there are many more who are good enough to facilitate it by not putting in an appearance at all. A House which may be very willing to "play," and not very unwilling to wrangle, requires the support of members to get up a diversion of either kind; and in the absence of this support, if a judicious Government happens to have put down Supply for one of these first nights, they may hope to score what Ministers in our constitutional country regard as the greatest of triumphs—namely, the obtaining of a maximum of the national money at the cost of a minimum of criticism on the part of the nation's representatives. Their success in this respect last Thursday night was not so splendid as it has sometimes been, but it was respectable. The House got through over twenty of the votes on the Civil Service Estimates, to the tune of a good many hundred thousand pounds; and, in the absence of some of the most noted performers on the Irish benches, the business of the night was conducted without the interchange of any violently abusive language.

If traces of the late recess can be said to have displayed themselves anywhere, it was in the easy "lounging-coat" species of discussion which took place on that familiar subject "the accommodation of the House." It must be admitted, however, that the natural attractions of such a topic were, under the circumstances, considerable. There were not much more than a hundred members present even at question-time; their numbers underwent the usual reduction of from a half to two-thirds upon the SPEAKER leaving the chair. To rise, therefore, from a solitary seat on the deserted benches and gravely discuss the question whether the accommodation of the House was adequate must have felt to many members almost like a prolongation of their holiday. There was the same delicious sense of futility about it which constitutes the charm of flinging pebbles into the sea. Nor is there any knowing how long the handful might have persevered in their indignant demand for elbow-room, if the LORD MAYOR—like one of those practical men who interrupt pebble-throwing at the seaside with politics—had not interposed with a matter-of-fact reference to "the present condition of the benches on "both sides of the House." The grievance in question, he went on to observe with relentless common sense, is only felt at the beginning of a new Parliament. This is undoubtedly so. In a new Parliament members come up keen to their work, full of noble ambitions and of zeal for the public service, and fondly imagining that, save for the brief intervals of absence required by the needs of food and sleep, they will literally live in the House to which their respected constituents have returned them. Upon them, as upon other youthful illusions, Time soon lays [illegible] cynic hand; and hence it comes about that, as Parliament grows older, a large contingent of its members become less concerned about the insufficiency of the accommodation provided for them, rightly judging that it is not worth troubling themselves about their seats during the few hours per week which will constitute the average duration of their attendance. After all, it does not much matter where one sits to listen to Lord Edmund Fitzmaurice on Central Asian geography; and Mr. Gladstone, on the "progress of negotiations," loses none of his interest as an intellectual study even for a hearer who is content to stand at the bar. As to Mr. Bradlaugh, due notice has always been given of each repetition of his celebrated conjuring performances at the table, and seats can in such cases be engaged beforehand. The idle member soon ceases, in short, to concern himself about the question of seats; and the House, as the Lord Mayor contended, may well, therefore, confine its consideration to the actual requirements of its really working members; which, he went on to argue, are sufficiently consulted already.

No doubt, however, it will be replied by those who are determined to give "le mieux" a fair field for its hostility to "le bien," that what the accommodation of the House does already should be done, and "the other not left undone." There should be room enough, these captious persons insist, for all the members of the House to take their seats there at once, and the working members would do their work none the worse if this condition were fulfilled. The sight of a few more empty benches during the time of real "business" would not depress the energies of men who, by the hypothesis, are superior to such discouragements. Nor would it be easy to contest this view of the case if it were merely a question of providing additional seats. But seats in the House, unlike greatness and goodness in Coleridge's stately lines, are means and not ends. They are intended to enable their occupants to employ their eyes and ears from a position of bodily ease; and in only a limited number of the existing seats can this be done. To increase them by the addition of others which must necessarily be in still worse positions would be merely suggesting fresh subjects of discontent. It would be the thin end of the wedge. Members newly provided with seats would next be demanding to see and hear; and it would then be useless to remind them that these are exceptional privileges even in the House as at present arranged, and that those who are anxious to secure them on any great occasion are accustomed even now to ascend in considerable numbers to the side galleries. It is even possible that, not content with the demand for the opportunities of seeing and hearing from any part of the floor of the House, we should have many members putting forward the much more formidable claim for facilities of speech from the new seats provided for them; and, unless the instinct of self-preservation should operate promptly for their suppression, we might as well go in for the "tribune" system at once. The truth, of course, is that, though acoustic requirements might doubtless be more adequately met in the present House of Commons than they are, the Chamber itself is not, and could not by anything short of a complete transformation of plan, be made a suitable place either for displays of oratory or for listening to them. There are not more than fifty seats in the House, including those on the Treasury and front Opposition benches, from which the Assembly can be addressed with combined comfort and effect; and, if one of the very best of these has fallen by good fortune to the lot of Lord Randolph Churchill, its counterpart on the opposite side of the House is occupied, en revanche, by Mr. Dillwyn. The number of seats from which a speaker can be seen and heard with ease and comfort is, of course, much larger; but, relatively to the whole, it is still but small. Nor, as we have said, could any mere enlargement of the House on its existing plan do anything to reduce the evil, if it be one. The "theatral" arrangement of a house of assembly is the only one which will satisfy the needs of orator and listeners alike. On the other hand, the plan of the House of Commons is infinitely better adapted to the "transaction of business," as distinct from the display of eloquence; and these are certainly not days in which the former of these considerations should be sacrificed to the latter.

PUBLISHING ON COMMISSION.

We find that in representing Mr. Besant last week as advising young authors unconditionally against publishing novels on commission we misrepresented him. Mr. Besant's real warning was, it seems, directed against publishing on the terms of paying a sum of money down beforehand to the publisher. There is, no doubt, a considerable difference between the two systems. On the commission system (which, it seems, Mr. Besant did not mention at all) the publisher at any rate takes his risk of great or small profit, according to the greater or less success of the book. On the other, the publisher practically declares that the risk is a certainty of loss, and that he declines to face it in any way unless covered. That is to say, the expert most interested in the matter and best qualified to judge prophesies failure.

BANJO AND BONES.

"I HAVE a reasonable good ear in music," remarks that typical amateur actor, Bottom the Weaver; "let's have the tongs and the bones." The tongs, though not obsolete, are now something archaic, but masters of the noisy art and mystery of bone-playing are still to be found disguised in black and set over against masters of the more dulcet tambourine, at the opposite ends of the semi-circle of sable performers known to the world at large as negro minstrels. It is, perhaps, more accurate to confess at once that the negro minstrel is practically known and loved only in those parts of the world where the English language is spoken. The burnt-cork opera of the Christy Minstrel is appreciated only in Great Britain, in Greater Britain, and in the United States of America—where, in fact, it had its rise some two score years ago. Where the English language is not spoken, the grotesque verbal dislocations of Brudder Bones somehow fail of their reward. Indeed nothing can be more humorously pathetic than the dignified and reserved attitude of the audience in a Parisian café chantant—the Alcazar or the Ambassadeurs in summer or the Eldorado in winter—when a pair of blacked-up and hopelessly h-less Cockneys are attempting an exact imitation of the sayings and doings of the American plantation negro, studied by them at secondhand from some Irish-American performer who had probably never in his life seen a cotton-field or a sugar-house. And the estate of the Germans is yet less gracious than that of the Frenchman; there is even a legend in circulation setting forth the absolute failure of an enterprising American manager's attempt to invade Germany with a resolute band of negro minstrels, in consequence of the perspicacity of the German critics in detecting the fraud of trying to pass off as negroes white men artificially blackened! Obviously, the imitation darkey of the negro-minstrel stage did not coincide with the genuine darkey as evolved from the Teutonic inner consciousness. Probably the German critics would have objected even to the conscientious display of misplaced zeal which it was our good fortune once to behold in America. At the huge summer hotels which make Saratoga one of the brightest and gayest of American watering-places, the attendants in the dining-rooms are generally negroes, varying in hue from the ebony of the full-blooded black to the tawny ivory of the octoroon. The waiters of one of these hotels sometimes obtain permission to give "a minstrel show" in the dining-room, to which the amused "guests" of the hotel are admitted for a price. It was one of these minstrel shows, given at a Saratoga hotel three summers ago by genuine darkeys, that we were privileged to attend; and when the curtains were drawn aside, discovering the row of sable performers, it was perceived to the great and abiding joy of the spectators that the musicians were all of a uniform darkness of hue, and that they, genuine negroes as they were, had "blacked up" the more closely to resemble the professional negro minstrels.

This personal experience is valuable in so far as it may show how firm is the rule of convention in theatrical circles, and how the accepted type comes in time to seem preferable to the real thing. It is useful also in suggesting that the negro minstrel is getting to be a law unto himself, and ceasing to be an imitator of the exact facts of plantation life. In the beginning of negro minstrelsy, when the first band of "Ethiopian Serenaders," as they were then called, came into existence, its sole excuse for being was that it endeavoured to reproduce the life of the plantation darkey. The songs sung by the early Ethiopian Serenaders, before the original E. P. Christy or his nephew, the late George Christy, came into prominence, were reminiscences of songs heard where the negro was at work, on the river steamboat, in the sugar-field, or at the camp-meeting—the hardest kind of labour to a negro was religion. These songs retained the flavour of slave life, with all its pathos, its yearning, its hopelessness, its mournfulness. To this period belongs Stephen C. Foster, who remains to this day the most truly American of all American composers. As the slave songs are the only indigenous tunes which America has produced, Foster availed himself of hints from them, and he borrowed from wandering negroes both the themes and the method of some of his best songs. The typical song of this period is "The Old Folks at Home," with its wailing refrain and its suggestion of unutterable longing. The actual melodies of the plantation slave have been made known to European critics by the various wandering bands of Jubilee Singers, who have travelled the world over singing their rude and effective hymns. Some of their songs have been borrowed by Mr. Sankey, and others, as we have said, have been taken by the negro minstrels. Their full beauty will not be recognized generally until America shall bring forth a composer with imagination enough and with skill enough to do for these rich themes what has already been done so brilliantly and so effectively for the folk-songs of Hungary and of Scandinavia.

The first negro-minstrel company was organized in 1843, and it consisted of four performers, who had each appeared singly as impersonators of the plantation negro. One of the original four, D. D. Emmett, who still survives, was the composer of "Dixie," which afterwards became the battle-song of the Southern Confederacy. In the beginning these performers gave their concert as an interlude between two plays in a regular theatre. The popularity of the new entertainment led to its expansion, until it could fill the bill of an entire evening's amusement. It was at a very early stage in its career that the programme of a negro-minstrel performance fell into three divisions—the "first part," the "olio," and the after-piece. The "first part" retains its name to the present day; it is the portion of the entertainment provided by a single row of negro minstrels seated on chairs, with the grave "Interlocutor" in the centre, while at the ends are Bones and Tambo, the "end-men," who are known in England, oddly enough, as the "corner-men." This row of negro minstrels consisted at first of four, but it gradually expanded to twenty, until the great Mr. Haverly suddenly declared that he had "forty—count them—forty." In the performances now given at Drury Lane Theatre by Mr. Haverly's Mastodon Minstrels—and the name is not ill chosen, for some of the merry jests retailed by Mr. Haverly's comedians are surely as old as the mastodon and the mammoth—there are nearly sixty performers visible, line upon line, rising in tiers nearly to the ilies. On the wings of this sable array are a score of end-men with tambourines and with bones; while the star end-men, the chief comedians, are so many and so important that they appear in relays, one replacing the other. This, of course, is a doing of things on a large scale, and certainly it succeeds in breaking up the monotony of a single line of performers quite as effectually as did the New York minstrel manager who scattered the actors in his "first part" through a handsomely furnished drawing-room in a vain effort to make the entertainment appear in the semblance of an evening party. The second part of a minstrel show is the "olio"—and this is only a variety entertainment, of banjo-playing, clog-dancing, and the like, by imitation negroes. Occasionally one of the sketches now and again performed really recalls the actual negro, notably the little charcoal outline of the "Watermelon Man" as presented by Mr. McAndrews. But in general the "olio" is as far away from the actual facts of plantation life as the first part; and when we say that two of Mr. Haverly's Mastodon Minstrels are sufficiently conscience-less to sing Irish comic songs, the full extent of this decadence is made visible. And, in like manner, the after-piece, which once attempted to reproduce dramatically the mingled simplicity and cunning of the negro, is now a parody of a popular play, a burlesque opera, or any other comic drama as far removed as possible from the ken of the dwellers on the old plantation. Nowadays any kind of a farce may be performed as an afterpiece. We have seen, with much amusement, a broadly comic play called the Great Sheep Case, in which we recognized a blackened perversion of the Village Lawyer, a farce of Garrick's day; and we happened to know that the Village Lawyer was a free rendering of D'Avocat Pathelin of Brueys and Palaprat, which in turn was a modernization of Pathelin, one of the oldest surviving farces of the French stage.

The entertainment now offered at Drury Lane Theatre by Mr. Haverly's American and European Mastodon Minstrels is emphatically a Big Thing after the most approved fashion of American Big Things. Mr. Haverly is, plainly enough, a manager with Napoleonic conceptions, worthy of comparison with those of the mysterious and mighty Mr. Barnum, whose Own and Only Greatest Show on Earth is hardly more astounding or more kaleidoscopic than this sable exhibition of Mr. Haverly's. We incline to think that Mr. Barnum's show is scarcely more unlike the primitive circus than Mr. Haverly's Minstrels are unlike the original Ethiopian Serenaders. And Mr. Haverly has a full share of the sublime self-confidence and of the marvellous knowledge of effect which combine to make Mr. Barnum what he is—one of the wonders of the world, far more remarkable and better worth the full price of admission than any of the Living Curiosities gathered into his Ethnological Congress. From the first part of Mr. Haverly's programme to the last part everything is done on a grand scale; there are six eminent end-men appearing in pairs in relays; there are eighteen other exponents of the bones and the tambourine; there are about sixty performers on the stage at once; there are sand-dances by a sextet of agile and ebony operators, and clog-dances by a score of glittering and airy apparitions, who appear in shiny mail to go through a Silver Combat Clog-Dance—which, indeed, must be seen to be appreciated. Above all, there is Mr. Frank E. McNish, one of the most quaintly humorous performers it has ever been our good fortune to see. Mr. McNish is primarily an acrobat, and he is an acrobat of very unusual skill and of a most delightful felicity and certainty of execution. But what gives zest to the merit of his performance is his odd dramatic assumption that he is in danger of interruption from some unseen bully of an overseer. Mr. McNish's extraordinary performance, as extraordinary in its humour as in its novelty, is beyond all question a thing to be seen. Among the other performers, Mr. William Emerson and Mr. William Sweetman are the most amusing, and Messrs. Sanford and Wilson are the most true to the negro character. In general, as we have said, there is but a bare pretence of the imitation of plantation life in any modern minstrel performance; and perhaps Haverly's Mastodon Minstrels are no worse in this respect than any other. But the sentimental ballads of the first part—not as many nor as delicately shaded as other minstrel companies have accustomed us to—have no trace of the real negro song, which is to be detected, however, in one or two of the comic ditties, notably in Mr. Morton's "I'm high-minded." In general, the comic songs of Mr. Haverly's performers are better than the sentimental; they are such, too, with better assistance from the chorus; and some of them are rendered with a certainty of effect, and indeed a multiplicity of effects, most amusing. In fact, of the entire programme of Mr. Haverly's Mastodon Minstrels—despite the melancholy fact that that programme is unduly long—we may say, with Abraham Lincoln, that "those who like that sort of thing will find this just the sort of thing they like."

The instruments of the four performers in the original band of Ethiopian Serenaders were the banjo and the bones, the violin and the tambourine—and for a long while the place of the stately Interlocutor (who sits in the centre of the semicircle and allows the humorous end-men to extract unlimited fun from the extremely complicated relations of the Interlocutor's numerous fathers and brothers and sisters) was filled by the banjoist, who repeated the conundrum propounded by Brudder Bones or Brudder Tambo, so that there might be no misunderstanding of its conditions, making the point clear to the dullest comprehension, much in the manner of the catechizing Sunday-school visitor. Of these four instruments most persons would at once pick out the banjo as most characteristic of the negro race, recognizing the Elizabethan existence of the bones, the Basque origin of the tambourine, and the wholly un-Ethiopian genesis of the violin. Mr. Joel Chandler Harris, however, the creator of the always delightful Uncle Remus, and a very close student of the actual facts of negro life, wrote a paper last winter in which he declared that the banjo was not a negro instrument at all, and that the preference of the darkey was wholly for the violin. Mr. Harris, whose opportunities for observation, especially in Georgia, have been as well utilized as they have been ample, declared that "the banjo may be the typical instrument of the plantation-negro, but I have never seen a plantation-negro play it. I have heard them make sweet music with the quills—Pan's pipes; I have heard them play passably well on the fiddle, the fife, and the flute; and I have heard them blow a tin-trumpet with surprising skill; but I have never seen a banjo, or a tambourine, or a pair of bones, in the hands of plantation-negro." And, after specifying that his experience extends only to Middle Georgia, where, however, there were negroes from Virginia and from other parts of the South, Mr. Harris adds:—"I have seen the negro at work, and I have seen him at play; I have attended his corn-shuckings, his dances, and his frolics; I have heard him give the wonderful melody of his songs to the winds; I have heard him fit barbaric airs to the quills; I have seen him scrape jubilantly on the fiddle; I have seen him blow wildly on the bugle, and beat enthusiastically on the triangle; but I have never heard him play on the banjo." This iconoclastic shattering of tradition and convention was most tolerable and not to be endured; and the succeeding numbers of The Critic (in which Mr. Harris's pungent paper was published) contained letters from many correspondents, all of whom bore witness to the fact that the plantation-negro did sometimes play on the banjo. No attempt was made to show that the negro knew anything at all about the bones or the tambourine. But the use of the banjo by plantation-negroes in Virginia was established beyond all cavil. One correspondent aptly quoted a foot-note from the rare first edition of Jefferson's Notes on Virginia (1784) which supplemented an assertion in the text that the negroes have an accurate ear for music with the declaration that "the instrument proper to them is the Banjar, which they brought hither from Africa, and which is the origin of the guitar, its chords being precisely the four lower chords of the guitar." Mr. George W. Cable, the author of the fresh and subtle sketches of life in New Orleans, Old Creole Days, has had occasion to observe the negro in Louisiana as carefully as Mr. Harris has observed him in Georgia; and Mr. Cable has found a hundred times as many fiddles on a plantation as banjos. Mr. Cable agrees with Mr. Harris in asserting that the banjo is not a very common instrument on the plantation; but he asserts that he has often spent half the night listening to negroes "picking" the banjo in monotonous accompaniment to their songs. Mr. Cable quoted a little Creole song, in which the slave seems to take his banjo into his confidence as he describes a passing dandy:—

Voyez ce mulet-là, Musieu Bainjo,
Comme il est insolent;
Chapeau sur côté, Musieu Bainjo,
La canne a la main, Musieu Bainjo,
Botte qui fait crin, crin, Musieu Bainjo.

Mr. Cable, however, disagrees absolutely with Mr. Harris in the main issue. He says that the banjo is just as much a negro instrument as the barrel with the jawbone drumsticks which the negroes use in their dances. And all truly conservative lovers of tradition will rejoice that Mr. Harris has been overthrown. It is bad enough to deprive the negro of his tambourine and his bones; to rob him of his banjo is brutal.

THE POLITICAL NURSERY.

MR. AUBERON HERBERT appears to have been so much pleased with the position of the "eternal child" in politics which we gave him last week that he has determined to addict himself yet further to childish things. No house, a great Englishman once said, is complete without a kitten rising six weeks and a baby rising two years or thereabouts. There are diversities of opinion as to this last point; but we, at least, have room in our political nursery for Mr. Herbert. With the engaging inconstancy of youth, he has changed his playground from the Daily News to the Times, perhaps because his play this week is so very, very naughty that the Daily News really could not give facilities for it. Last week he only defended Mr. Forster; now he goes so far as to attack Mr. Gladstone (cet âge est sans vergogne), and accuses the whole Ministry of political shabbiness. They were shabby about the Land Act and the Land League, shabby about the Boer War, shabby about the Indian troops in Egypt, shabby about Arabi, shabbiest about the Egyptian garrisons. All this is extremely true, though perhaps it has been said a good many times before, and by persons rather better qualified to speak than those who (as Mr. Herbert, to the best of our remembrance, did) used their efforts to seat this shabby Ministry in place. However, it does not do to quarrel with truisms, and it is a characteristic of infancy to enunciate them with great solemnity and imagine them to be new discoveries. In the very same number of the Times which contains what the Times itself has obligingly called Mr. Herbert's "spirited letter" a gifted reviewer indulges in the unanswerable statement that "it would be much to be lamented if Englishmen lost their interest in the bygone ages, with their wonderful wealth of poetry, of romance, and of heroic action." It would, there is no doubt of it; and the Government is shabby, there is no doubt of that. Even so when the Bennet family were in trouble by reason of the elopement of the flagitious Lydia did the studious Mary comfort her sisters:—"Unhappy as the event may be, we may draw from it this useful lesson, that loss of virtue in a female is irretrievable, that one false step involves her in endless ruin, that her reputation is no less brittle than it is beautiful, and that she cannot be too guarded in her behaviour towards the undeserving of the other sex." Mr. Auberon Herbert, Miss Mary Bennet, and the reviewer of the Times make a delightful trinity.

To return, however, to that one of the trinity with whom we have more particularly to do—our spirited political child, Mr. Auberon Herbert. He proceeds to improve the Egyptian situation at great length, observing, as if it were a totally novel comparison, that the Government arithmetic is as that of persons who say that two and two make five. Here also be truths. But, as Mr. Auberon Herbert himself seems after a time dimly to perceive, they are not extremely fertile or practical truths. What is to be done? says Mr. Auberon Herbert; and the first thing which he decides upon as by no means to be done is to call in the Opposition. No, no, cries Mr. Auberon Herbert, "I still shudder when I think of Lord Beaconsfield's Government," and he shudders still more when he thinks of Lord Beaconsfield's Government without Lord Beaconsfield. But, on the other hand, he cannot tolerate the Government as it is. "You must get rid of old crust-hardened politicians," and, it would appear, try a young man or two with an open mind, such as—but we pause. Why not, says Mr. Auberon Herbert, try a Government composed of Sir Charles Dilke as Foreign Secretary, Mr. Forster, Mr. Goschen, Mr. Fawcett, Mr. Trevelyan, Mr. Courtney, and Mr. Shaw-Lefevre? It is awful to think of the wrath of Birmingham when it finds that Mr. Ch-mb-rla-n is not in this selected team. So, however, Mr. Auberon Herbert is left constructing Cabinets.

Now, there is something delightfully childish in this cry of our spirited political child. When other children of the natural kind are ill, everybody is very sorry indeed for them; but it has been observed by the most humane spectators that their conduct is not invariably distinguished by the perfection of reason. "Oh, mamma," says the little sufferer, "I have got such a pain." Mr. Auberon Herbert has got a pain, and the name of the particular pain is Liberal Government. "Then, my dear," says mamma, "here is some medicine which will take it away." So do nature and reason, almæ parentes both, point out to Mr. Auberon Herbert that a Conservative Ministry will probably relieve him at once. "Oh no, mamma," rejoins the infant of fact, "not that nasty medicine—I can't take that medicine. Why won't you make some other medicine with sugar and spice and all that's nice." So does our infant of fiction yearn for a political remedy into which Mr. Forster (all compact of sugar) and Mr. Courtney (that nest of political spicery) shall enter. It is sad, and possibly useless, to point out to him that the medicine will not cure even if it could be got compounded by any known practitioner of pharmaceutics. "Give me the nice medicine, not the nasty medicine that I threw away the other day!" Such is the spectacle presented by our political child, and such his wail. It is a very interesting one, but trying to persons of short temper. In the nursery of fact and private life remonstrances of this kind are too often met with a short, summary, but very practical and effective method, which usually accomplishes a cure. In the political nursery, which unfortunately is often the largest and most populous part of the political house, these means are not available.

Yet it would appear that a not inconsiderable part of the nation is in Mr. Auberon Herbert's state of political babyhood and political gastralgia. With himself we have nothing more to do, except to thank him for the obliging frequency with which he gives us a text. We do not even inquire further why he dislikes old crust-hardened politicians. An intelligent art critic observed the other day that, "paradoxical as it may appear, the French, who live in small rooms, delight in large pictures." Any political writer of the same kidney may, if he likes, indulge in the kindred reflection that, "paradoxical as it may appear, Mr. Auberon Herbert, who lives in the New Forest, dislikes old politicians." But of him we speak no more, and need speak no more; for the wailings of infants like unto him are as frequent just now as those of other infants in the vestibule of the Virgilian Hell. Here is the Pall Mall Gazette acknowledging that Lord Salisbury has just spoken about Egypt after its own heart, and crying, like Mr. Herbert, "No Lord Salisbury! No nasty Conservative medicine!" Here is the Manchester Guardian, that most respectable organ of provincial Liberalism, at once declaring plumply that an international Control for Egypt might be a capital thing if France were kept out of it, and then abusing Lord Salisbury for abusing the Government which has by its own confession been negotiating with France for weeks on the subject of Egypt. The Manchester Guardian, of course, does not think that the Government have been proposing to France an international Control without France. But the cry "No Conservative Government! No nasty medicine!" breaks dolefully from its lips also. Somewhat more consistent is the Scotsman, the David Deans of Gladstonian orthodoxy, a journal far more free from right and left hand defections, far more elect a member of the lovely remnant than the Daily News itself, which, to tell the truth, has too often made short excursions in the direction of sense and heresy before once more involving itself in the gloom of impenetrable Gladstonianism. The Scotsman has blasphemously said that thoughtful men all over the country will have nothing to do with any policy that can in any way involve the surrender of our position in Egypt, and it seems (in this respect showing itself less childish than some others) to have a gloomy consciousness that the nasty medicine may have to be administered. It is not in the least grateful to the medicines or anxious to see them at work; but Scotch babies are never quite so childish as English ones.

The interest of this vagitus infantum is all the greater because it is extremely difficult to assign any exact reason for the dislike of the political infants to the medicine. The ordinary remedial drugs of private life are, it may be admitted, not nice. We have known a boy with an unnatural appetite for brimstone and treacle, and senna in its natural state is rather peculiar than positively nasty. But salts, magnesia, the powder of the accursed Gregory, and so forth, are frankly and immitigably (as Mr. Henry James would say) detestable. Except Mr. Bright and a few other amiable fanatics, few people can discern anything more intrinsically abominable in a Conservative Government than in a Liberal one. The proportion of politicians so keen that the mere idea of their own party being "out" makes them miserable is certainly not very large in the nation. Even Dr. Parker does not really think that a Conservative Government would make him renounce Congregationalism (whatever Congregationalism is) or be burnt; and there are probably not one million people out of the five-and-thirty who could honestly put their hands on their hearts and say that they care a button for Franchise Bills, London Government Bills, or anything of the kind. The mystery can only be explained by once more falling back on the analogy of the nursery. A Conservative Government, by the ingenuity of those indefatigable story-tellers Messrs. Gladstone and Co., has become a simple bogey. Mr. Auberon Herbert, we see, shudders without knowing why at it. "At Kilve [the Gladstonian Kilve] there is, at any rate, no weathercock, and that's the reason why," we suppose, what with the constant assertions of press and platform for five years past that the Government of Lord Beaconsfield did things so divers and so disgusting that no fellow really could stand it, though no fellow can tell what they were; what with the assertions of platform and press that Mr. Gladstone's Government is the best of all possible Governments (though it is candidly admitted that it has done little else than make blunders), a great myth appears to have been got up and solidly established in nursery credence. And it must be owned that Ministers make very good use of the myth. Sir Charles Dilke has just calmly informed a correspondent who questioned the accuracy of a statement of his that he, Sir Charles, never "makes statements in public which it is subsequently necessary to modify." This attitude probably pays—with children. And yet, as we see, the children are not happy. They already writhe very much, and they rub themselves piteously; but the political vindicator calling in that dreadful bogey of a Conservative Government Bishop of Rome, you know can't be thought of. Mr. Auberon Herbert sets the task of getting rid of the bare idea. The rise, progress, and extinction of this we enter on as always a pleasing phenomenon to the dispassionate observer; necessarily unfortunately government by bogey is rather difficult to procure. passionately when it involves the letting all the inferno in that sense country go to rack and ruin.

THE BATTLE OF DRUMCLOG.

THE battle of Drumclog, fought June 1, 1679, is more than a skirmish between a handful of the State has created torical summary:—"So rabble of ill-armed and undisciplined peasants the civil power, that reasons taken a place in history of more impl has not only given to cumstances seem at first to warrant. It is, perform and unity, but also remembered, when remembered at all, for their doctrine." It would be Scott with a striking scene in one of the co-existence of the Church, romances. But it also marks in the history independent spiritual body in first appearance of a name more fiercely a And the object of the paper than almost any other in our annals—the case as the verdict of history. of Claverhouse; and it is noticeable, m

The first negro-minstrel company was organized in 1843, and it consisted of four performers, who had each appeared singly as impersonators of the plantation negro. One of the original four, D. D. Emmett, who still survives, was the composer of "Dixie," which afterwards became the battle-song of the Southern Confederacy. In the beginning these performers gave their concert as an interlude between two plays in a regular theatre. The popularity of the new entertainment led to its expansion, until it could fill the bill of an entire evening's amusement. It was at a very early stage in its career that the programme of a negro-minstrel performance fell into three divisions—the "first part," the "olio," and the after-piece. The "first part" retains its name to the present day; it is the portion of the entertainment provided by a single row of negro minstrels seated on chairs, with the grave "Interlocutor" in the centre, while at the ends are Bones and Tambo, the "end-men," who are known in England, oddly enough, as the "corner-men." This row of negro minstrels consisted at first of four, but it gradually expanded to twenty, until the great Mr. Haverly suddenly declared that he had "forty—count them—forty." In the performances now given at Drury Lane Theatre by Mr. Haverly's Mastodon Minstrels—and the name is not ill chosen, for some of the merry jests retailed by Mr. Haverly's comedians are surely as old as the mastodon and the mammoth—there are nearly sixty performers visible, line upon line, rising in tiers nearly to the flies. On the wings of this sable array are a score of end-men with tambourines and with bones; while the star end-men, the chief comedians, are so many and so important that they appear in relays, one replacing the other. This, of course, is a doing of things on a large scale, and certainly it succeeds in breaking up the monotony of a single line of performers quite as effectually as did the New York minstrel manager who scattered the actors in his "first part" through a handsomely furnished drawing-room in a vain effort to make the entertainment appear in the semblance of an evening party. The second part of a minstrel show is the "olio"—and this is only a variety entertainment, of banjo-playing, clog-dancing, and the like, by imitation negroes. Occasionally one of the sketches now and again performed really recalls the actual negro, notably the little charcoal outline of the "Watermelon Man" as presented by Mr. McAndrews. But in general the "olio" is as far away from the actual facts of plantation life as the first part; and when we say that two of Mr. Haverly's Mastodon Minstrels are sufficiently conscience-less to sing Irish comic songs, the full extent of this decadence is made visible. And, in like manner, the after-piece, which once attempted to reproduce dramatically the mingled simplicity and cunning of the negro, is now a parody of a popular play, a burlesque opera, or any other comic drama as far removed as possible from the ken of the dwellers on the old plantation. Nowadays any kind of a farce may be performed as an afterpiece. We have seen, with much amusement, a broadly comic play called the Great Sheep Case, in which we recognized a blackened perversion of the Village Lawyer, a farce of Garrick's day; and we happened to know that the Village Lawyer was a free rendering of L'Avocat Pathelin of Brueys and Palaprat, which in turn was a modernization of Pathelin, one of the oldest surviving farces of the French stage.

The entertainment now offered at Drury Lane Theatre by Mr. Haverly's American and European Mastodon Minstrels is emphatically a Big Thing after the most approved fashion of American Big Things. Mr. Haverly is, plainly enough, a manager with Napoleonic conceptions, worthy of comparison with those of the mysterious and mighty Mr. Barnum, whose Own and Only Greatest Show on Earth is hardly more astounding or more kaleidoscopic than this sable exhibition of Mr. Haverly's. We incline to think that Mr. Barnum's show is scarcely more unlike the primitive circus than Mr. Haverly's Minstrels are unlike the original Ethiopian Serenaders. And Mr. Haverly has a full share of the sublime self-confidence and of the marvellous knowledge of effect which combine to make Mr. Barnum what he is—one of the wonders of the world, far more remarkable and better worth the full price of admission than any of the Living Curiosities gathered into his Ethnological Congress. From the first part of Mr. Haverly's programme to the last part everything is done on a grand scale; there are six eminent end-men appearing in pairs in relays; there are eighteen other exponents of the bones and the tambourine; there are about sixty performers on the stage at once; there are sand-dances by a sextet of agile and ebony operators, and clog-dances by a score of glittering and airy apparitions, who appear in shiny mail to go through a Silver Combat Clog-Dance—which, indeed, must be seen to be appreciated. Above all, there is Mr. Frank E. McNish, one of the most quaintly humorous performers it has ever been our good fortune to see. Mr. McNish is primarily an acrobat, and he is an acrobat of very unusual skill and of a most delightful felicity and certainty of execution. But what gives zest to the merit of his performance is his odd dramatic assumption that he is in danger of interruption from some unseen bully of an overseer. Mr. McNish's extraordinary performance, as extraordinary in its humour as in its novelty, is beyond all question a thing to be seen. Among the other performers, Mr. William Emerson and Mr. William Sweetman are the most amusing, and Messrs. Sanford and Wilson are the most true to the negro character. In general, as we have said, there is but a bare pretence of the imitation of plantation life in any modern minstrel performance; and perhaps Haverly's Mastodon Minstrels are no worse in this respect than any other. But the sentimental ballads of the first part—not as many nor as delicately shaded as other minstrel companies have accustomed us to—have no trace of the real negro song, which is to be detected, however, in one or two of the comic ditties, notably in Mr. Morton's "I'm high-minded." In general, the comic songs of Mr. Haverly's performers are better than the sentimental; they are sung, too, with better assistance from the chorus; and some of them are rendered with a certainty of effect, and indeed a multiplicity of effects, most amusing. In fact, of the entire programme of Mr. Haverly's Mastodon Minstrels—despite the melancholy fact that that programme is unduly long—we may say, with Abraham Lincoln, that "those who like that sort of thing will find this just the sort of thing they like."

The instruments of the four performers in the original band of Ethiopian Serenaders were the banjo and the bones, the violin and the tambourine—and for a long while the place of the stately Interlocutor (who sits in the centre of the semicircle and allows the humorous end-men to extract unlimited fun from the extremely complicated relations of the Interlocutor's numerous fathers and brothers and sisters) was filled by the banjoist, who repeated the conundrum propounded by Brudder Bones or Brudder Tambo, so that there might be no misunderstanding of its conditions, making the point clear to the dullest comprehension, much in the manner of the catechizing Sunday-school visitor. Of these four instruments most persons would at once pick out the banjo as most characteristic of the negro race, recognizing the Elizabethan existence of the bones, the Basque origin of the tambourine, and the wholly un-Ethiopian genesis of the violin. Mr. Joel Chandler Harris, however, the creator of the always delightful Uncle Remus, and a very close student of the actual facts of negro life, wrote a paper last winter in which he declared that the banjo was not a negro instrument at all, and that the preference of the darkey was wholly for the violin. Mr. Harris, whose opportunities for observation, especially in Georgia, have been as well utilized as they have been ample, declared that "the banjo may be the typical instrument of the plantation-negro, but I have never seen a plantation-negro play it. I have heard them make sweet music with the quills—Pan's pipes; I have heard them play passably well on the fiddle, the fife, and the flute; and I have heard them blow a tin-trumpet with surprising skill; but I have never seen a banjo, or a tambourine, or a pair of bones, in the hands of plantation-negro." And, after specifying that his experience extends only to Middle Georgia, where, however, there were negroes from Virginia and from other parts of the South, Mr. Harris adds:—"I have seen the negro at work, and I have seen him at play; I have attended his corn-shuckings, his dances, and his frolics; I have heard him give the wonderful melody of his songs to the winds; I have heard him fit barbaric airs to the quills; I have seen him scrape jubilantly on the fiddle; I have seen him blow wildly on the bugle, and beat enthusiastically on the triangle; but I have never heard him play on the banjo." This iconoclastic shattering of tradition and convention was most tolerable and not to be endured; and the succeeding numbers of The Critic (in which Mr. Harris's pungent paper was published) contained letters from many correspondents, all of whom bore witness to the fact that the plantation-negro did sometimes play on the banjo. No attempt was made to show that the negro knew anything at all about the bones or the tambourine. But the use of the banjo by plantation-negroes in Virginia was established beyond all cavil. One correspondent aptly quoted a foot-note from the rare first edition of Jefferson's Notes on Virginia (1784) which supplemented an assertion in the text that the negroes have an accurate ear for music with the declaration that "the instrument proper to them is the Banjar, which they brought hither from Africa, and which is the origin of the guitar, its chords being precisely the four lower chords of the guitar." Mr. George W. Cable, the author of the fresh and subtle sketches of life in New Orleans, Old Creole Days, has had occasion to observe the negro in Louisiana as carefully as Mr. Harris has observed him in Georgia; and Mr. Cable has found a hundred times as many fiddles on a plantation as banjos. Mr. Cable agrees with Mr. Harris in asserting that the banjo is not a very common instrument on the plantation; but he asserts that he has often spent half the night listening to negroes "picking" the banjo in monotonous accompaniment to their songs. Mr. Cable quoted a little Creole song, in which the slave seems to take his banjo into his confidence as he describes a passing dandy:—

Voyez ce mulet-là, Musieu Bainjo,
Comme il est insolent;
Chapeau sur côté, Musieu Bainjo,
La canne a la main, Musieu Bainjo,
Botte qui fait crin, crin, Musieu Bainjo.

Mr. Cable, however, disagrees absolutely with Mr. Harris in the main issue. He says that the banjo is just as much a negro instrument as the barrel with the jawbone drumsticks which the negroes use in their dances. And all truly conservative lovers of tradition will rejoice that Mr. Harris has been overthrown. It is bad enough to deprive the negro of his tambourine and his bones; to rob him of his banjo is brutal.

THE POLITICAL NURSERY.

MR. AUBERON HERBERT appears to have been so much pleased with the position of the "eternal child" in politics which we gave him last week that he has determined to addict himself yet further to childish things. No house, a great Englishman once said, is complete without a kitten rising six weeks and a baby rising two years or thereabouts. There are diversities of opinion as to this last point; but we, at least, have room in our political nursery for Mr. Herbert. With the engaging inconstancy of youth, he has changed his playground from the Daily News to the Times, perhaps because his play this week is so very, very naughty that the Daily News really could not give facilities for it. Last week he only defended Mr. Forster; now he goes so far as to attack Mr. Gladstone (cet âge est sans vergogne), and accuses the whole Ministry of political shabbiness. They were shabby about the Land Act and the Land League, shabby about the Boer War, shabby about the Indian troops in Egypt, shabby about Arabi, shabbiest about the Egyptian garrisons. All this is extremely true, though perhaps it has been said a good many times before, and by persons rather better qualified to speak than those who (as Mr. Herbert, to the best of our remembrance, did) used their efforts to seat this shabby Ministry in place. However, it does not do to quarrel with truisms, and it is a characteristic of infancy to enunciate them with great solemnity and imagine them to be new discoveries. In the very same number of the Times which contains what the Times itself has obligingly called Mr. Herbert's "spirited letter" a gifted reviewer indulges in the unanswerable statement that "it would be much to be lamented if Englishmen lost their interest in the bygone ages, with their wonderful wealth of poetry, of romance, and of heroic action." It would, there is no doubt of it; and the Government is shabby, there is no doubt of that. Even so when the Bennet family were in trouble by reason of the elopement of the flagitious Lydia did the studious Mary comfort her sisters:—"Unhappy as the event may be, we may draw from it this useful lesson, that loss of virtue in a female is irretrievable, that one false step involves her in endless ruin, that her reputation is no less brittle than it is beautiful, and that she cannot be too guarded in her behaviour towards the undeserving of the other sex." Mr. Auberon Herbert, Miss Mary Bennet, and the reviewer of the Times make a delightful trinity.

To return, however, to that one of the trinity with whom we have more particularly to do—our spirited political child, Mr. Auberon Herbert. He proceeds to improve the Egyptian situation at great length, observing, as if it were a totally novel comparison, that the Government arithmetic is as that of persons who say that two and two make five. Here also be truths. But, as Mr. Auberon Herbert himself seems after a time dimly to perceive, they are not extremely fertile or practical truths. What is to be done? says Mr. Auberon Herbert; and the first thing which he decides upon as by no means to be done is to call in the Opposition. No, no, cries Mr. Auberon Herbert, "I still shudder when I think of Lord Beaconsfield's Government," and he shudders still more when he thinks of Lord Beaconsfield's Government without Lord Beaconsfield. But, on the other hand, he cannot tolerate the Government as it is. "You must get rid of old crust-hardened politicians," and, it would appear, try a young man or two with an open mind, such as—but we pause. Why not, says Mr. Auberon Herbert, try a Government composed of Sir Charles Dilke as Foreign Secretary, Mr. Forster, Mr. Goschen, Mr. Fawcett, Mr. Trevelyan, Mr. Courtney, and Mr. Shaw-Lefevre? It is awful to think of the wrath of Birmingham when it finds that Mr. Ch-mb-rla-n is not in this selected team. So, however, Mr. Auberon Herbert is left constructing Cabinets.

Now, there is something delightfully childish in this cry of our spirited political child. When other children of the natural kind are ill, everybody is very sorry indeed for them; but it has been observed by the most humane spectators that their conduct is not invariably distinguished by the perfection of reason. "Oh, mamma," says the little sufferer, "I have got such a pain." Mr. Auberon Herbert has got a pain, and the name of the particular pain is Liberal Government. "Then, my dear," says mamma, "here is some medicine which will take it away." So do nature and reason, almæ parentes both, point out to Mr. Auberon Herbert that a Conservative Ministry will probably relieve him at once. "Oh no, mamma," rejoins the infant of fact, "not that nasty medicine—I can't take that medicine. Why won't you make some other medicine with sugar and spice and all that's nice." So does our infant of fiction yearn for a political remedy into which Mr. Forster (all compact of sugar) and Mr. Courtney (that nest of political spicery) shall enter. It is sad, and possibly useless, to point out to him that the medicine will not cure even if it could be got compounded by any known practitioner of pharmaceutics. "Give me the nice medicine, not the nasty medicine that I threw away the other day!" Such is the spectacle presented by our political child, and such his wail. It is a very interesting one, but trying to persons of short temper. In the nursery of fact and private life remonstrances of this kind are too often met with a short, summary, but very practical and effective method, which usually accomplishes a cure. In the political nursery, which unfortunately is often the largest and most populous part of the political house, these means are not available.

Yet it would appear that a not inconsiderable part of the nation is in Mr. Auberon Herbert's state of political babyhood and political gastralgia. With himself we have nothing more to do, except to thank him for the obliging frequency with which he gives us a text. We do not even inquire further why he dislikes old crust-hardened politicians. An intelligent art critic observed the other day that, "paradoxical as it may appear, the French, who live in small rooms, delight in large pictures." Any political writer of the same kidney may, if he likes, indulge in the kindred reflection that, "paradoxical as it may appear, Mr. Auberon Herbert, who lives in the New Forest, dislikes old politicians." But of him we speak no more, and need speak no more; for the wailings of infants like unto him are as frequent just now as those of other infants in the vestibule of the Virgilian Hell. Here is the Pall Mall Gazette acknowledging that Lord Salisbury has just spoken about Egypt after its own heart, and crying, like Mr. Herbert, "No Lord Salisbury! No nasty Conservative medicine!" Here is the Manchester Guardian, that most respectable organ of provincial Liberalism, at once declaring plumply that an international Control for Egypt might be a capital thing if France were kept out of it, and then abusing Lord Salisbury for abusing the Government which has by its own confession been negotiating with France for weeks on the subject of Egypt. The Manchester Guardian, of course, does not think that the Government have been proposing to France an international Control without France. But the cry "No Conservative Government! No nasty medicine!" breaks dolefully from its lips also. Somewhat more consistent is the Scotsman, the David Deans of Gladstonian orthodoxy, a journal far more free from right and left hand defections, far more elect a member of the lovely remnant than the Daily News itself, which, to tell the truth, has too often made short excursions in the direction of sense and heresy before once more involving itself in the gloom of impenetrable Gladstonianism. The Scotsman has blasphemously said that thoughtful men all over the country will have nothing to do with any policy that can in any way involve the surrender of our position in Egypt, and it seems (in this respect showing itself less childish than some others) to have a gloomy consciousness that the nasty medicine may have to be administered. It is not in the least grateful to the mediciners or anxious to see them at work; but Scotch babies are never quite so childish as English ones.

The interest of this vagitus infantum is all the greater because it is extremely difficult to assign any exact reason for the dislike of the political infants to the medicine. The ordinary remedial drugs of private life are, it may be admitted, not nice. We have known a boy with an unnatural appetite for brimstone and treacle, and senna in its natural state is rather peculiar than positively nasty. Unfortunately government by bogey is rather difficult to regard dispassionately when it involves the letting all the interests of the country go to rack and ruin.

THE BATTLE OF DRUMCLOG

THE battle of Drumclog, fought [illegible] 1679, [illegible] more than a skirmish between [illegible] rabble of ill-armed and undisciplined [illegible] which [illegible] reed [illegible] ough little [illegible] ons and a [illegible] for various reasons taken a place in history of [illegible] n than its circumstances seem at first to warrant [illegible] st generally remembered, when remembered at [illegible] hed Walter Scott with a striking scene in one [illegible] s historical romances. But it also marks in as [illegible] ingdom the first appearance of a name more [illegible] than almost any other in our [illegible] in Graham, of Claverhouse; and it is noticeable, moreover, as the [illegible] sole occasion in which soldiers under his command were forced to show their backs to an enemy. Lastly, it is memorable as the turning-point in that long and bitter conflict between Episcopacy and Presbyterianism which, practically dating from the first of the great Scotch Covenants in 1557, saw only the beginning of the end in the Toleration Act of 1689. Previous to the day of Drumclog the resistance of the Covenanters, though always stubborn and persistent, had been, save for a few isolated cases, and for the abortive rising which ended in the Pentland Hills, strictly defensive. Some historians, Hume among the number, and the late Mr. Burton, have thought that the "vague bullying," as the latter has happily styled Lauderdale's early policy, was from the first designed to drive the Whigs (as they then began first to be called) into open rebellion, and so pave the way for more violent measures. It is clear that such a suspicion existed at the time in Scotland, and it certainly seems to receive some colour from the concluding sentence of the despatch in which Claverhouse sent the news of his defeat to Edinburgh; "this may be counted the beginning of the rebellion in my opinion." At any rate, whether the issue was foreseen or not, it was at Drumclog that the Covenanters first really took the war into their own hands, to reap three short weeks later the fruits of their victory in the rout and slaughter of Bothwell Bridge.

It is as well to remember that these men had by that time come to be very far indeed from the simple heroes and martyrs that certain writers, other than their own chroniclers, have delighted to represent them. The memory of their wrongs for a long while made it easy for later ages to forget how large a share they themselves by their unreasonable and violent conduct had in making those wrongs possible; while the savage and unrelenting persecution they suffered in the closing years of the struggle has, as usual in such cases, drawn a veil over the fearful vengeance they were never slow to take when chance threw it into their power. The deaths of John Brown and some others have set the seal of martyrdom alike on the ignorant and harmless peasants who wished only to worship God after their own fashion, and on the arrogant and bigoted fanatics who would not allow that He could be worshipped in any other; alike on the victims of James and on the murderers of Archbishop Sharpe.

It is a more common and yet greater error to suppose that these men represented the national feeling of Scotland, or were universally regarded by their countrymen as the champions of their liberty and religion. There is about as much reason for this belief as there would be for a historian a hundred years hence to represent the noisy and indecent mobs who infest our streets under the banners of "General" Booth as a national protest against the irreligion of the age. These men were the survivors of the Solemn League and Covenant of 1638, of which the bulk of the Scotch people, lay and clerical alike, had grown heartily weary in 1660. Ever since the "Manchline Testimony" of 1648, and the abortive "Whigamore's Raid" which followed, the Western Lowlands had been the head-quarters of the extreme party, or Sectaries, as they were known among the more moderate. In the mountainous districts where the counties of Ayr and Lanark meet, a stern and uncompromising band of fanatics had been for some years preaching their wild crusade against all who were not prepared at all hazards to stand by the letter of the old Covenant, or rather by its spirit as interpreted by them. The toleration they demanded they would not stoop to give. No man should be free to worship God as he pleased; every man must worship Him in the way which seemed good to them, and in that way only. The moderate Presbyterians were as hateful to them as Charles himself and all his bishops, and they in their turn were as obnoxious to the bulk of their own countrymen as to the English Government. These "wild Western Whigs" stood between Scotland and peace. The great part of the nation, even of the clergymen, was loyal. They were weary of the endless squabbles which had vexed their Church since the days of Knox. The religious tyranny of the Puritans had grown as odious to them as to Englishmen, and the Restoration was welcomed with as much joy in Edinburgh as in London. It may be going too far to say, as some have said, that at that moment it would have been possible, by gentle measures, to persuade Scotland to accept a moderate form of Episcopacy; but there is no doubt that there was a very strong party then in the country anxious for a compromise between the two Churches, and willing to make all reasonable advances towards one. Unfortunately Charles, who no doubt had no very pleasant recollections of it, had conceived a violent antipathy to Presbyterianism. It was not, he said, "a religion for gentlemen"; and his Ministers were quite ready to agree with him. Gentle measures were the last to be adopted by such men as then held the destinies of Scotland in their hands. Professor Sidgwick and Lauderdale, both seceders from the Covenanting party, and Mr. McNish against it with all the bitterness of renegades; but with all the unusual skill and savage old soldier who lives in history as "Muscovite" dramatic assumption roasted men"; Sharpe, in whom the Presbyterian unseen bully more than in any other man, and who rewarded by performance, as cepting the bishopric of St. Andrew's. T complete subservience to the King, passed Act after Act, each one more arbitrary and oppressive than the former. Nor did "the Indulgence" of 1669 mend matters. The "King's Curates," as those who accepted its terms were called, became soon even more hateful than the King himself; and the falling away of the weaker brethren served only to inflame the zeal and fury of the stronger. A body of troops under Sir James Turner were quartered on the peasantry of the disaffected shires, and the rising provoked by the insolence and brutality of his dragoons only brought upon the poor wretches the still heavier hand of Dalziel. A host of savage marauders was let loose on them from the Highlands, to return, when the outcry of their victims became too loud even for Lauderdale's indifference, laden with plunder, as though, says a historian, "they had been at the sacking of some besieged town." The appointment of James as Lord High Commissioner put the last touch to the tale of folly, misrule, and cruelty.

It was at this juncture that Claverhouse appeared on the scene. He was then thirty-five years old. Born in 1643, a cadet of the noble house of Montrose, he had followed the fashion of most young men of good blood but poor fortune, and gone over sea to learn the art of war. First under Turenne, and then under William himself, he had served with distinction, and is said to have saved the latter's life at Seneffe. In 1678 he returned to Scotland, bringing with him a high character for courage and capacity, and, according to one account, a recommendation from William himself to the Duke of York. He was warmly welcomed. The young Marquess of Montrose, grandson of the "great Marquess," who had just received the command of the Royal Horse Guards, pressed on his kinsman a commission in his own regiment, as "a step to a much more considerable employment." The offer was accepted, and the employment was not long coming. In the autumn of that year three new regiments of cavalry were raised for service in Scotland, and one of these was at the King's express desire given to Claverhouse.

The first few months of his command were passed in patrolling the disaffected districts, dispersing Conventicles, examining suspected persons, and sending such as could not give a good account of themselves prisoners to Edinburgh or Glasgow. The work must have been singularly distasteful to one who had seen war under such great captains as William and Turenne. Yet it was performed as efficiently as circumstances allowed, and with as much moderation as was consistent with a soldier's obedience to orders. The crimes which have been laid to his charge, if committed at all, belong to a later period. It was soon clear to him, however, that he had to deal with very different men from the rabble which his predecessors had cowed. The cause of the persecuted had been taken up by a small body of men as savage and ruthless as the worst of their persecutors; men in whom all ideas of liberty of conscience or of religion had become merged in one overmastering thought of vengeance; men in whose mouths was day and night but one text from that book by which they professed to be guided—"an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth." Chief among these was David Hackston of Rathillet, a gentleman of family and fortune, who had been a free-liver in his youth, but was now one of the most bigoted of fanatics; Robert Hamilton, also of gentle blood, but a gloomy fatalist as savage as Dalziel himself; and John Balfour of Burley, Hackston's brother-in-law, whom Scott has immortalized. Even Wodrow, the author of that History of the Church of Scotland which has furnished Macaulay with his ideal portrait of Claverhouse, was forced to own that "about this time matters were running to sad heights among the armed followers of some of the field-meetings." One of Claverhouse's soldiers, who had been left sick at a farmhouse, was murdered in cold blood. Two others were fired at as they sat at breakfast in an inn-parlour. On May 3 the brutal deed on Magus Moor roused all Scotland into horror. The Covenanters had now thrown down the gauntlet, and they determined not to be idle. The 29th of May, the King's birthday, had been appointed by the Estates a day of general rejoicing for his restoration. It was chosen by Hamilton and his party as the day for some signal act of defiance. Glasgow was originally designed for the scene, but a day or two previously Claverhouse had marched into that city from Falkirk, and the little town of Rutherglen, lying about two miles to the west, was selected instead. On the morning of the 29th, Hamilton, Hackston, and Burley, at the head of some eighty horse, rode into the town, extinguished the bonfires lit in the King's honour, and kindled one of their own, in which they burned all the Acts of Parliament and Royal proclamations they could lay hands on. They then affixed an insolent and seditious declaration of their own to the town-cross, and, after singing a psalm, withdrew unmolested and at their leisure.

Claverhouse was quickly after them. His patrols scoured the country round, while he himself with the main body of his regiment held south towards the Ayrshire borders, where he had news that a large gathering of the insurgents was to meet on the following Sunday, June 1. Some few prisoners were taken; three men of the Rutherglen party, and an outlawed minister, one King, famous for his eloquence at the Conventicles. With these the troops reached Strathavon early on Sunday morning, and after a short rest continued their march towards Loudon Hill, where the Covenanters were reported to be gathering in force.

The report was true. Two miles to the east of the hill, an abrupt and craggy eminence which marks the meeting of the three shires of Ayr, Lanark, and Renfrew, lay the little hamlet and farm of Drumclog, a barren stretch of swampy moorland even now but sparsely covered with coarse meadow grass. South and north the ground sloped gently down towards a marshy bottom through which ran a stream, or dyke, fringed with stunted alder bushes. Towards the foot of the southern slope the Covenanters were drawn up, and the practised eye of Claverhouse saw at a glance that they had gathered there not to pray but to fight. Their position was a strong one, and their numbers, badly armed as the most of them were, made them no contemptible foe, even for the King's dragoons, on ground where cavalry could with difficulty be brought into action. As usual it is impossible to estimate with any exactness the force on either side. Wodrow, whose business it of course was to magnify Claverhouse's defeat as much as possible, puts the strength of the Covenanters at two hundred fighting men and about forty horse, and this number has been accepted by Mr. Burton. According to Hamilton, however, six days after the battle they mustered between five and six thousand men, and it is reasonable therefore to suppose that they were considerably over two hundred on the day. It is probable that the report Scott makes Lord Evandale bring into his chief is about correct. Claverhouse's own despatch—that one which Scott says was spelled "like a chambermaid"—puts them at four battalions of foot and three squadrons of horse, which would go near to tally with the thousand men reported by Evandale. They were drawn up in three lines; those who had firearms being placed nearest to the dyke, behind them a body of pikemen, and in the rear the rest armed with scythes set on poles, pitchforks, goads, and other such rustic weapons. On either flank was a small body of mounted men. Hamilton was in command; Burley had charge of the horse; and among others present that day was William Cleland, then but sixteen years old, who ten years later was to win a nobler title to fame by a glorious death at the head of his Cameronians in the memorable defence of Dunkeld.

Neither of Claverhouse's force is there any precise record. His command is in the writings of the time indiscriminately styled a regiment and a troop. The strength of a regiment then was very much less than what it is, or should be, now, and seems from a passage in Macaulay's famous third chapter to have numbered not much more than two hundred men. Scott puts the King's troops at Drumclog at two hundred and fifty men, and, as Claverhouse had left a detachment behind in garrison at Glasgow, this is probably over rather than under the mark. The only officers he mentions by name are Captain Blyth and Cornet Crawford, or Crafford as he spells it, both of whom fell at the first discharge. The episode of his nephew's death, while parleying under a flag of truce, is one of the felicitous touches with which Scott knew so well to heighten history; though he only followed an old ballad in reckoning a kinsman of Claverhouse's among the killed. Claverhouse himself rode that day, not the famous black charger tradition has assigned to him and invested with supernatural powers, the "war-horse black as night" on which Aytoun has mounted him in his fine ballad of "Killiecrankie," but a sorrel, according to Scott; according to his own letter a "rone."

The description of the fight in Old Mortality is an admirable specimen of the style in which the great novelist could work the scantiest materials to his will. All contemporary accounts of the fray are singularly meagre and confused, including Claverhouse's own despatch, which has other faults than those of spelling, of which he seems himself to have been sensible by his apology to his correspondent Lin[illegible]thgow for being "so wearied and so sleapy that I have wryton this very confusedly." It began with a sharp skirmish of musketry on both sides. In this the dragoons—who were distinguished then from the regular cavalry, holding much the position of our mounted infantry of the present day—got much the best of it. The Covenanters answered with spirit; but both in their weapons and their skill were naturally far inferior to the royal troops. Meanwhile Claverhouse had sent out a detachment on either flank to discover a passage by which the stream might be crossed. This they could not do; but, unable to manœuvre with ease in the swampy ground, found instead their saddles emptying fast. The Covenanters, seeing that they were no match at long bowls for the dragoons, and observing the confusion in the cavalry, resolved on an advance. By crossings known only to themselves, Burley led his horse round on one flank, and young Cleland, with the bulk of the foot, followed on the other. Claverhouse attempted to recall his men; but in the deep and broken ground the footmen had all the best of it. The scythes and pitchforks made sad work among the poor floundering horses. The roan charger itself was so badly wounded that, in the rider's forcible language, "its guts hung out half an elle," and yet the brave beast "caryed me alf an myl." The cavalry began to fall back, and Burley, coming up on sound ground with his horse, flung himself on them so hotly that the retreat became something very like a rout. Claverhouse did all that a brave man could, but his men had now got completely out of hand. "I caved the standarte," he says, and "mad the best retraite the confusion of our people would suffer"; but he makes no attempt to disguise his defeat. He owns to having lost on the field eight or ten men among the cavalry, besides wounded; "but the dragoons lost many more." As they galloped pell-mell through Strathavon the townsfolk drew out to cut them off; "but we took courage and fell to them, made them run, leaving a dousain on the place." The Covenanters seem to have lost only five or six men, among whom was one of Sharpe's murderers. This does not speak very well for their opponent's fire; but it must be remembered that we have only their own historians to go by. Claverhouse himself could say no more than that "they ar not com easily af on the other side, for I saw severall of them fall before we cam to the shok." Several prisoners fell into the victors' hands. Of these five were spared before Hamilton returned from the pursuit. His orders had been strict that no quarter should be given that day; and, furious that any of "Babel's brats" should be let go, he slew one defenceless wretch with his own hand, to stay any such unseasonable spirit of mercy, lest "the Lord would not honour us to do much more for him"! It is tolerably clear that, even had Claverhouse been the "rapacious, violent, obdurate, and profane" monster of Macaulay's History, the "Hell wicked-witted, blood-thirsty Graham" of a contemporary chronicler, it would not have been hard to match him among his victims.

DR. HATCH'S ERASTIAN PARADOX.

MANY of our readers will be aware that four years ago the Bampton Lectures at Oxford were preached by Mr. Edwin Hatch, Vice-Principal of St. Mary's Hall, who took for his subject the Organization of the Early Christian Churches, which he treated rather on the lucus a non lucendo principle, as his main object was to prove that they had no regular organization or ministry of their own at all. Dr. Hatch, who has now become Rector of Purleigh, discoursed on much the same theme three weeks ago in the Jerusalem Chamber, taking for his text the recently discovered Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, which he used, according to his reporter in the Guardian, to illustrate or confirm the "Hyper-Arnoldian" theory of the Bamptons, and in order to emphasize the force of its testimony, he fixed the date half a century earlier than that generally adopted by critics. It would be obvious at the first blush to remark on this that, if any inference against what Dr. Hatch calls "sacerdotalism" is to be drawn from the confessedly imperfect sacramental teaching of the "Διδαχή"—which the disciplina arcani would abundantly explain—the entire omission of any reference whatever to the Atonement and "the doctrines of grace" must present a still graver perplexity to the great majority of Christians of every school or Communion. And in fact this has led some critics to attribute the treatise to Ebionite authorship. Meanwhile we are told that, as regards the Sacraments generally, "the tendency of the lecture was to minimize the importance, almost to deny the necessity, of any means of grace," while "it was more than hinted that the Eucharist was but a social meal, in which people were to be physically well filled, though he painfully laboured to explain away the word Sacrifice, which herein (in the Teaching) is applied to it"—with direct reference, we may add, to the prediction in Malachi i. 11. But with his Bamptons and his comments on the Teaching of the Apostles we are not here immediately concerned. He has returned to the charge in an article on "The Historical Assumptions of the Ecclesiastical Courts Commission" in the Contemporary Review, which strikes, if not a bolder, a shriller note, traversing as it does with a point-blank denial "the assumptions" which have been generally accepted, by friend and foe alike, as obvious and fundamental axioms of Church history from the beginning. He starts indeed by telling us, with a frankness which leaves nothing to be desired, that he is directly and purposely challenging the fundamental principle of Anglicanism. "The Church of England exists . . . by virtue of an appeal to antiquity. Professedly basing its doctrine and organization on Scripture, it bases them in fact on early interpretations of Scripture and early institutions which are conceived to be in harmony with Scripture. Its great divines have given to this appeal an elaborate form." And "the movements which began in 1834 [1833?] has been a succession of appeals to history," and "has been thought, on the whole, to have made good its ground." It is this fundamental principle, which one might have supposed would be at once admitted as an evident truism, alike by those who do and those who do not accept the Christian revelation, that Dr. Hatch sets himself to controvene.

We have no intention here of reopening the question of the Ecclesiastical Courts Commission Report, which has already been discussed in our columns, or of reviewing the historical vindication appended to it, further than to observe that the Bishop of Chester may safely be assumed to be quite equal to the task of defending himself against Dr. Hatch. Still less shall we enter on the controversy, which some part of his argument necessarily involves, between the Church of England and the Church of Rome. The main issue raised is a purely historical one, and in that sense only will be dealt with here. The writer's view of the matter, if we rightly understand him, is closely akin to the late Dean Stanley's. He does not so much argue that the Church is, or ought to be, subordinate to the State, as that it has not, and from the nature of the case cannot have, any authority or corporate existence apart from the State; it has neither creeds, officers, rules, nor principles of its own, except so far as the State has created and sanctioned them. To quote his own historical summary:—"So far from their having been independent of the civil power, that power has been the means by which God has not only given to the Christian communities an external form and unity, but also shaped for them their discipline and their doctrine." It would be difficult to formulate the absolute non-existence of the Church, or any part of the Church, as an independent spiritual body in clearer or more emphatic language. And the object of the paper is to establish this estimate of the case as the verdict of history.

We cannot of course pretend to do more, within our present limits, than touch on a few salient points of the argument; to examine it in detail would be to write a complete Church history. And we notice at the very opening a strange contradiction. The leading fallacy of the Report—which, but for the high character of the Commissioners, would more than suggest, as is broadly hinted, "the suspicion of disingenuousness"—is their assumption that the ecclesiastical system of the middle ages is based on that of the early Church. Such an assumption is, to say the least, not an unnatural one; but the odd thing about Dr. Hatch's criticism is that, on his own showing, the Commissioners find more support for their views of ecclesiastical independence in the example of the early than of the mediæval Church, and he ends by roundly asserting that it is the condition of the early Church, before the conversion of the Empire, to which "the sacerdotal party" really desire to return. Of course he has his own explanation of this comparative independence of the early Church. It was independent, not because it was a self-governed Society, but because it had no government, and was in a state of pure anarchy, or at least pure Congregationalism, till the State came to the rescue. "In matters of discipline each community seems to have been at liberty to act for itself"; and they had no creeds. "It was not until the Christian communities acted in concert with the State that there is any evidence of their having combined as a single body for united action, or of their having had either common rules of discipline or a common formula of belief." Yet the one fact cited from Church history before the time of Constantine—because it involved an appeal to the secular arm—which Dr. Hatch even calls "the governing case," tells directly against this view of the facts. We are reminded how, when Paul of Samosata in the third century refused to recognize the verdict of the Synod which condemned him, and retained possession of his church and see-house at Antioch, the Bishops appealed to the heathen Emperor Aurelian, who accepted the decision of the Bishop of Rome in the matter and ejected him. This looks very much as if the Church had both a discipline and doctrine of her own, so well ascertained that the civil power could hardly decline in matters affecting property rights to give effect to it. As to the appeal to the Roman and Italian bishops, it was natural enough that the Emperor should take the Bishop of his Imperial city and his Suffragans as the best exponents of Church doctrine, and their sentence in fact simply reaffirmed that of the local Synod.

But after the conversion of Constantine, when "the Catholic Church"—itself a mere creature and "denotation of Roman law"—first began to act in concert and to have a common rule of discipline and faith, for this she was indebted wholly to the beneficent intervention of the State. And here again two crucial cases are cited, which to any one moderately familiar with the history of the period will appear to prove just the opposite of what the writer's argument requires—the Council of Nice, and the Donatist Schism. As to the former, it is true that the first Œcumenical Council was summoned by Constantine—according to some at the suggestion of Pope Silvester, according to others by the advice of Hosius—in any case certainly acting under episcopal guidance. It is also true that he pointedly disclaimed at its opening all right to interfere with the doctrinal decision of the controversy, and that it in fact decided in a sense exactly opposite to what he desired and had strongly urged beforehand in his letter to the Bishop of Alexandria, preserved by Eusebius, where he treats the question at issue between Arius and Athanasius as a mere quarrel about words, and wishes it to be arranged on the modern Broad Church plan of "agreeing to differ." What the Council did was to excommunicate Arius, and to formulate the Nicene Creed; and when for half a century afterwards the civil power took the Arian side, and actually persecuted the orthodox, the Church held to her decision and the Arians had eventually to succumb. That hardly looks as if "the civil power shaped the doctrine" of the Church. As to the Donatist Schism, the statement—it is a mere statement without attempt at proof—that "the question formally raised was formally decided by the State" is so marvellous that we hardly know how to deal seriously with it. Readers who know little more of theology or Church history than may be gained from Dr. Newman's Apologia will be familiar with the famous dictum of St. Augustine, Securus judicat orbis terrarum. It was the Synods of the Church which condemned Donatism, though it is unfortunately true that their authority was for a time vindicated by an appeal to "the ultima ratio of the sword," which however the murderous violence of the Circumcellions had provoked. Passing over for want of space the case of St. Ambrose and Palladius, which prove less than nothing for the Erastian argument, we come to the notorious Henoticon of the fifth century, of which Dr. Hatch thinks it enough to tell us that "the Emperors themselves sometimes promulgated doctrines, and anathematized those who declined to accept them." We doubt if he could point to any other instance of this, and the single exception is just of the kind which clinches and confirms the rule. Zeno did what Constantine vainly sought to induce the bishops of his day to do, but did not venture to do himself; he slurred over by an imperial edict—composed by or under the direction of Acacius, Bishop of Constantinople—a dispute held to concern matters of faith. The immediate result was, in Milman's words, "without reconciling the two original conflicting parties, to give rise to a third." Meanwhile the edict was at once condemned by Pope Simplician, and the first act of his successor, Felix, next year was to condemn it afresh at the head of a Synod as "an audacious proceeding of the Emperor who dared to dictate articles of faith, and seedplot of impiety," and to anathematize Acacius and all the bishops who had subscribed it. The Patriarch of Constantinople for awhile adhered to the Emperor, and a schism of East and West followed, but it was only through the abandonment of the Henoticon that it was eventually healed. Neander speaks in the same sense as Milman. As to Dr. Hatch's idea that, "supposing the support of the State had continued to be given to the decisions of the Council of Ephesus"—by which he means the Latrocinium of 449—"and the Council of Chalcedon (which condemned it two years later) had never been held, there is strong reason for believing" that Eutychianism would have become the dominant creed, it is enough to observe that the discussion of such arbitrary hypotheses, as to what would have happened if the course of Church history had been wholly different from what it was, are about as profitable as the discussion of the problem, once raised by an Evangelical preacher, as to "what would have happened to the four vast continents of Europe, Asia, Africa, and America, if Eve had never eaten that fatal apple."

Dr. Hatch admits that with the fall of the Roman Empire a considerable change came over the state of things, but he endeavours to show that "the control of the civil power over both doctrine and discipline does not diminish as we approach the threshold of the middle ages,' which is true, as no such control as he supposes had ever existed. He naturally makes the most of the influence exercised by Charlemagne on ecclesiastical legislation, but is of course obliged to allow that the whole Carolingian system "depended on the personality of the Emperor" and very soon fell to pieces after his death. And when he dwells on the legislation of mixed parliaments—like some of the Councils of Toledo—in which both laity and spirituality took part, he seems to forget that this means something very different from the ecclesiastical legislation of mixed assemblies of the kind in our own day. With very few exceptions the only educated class of the community in that age were the clergy, who therefore exercised a preponderant control even over civil legislation, and would be pretty sure to have the practical decision of all spiritual questions debated in such assemblies left in their hands. A skilful but very inaccurate use is made of the Isidorian decretals, compiled about the middle of the ninth century, which did in truth form "the historical beginning of that enormous change in ecclesiastical judicature which distinguishes the middle ages from earlier Christian times." But the change did not consist, as is here intimated, in the transformation of an Erastian into an ecclesiastical system of Church government, but in the consolidation of the Papal monarchy by a gradual subordination or extinction of the hierarchical, metropolitan, and synodical rights which had previously counterbalanced and limited it. Dr. Hatch's "historical argument," in short, is not that a true Church system was gradually corrupted into a false one, but that there was never, properly speaking, any real Church system at all; the Church never had any corporate life, except as a fraction of the civil administration. Of this view, which might be subjected to a far more searching exposure than we have room for here, we must be content to say, in the author's own words, "with such a theory the facts of history are altogether inconsistent." It may further be doubted whether such a Church as is here sketched out, apart from its unhistorical basis, would, if it existed, be of any greater practical service for religious purposes than "the Church of Humanity," which has of late been so assiduously preached to us.

THE PARIS SALON.

ALTHOUGH the average quality of the work displayed is no worse than usual, this year's exhibition is in many ways disappointing. This is especially the case with the "Salon Carré," where the most important pictures, with two exceptions, are placed. Here we find the most ambitious picture which M. Bouguereau has hitherto painted. The subject chosen is "La Jeunesse de Bacchus." A more carefully balanced composition it would be impossible to find, and the figures, nineteen in number, are fitted into the canvas with matchless dexterity; but, in spite of these merits, and of the amount of academic learning displayed in the drawing of the figures, the result obtained is anything but agreeable. The cunningly contrived contortions of the figures convey no impression of movement, and, as usual, M. Bouguereau's colour is suggestive of wax and butter rather than of flesh. In the same room hangs a picture of heroic proportions by M. Cormon, painted for the pre-historic museum at St. Germain, the subject chosen being the return from a bear-hunt in the Age of Stone. This is a grievously disappointing picture, and shows a marked falling off from the "Cain," of which we spoke at some length on a former occasion. The general effect is terribly heavy, and the manner in which the work is conceived is rather worthy of an operatic scene-painter than of a great imaginative artist such as M. Cormon has proved himself to be. Few men, indeed, could cope with the technical difficulties which such a work presents; but this does not prevent the work itself from possessing a distinctly ludicrous side. The group of stalwart ruffians who have brought home the bear in triumph is distinctly French—we had almost said Parisian—and its members appear from the melodramatic attitudes which they assume to be familiar with the "Porte St.-Martin." At the door of a large rude hut sits an old man somewhat resembling Mr. Walt Whitman, who is apparently much disgusted at being diverted from his occupation of whittling a thick stick which he nurses on his knees. It is an inexplicable circumstance that the women, whose costume is as scanty as that of the sun-browned men, should be represented with white skins. M. Raphael Collin's "Été" is a work of considerable charm, very delicate, though perhaps a trifle lifeless in its scheme of colour; there is an indefinable grace in the distant figure of the woman half wading, half swimming, in the river, which, with its thick border of trees, forms the background of the picture. There is a delicious group of three figures on the bank—those in the foreground are perhaps not quite free from the charge of affectation and a tendency to incorrect drawing. They show, however, a feeling for beauty of line which is rarely to be met with. One of the most admirable and powerful works in modern French art is the "Vengeance d'Urbain VI.," by M. Jean-Paul Laurens. The picture represents an "oubliette," in which the Pope stands feasting his revenge on the sight of the bodies of certain cardinals who lie in their red robes at the foot of the wall before him. The scene is carried out with great dramatic force, and with that highest form of technical ability which makes one forget the means employed in the end attained.

Another very powerful picture is M. Aimé Morot's "El Bravo Toro," an incident in a bull-fight rendered with scrupulous fidelity. The bull has charged an unlucky horse up against the barrier where another horse lies dead. The perfect drawing of the group, and the contrast between the furious movement of the bull and of the horse falling backwards, with the impassive pose of the picador standing in the stirrups with lance directed downwards to the bull's neck, and the carefully-studied expressions of the crowd behind, would have delighted Théophile Gautier's heart beyond measure. There is much beauty in M. Jules Breton's picture of "Les Communiantes," although it is far from ranking with the exquisite work he exhibited last year. "Sur la Route en Hiver," by the same artist, is flimsy and affected. It is with no small satisfaction that we can assert that the foremost place in landscape in this year's Salon is taken by an Englishman. The works exhibited by Mr. Harry Thompson show an alliance of poetic genius with thoroughly sound execution which makes one think of the greatest names of landscape art while looking at what he has produced, although we must add that his pictures are thoroughly original both in selection of subject and in manner of execution. The titles of his pictures are "Un Vieux Chemin—Picardie" and "Un Calvaire—Moutons." Of the two, we prefer the last, which has the sea for background. The cross from which the picture takes its name has fallen against the boughs of a tree which occupies the right-hand corner of the canvas; a few sheep, followed by the shepherd, whose eyes are directed to the cross, stray among the long grass; the remainder of the flock has taken refuge under the lee of a steep bank sloping towards the sea. We can attempt no further description of a work of which the truthfulness far above mere realism springs from a highly poetic nature. The companion picture displays one of those grand sweeps of hill, with a heavy mass of cloud on the horizon, which Mr. Thompson knows so well how to render. The sheep in the foreground are admirably treated. M. Nozal's "Etang de la Mer-Rouge à Bronne" shows a remarkable feeling for the beauty of nature—it is a work of great promise. M. Nozal also exhibits two pastels of very high excellence. A picture of the sands at Grandcamp at low tide affords a good example of M. Pelouse; the drawing and perspective are faultless, and the construction of the sky is thoroughly workmanlike, but we wish that this artist would abandon the chocolate-like scheme of colour in which he has indulged for the last few years. M. Adrien Demont exhibits a landscape, "La Nuit," of singular beauty—an expanse of undulating hills, with a pool formed by the waste water from a stone cistern in the foreground. Land and clouds are bathed in a soft luminous atmosphere, admirably felt and rendered. With a very few other exceptions the landscapes exhibited this year are wofully commonplace, and somewhat below the usual level of workmanship. Among these exceptions we may mention "La Sieste," by M. Durst; "Marécage," by M. Yon, and Montenard's "Village de Sixfours," which may fairly rank with his best productions. The unlading of a cargo of oranges and lemons at Toulon, also by M. Montenard, is a brilliant piece of colouring. We have already said that the general effect of this year's exhibition at the Palais de l'Industrie is unsatisfactory. We must add that we are more than compensated for this disappointment by the magnificent decorative work of M. Puvis de Chavannes. "Le Bois sacré, cher aux Arts et aux Muses," is, in our opinion, the finest work the master has yet produced. The noble simplicity of the groups of figures and the broad grandeur of the landscape are beyond all praise. The reflection in slightly troubled water of a brilliant yellow sky and a crescent moon has a majestic splendour of colour that we have rarely seen approached. If we have any fault to find in this great work of imagination, it must be with two figures of boys in the right-hand corner, which seem unfortunately weak in drawing and perhaps somewhat wanting in intention. "La Maladie; la Convalescence—diptyque," by M. Besnard, shows decorative qualities of a high order, and a power of draughtsmanship far above the average. In a Salon which, it must be confessed, is singularly poor in portraits, M. Besnard takes a foremost place with his admirable portrait of M. Francis Magnard, which displays extraordinary vitality and precision of modelling, and (in water-colour) of M. Legros, looking round from the etching-table at which he is seated. The perfect resemblance and the life that abounds in the face and hands, and in the sudden movement which is indicated in every fold of the coat, make this the work of an artist of genius. The accessories are dealt with in masterly fashion, and the simplicity of the means employed is beyond all praise. We may also call attention to a portrait of M. E. Bock, by M. Henry Rachou, which is alike excellent in the power of seizing character which it betrays and in its truth of colour and sterling honesty of execution. Mr. Sargent's portrait of a lady is the most disquieting object that eyes ever looked upon. The hideous colour and the fantastic drawing which Mr. Sargent has brought together in this strange work fairly puzzle the will. Mr. Whistler's portraits of Carlyle and of Miss Alexander are probably familiar to our readers. We may state that the portrait of Carlyle appears to have gained much from time. M. Ribot's "Portrait de ma Fille" is worthy of his great reputation, and is very impressive in effect. M. Henner is seen at his best in "Nymphe qui pleure," a kneeling figure, with M. Henner's usual conventional background. The colour of the flesh and hair is of unapproachable brilliancy, and the transitions from light to shadow are exquisitely subtle. His "Christ au Tombeau" is painfully mannered. To M. Bompard honour is due for exhibiting the "Frenchiest" picture in the Salon. In his "Boucher Tunisien" we have livers, lights, and all manner of viscera, besides the amorously wrought print of a bloody hand on a wall.

To turn to more engaging subjects, M. Heilbuth sends a deliciously fresh river-scene entitled "Promenade," with ladies in a boat in the foreground. One of the marked successes of the year is "A la salle Graffard," by M. Jean Béraud. The picture represents a revolutionary meeting. A joyously disreputable orator, with hand uplifted and the inevitable glass of sugar-and-water by his side, shouts from the "tribune," to the huge delight of a crowd of men and women enveloped in tobacco-smoke, while a group of imperturbable reporters write at a table. The execution is wonderfully dexterous, and the various types of character are portrayed with rare felicity. Altogether, we suspect that M. Béraud would pass a very bad quarter of an hour if the Commune were to regain power in Paris. M. Benjamin Constant contributes the best work he has hitherto produced. "Les Chérifas" is, in fact, a chef d'œuvre of Oriental painting. The flesh painting of the figures of the women who lie listlessly on the gorgeous divan against the wall of the harem is admirably rich, and the figure of the woman sitting with her body sharply upright and arms down is wonderful in its allure. The flash and colour of the jewels she wears are marvellously rendered, and the treatment of texture is throughout fairly astonishing in its perfection. The picture is perfectly enveloped in a rich half-light, while two brilliant sunbeams strike the wall above the figures, and broad daylight streams on the figure of the guard at the door in one corner. M. Lefebvre is not seen to advantage in a vaporous chalky female figure, entitled "L'Aurore"; neither can we see anything to admire in M. Dagnan-Bouveret's "Hamlet et les Fossoyeurs." His Hamlet is an unmistakable Frenchman of rather an objectionable type, and there is an offensive spruceness about the whole picture. His portrait of M. Courtois has many good qualities. M. Van Marcke's absence is keenly felt among the painters of animals, although we find a fine picture of cows—"Pâturage—environs de la Haye," by M. Mauve. M. Vuillefroy sends two good pictures of cattle, and M. Guignard exhibits a clever study of a calf being fed. The most powerful animal picture exhibited is that by M. Dupré, "La Prairie Normande"—a girl with two cows in a Normandy meadow—a work which shows great vigour and power of technique. Mr. Dannat sends a remarkable picture of a Spanish interior entitled "Un Quatuor," and Mr. Hawkins shows a marked advance in "Pauvres Gens," a subject taken from a poem by M. Coppée. There is a great refinement of feeling in this picture. M. Comerre's "Pierrot" is an elaborate study in white, showing wonderful facility of execution. "La Rentrée," by M. Israels, is fully worthy of his name. We conclude by calling attention to two beautiful and original little pictures by M. Ménard, "Les premiers Astronomes" and "Ruth et Booz," and to a conscientious study of a head, "Une Vénitienne," by Mr. Bottomley.

SOUTHWELL AND LICHFIELD.

ON Wednesday and Thursday of last week there were functions in two adjacent Cathedrals in the rolling woody midlands which had, formally speaking, nothing to do with each other, but which could hardly be dissociated in thought by those to whom the rapid and general development of the Cathedral system in England is a matter of great interest as much for its practical utility as for its artistic attractiveness. Out of the two counties which make up the fresh diocese of Southwell, Nottinghamshire is a clear gainer by the new creation which has set up the see-town in its midst. In ancient times the county was a spur of the north, projecting into midland England as a member both of the province and of the diocese of York, boasting of old days of its Archbishop's palace at Southwell, and proud of its collegiate church at the same place. Southwell Minster was a collegiate church, in the size and beauty of the structure as well as in legal incidents and in its remote antiquity, but it had been afflicted with a constitution which seemed as if intended to reduce the theory of corporate churches to an absurdity, for it had sixteen prebendaries, but no dean or other head, and its statutes only demanded quadrennial residence.

In the innovating days of 1840 and the following years the Chapter of Southwell, which might have been made useful, as the collegiate churches of Manchester and Ripon were in being constituted seats of new bishoprics, was doomed to gradual extinction, and Notts itself was carried over to the province of Canterbury and diocese of Lincoln, near which it lay conveniently, but to which it had been from the earliest days of English Christianity a perfect stranger. Abortive projects of a Bishop of Southwell were breathed from time to time and died away, till Sir Richard Cross arose to make them a reality. We cannot say so much as to the advantage which has accrued to the other county which has helped to make up the see of Southwell. Derbyshire had never had a bishop of its own, but it had for twelve hundred years belonged to what Dr. Ridding picturesquely called the imperial see of Lichfield, and now it continues to have no bishop of its own and to be involved in the moil and toil of organizing a new ecclesiastical community. Still we believe that the sacrifice is for the present a necessity, as we are convinced, and as we have taken occasion to say, that Southwell is the only possible see-town for the diocese which includes Nottingham and Derby.

The diocese of Southwell having by great munificence been constituted, and Dr. Ridding having been consecrated first Bishop, he was enthroned in the old minster, now transformed into a cathedral, on Wednesday in last week with general contentment. The church, full as it is of ecclesiological interest and beauty, looked its best, the altar in its seemly appointments was a landmark of progress, the day was fine, the ceremonial was decorously and solemnly ritual (not ritualistic), the gathering of clergy was multitudinous, and lay folk thronged, the one defect being the shortcoming of territorial magnates. The Bishop's sermon was in excellent English, and not incapable of being glossed according to the hearer's prepossessions As, however, the upshot seemed to be no persecution, persons were in general well content.

This is not the time to describe the minster. We need only say that it enters the ranks of English Cathedrals with very distinct characteristics. The broad and massive Norman nave, with the flat pilaster-like shafts to the triforium, and the circular clerestory lights, form a type of the style which is not Durham, or Ely, or Waltham. The Early Pointed choir is less distinctive, but is beautiful; while the Middle Pointed octagonal Chapter-house with its carvings of foliage, while much smaller than those of York, Wells, and Westminster, is of a like artistic quality. The conical cappings have been replaced on the two western of the three Norman towers, and in place of the ruined Palace at the west end, the generosity of Bishop Trollope and of others is raising hard by a new pile, of which a very successful hall designed by Mr. Bodley, has been completed.

The function at Lichfield was more elaborate in its details, although of a less exceptional character than the one at Southwell, and it was linked with the permanent embellishment of the structure. Between a quarter of a century and thirty years back Lichfield, then ruled by Dean Howard, under the advice of Sir Gilbert Scott, took an early lead in the now universal work of Cathedral restoration, and we remember that we called attention at the time to the phenomenon, then less a matter of course than it has since become, of the ceremonial of the reopening having evoked an external demonstration of popular favour. Since that day Lichfield has gone on, with various changes of Bishop, Dean, and Canons, holding, and more than holding, its own among cathedrals that work and are felt until the present Dean, Dr. Bickersteth, resolved upon an effort to supply the feature still most chiefly wanting towards the old completeness of the pile. The interior had been carefully and richly restored, whitewash had given way to the delicate rose-coloured stone, a series of modern monuments of unusual merit had gradually thronged the east end; while outside the three spires stood up far and near a unique landmark. But the western façade, which had in the middle ages vied with Wells and Salisbury in its well-grouped ranges of effigies, now only showed a crumbling mass of grimy plaster shams and a few battered figures. This was what the Dean resolved upon setting right, and he has carried through his bold intention. The west end, under Mr. J. O. Scott's care, is now of red sandstone, and most of the effigies have been placed on their renewed pedestals. These, without being of the highest art, adequately and congruously make up a telling architectural picture. A large proportion are the handiwork of Miss Grant. A rather less pronounced action in some of the figures would have been preferable.

With a restored west front came a restored organ and elaborate services, while processions and thronging congregations celebrated the double incident. The Archbishop of Canterbury preached one of the sermons, and again took the opportunity of expounding that theory of the place of cathedrals in the economy of the Church of which he has so firm a grasp, and which, as enforced by one in his position, is likely to bear good fruit. During the present week Lichfield Cathedral has become the scene of another experiment in the practical working of the Cathedral system, for its Bishop held there a Diocesan Synod, the first since the Reformation, of its clergy, now reduced to Staffordshire and half Salop. This Synod was not merely one of clerical delegates, which was all that Bishop Phillpotts attempted at Exeter in 1851, but of all the clergy of the diocese.

A WINTER WALK IN GERMANY.

THERE is a great difference between the serious student and the mere collector of folk-lore. If the work of the former is to possess any value, he must be a man of wide reading, of large linguistic attainments, and of considerable critical ability. None of these things are requisite in him who is content simply to record the songs, the legends, and the superstitions of the people, as Sir Walter Scott did, long before they were supposed to possess a scientific value or the earliest of his published poems was planned. The wider the collector's knowledge is, the greater his pleasure, both in acquiring and arranging his materials, will doubtless become; but the only gifts the pursuit demands in him at starting are a facility in conversing with country people of all classes, and a strict accuracy in noting down what they say. It is only fair to add that in Northern Europe he is not likely to find much that is absolutely new. Earlier writers have borne away the rich sheaves of the harvest, and he must be content to glean after them. Besides this, the beliefs and usages of which he is in search are rapidly dying out, and it must be confessed that the survivals of the spirit-world display a lamentable want of originality; the same tale is told of a dozen haunted castles, and the ghost of one churchyard has usually contracted the idiotic habits of his kinsman in the next. Such treasures as those contained in the Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border and Grimm's Fairy Tales are no longer to be found in the countries that once yielded them so freely. The collector is as unlikely to discover a new fairy-tale as a new butterfly; he must be content with variations and comparatively unimportant superstitions. But the search for these has a charm; it may prove the motive of many a pleasant ramble, it adds a zest to more distant excursions, and enables him to pass not unpleasantly one of the rainy days which are the chief annoyance of those who travel on foot. Above all, it brings him constantly into contact with the simplest and most healthy forms of human life; and this in itself is an advantage. He learns to love the company of old people and little children, and is pretty certain never to become an admirer of M. Zola.

Though Germany has been more fully explored in this direction than almost any other country, it still possesses peculiar attractions for the collector. The peasantry in the Centre and the South are more easily accessible than English farm-labourers, and their minds are more richly stored with the wisdom and foolishness of the past. Not that they are more superstitious; the ancient rite has become a mere game, and the charm a jest; the old story is told oftener than not with an incredulous smile; but even the middle-aged are not afraid that you will laugh at them for talking about such matters, and the aged love to dwell upon them, together with the other memories of their youth. Every district, too, has its own peculiar character. In East Friesland the legends are dark, stern, at times tragic; even when heathen in their origin, they have been remoulded by the spirit of a firm Protestant faith. In Central Germany they are brighter and more humorous, occasionally more grotesque; the deepest note they touch is a certain pensive tenderness, and hardly a trace of conscious Christianity is to be found among them, though here and there the memory of a saint now forgotten in the district may be found in a strange combination with other materials. In the Austrian Alps, again, they are more graceful, imaginative, pathetic, and almost invariably strongly coloured by Catholicism. Thus the Frau Berchta or Frau Hohle of other districts here becomes the Wife of Pilate, to whom popular fancy has assigned a sad but not ignoble fate in the other world. As she confessed the truth and yet was not baptized, her spirit is doomed to wander through the earth till the Judgment Day, and to her the souls of all unbaptized children are gathered. Of summer nights she leads them through the corn and flax fields, where they pluck off the mildewed ears and the harmful insects, and bear them away in their little pitchers; but in winter, particularly about Christmas-time, the strange procession will sometimes pass through a village in which an inconsolate mother dwells, and then a little hand will tap at the window, and when the mourner looks out she will see her child, no longer the baby they carried to the churchyard six months ago, but a little bright-eyed thing who, if it had a living body, one would take to be three or four years old. Yet she knows at once that it is her own, and it says, "Mother, you must stop crying, all your tears fall into my pitcher, it has grown so heavy that I can scarcely carry it, and they drip down on my clothes and make them so cold and cumbersome that I can't keep up with the rest." If the mother glances down the street she will see a form so bright "that you might have taken it for Our Lady's," with a throng of little children crowding round her, "as if they loved her."

If you chance upon a young wife who has lost her first-born within a few minutes of its birth, you may hear such a story as this even on a summer excursion, and if you have once heard it from such lips you will not be likely to forget it; but the collector's true harvest-time is winter, when the nights are long and little can be done in the fields. You can allow yourself a week or ten days' holiday, and await the first frost that promises to be permanent as eagerly as the fox-hunter expects a thaw. As soon as it comes, you pack your knapsack with what comforts you believe to be indispensable, and a quantity of paper cut in the form you habitually use, so that on your return you can slip each leaf into its proper portfolio without trouble. You carry your note-book in your pocket where you can reach it at any moment, and are prepared to start. You are living in Central Germany, let us say, and far away among the hills there is a village with a good country inn—not an hotel—which is to be your headquarters. The railway passes within some fifteen or twenty miles of it, and you take your place so as to arrive at the most convenient station in the evening of the first day. Here you probably dine ill and sleep worse. The bedroom, which seems an ice-house when you enter it, has grown intolerably close and hot before it is time for you to rise; yet you dare not open a window. The outer air is too keen for any constitution to bear the change of temperature which the smallest opening would suddenly cause. You get up therefore with a sick headache, and loathe the breakfast you ordered overnight. Still it must be eaten if the cold is to be faced. As soon as you issue from the house where you have left your rugs, every uncovered part of your body tingles as if it had been beaten with stinging-nettles; but the sun is shining brightly from a cloudless sky. There is no sign of snow which might afford you an excuse for returning at once to your comfortable rooms. It is with some despondency you feel that the adventure has been begun and must be carried out to the bitter end. For an hour or so your path leads you through an open plain, which is in fact the bottom of a broad valley. It is utterly wearisome. The fields are not yet clad in the garment of snow which lends a glimmering charm to the most prosaic landscape. Everything is stark, and black, and dead; the withered leaf hangs motionless from the bough; for there is no stir in the air, and it is well for you that there is none, for a wind would render it almost impossible for you to take your walks abroad while the thermometer stands as it does at $-16°$ R. But suddenly the scene changes, the road takes a sharp turn into a narrow gorge, thickly wooded with fir. What in summer was a wild and noisy brook is now a silent mass of ice. Wherever there is a comparatively quiet space it glitters with white crystal blades, out of which the great frost flowers rise. From the road these might almost be mistaken for water-lilies, but on nearer inspection they are found to consist of larger crystals, about an inch in diameter at the base, and from an inch and a half to two inches in height, grouped in a circle and marked by the most delicate tracery. Round them the ice is quite bare, and generally of a brownish black. The little waterfalls by the wayside, too, are all changed into Elfin grottoes with fantastic ice porticoes. All these things interest you, and you walk quickly, and yet somehow you seem to get forward but slowly. It is not the chilliness of the air, so much as the weight of your winter clothing, that makes the miles seem so long, and you are glad when the gorge opens, and after a steep ascent you reach the village in which you intend to lunch.

There is not much life in the inn; but the landlady—a good, kindly, shiftless creature—is glad to have an opportunity of chatting with a stranger in this quiet season of the year, and so she seats herself with her work at the end of the table. After satisfying her curiosity by telling her you are travelling for pleasure, to see the mountains in winter, which she evidently thinks rather absurd, you turn to other subjects. There is a cross-bill in the room, confined in a wooden cage so small that it can hardly turn in it. You ask her why she keeps it, and she tells you it has a wonderful power of attracting to itself every disease that would otherwise prey upon the household, in such a way that it dies and the children remain well—"at least, that is what they say, and when one has children one cannot be too careful of them." The old Northern story, which is best known to Englishmen by Longfellow's little poem, will at once occur to you. Was this the blessing that was pronounced upon the bird—that it, too, should be able to suffer and to die for men? There is something pleasing in the thought, but the reader will be more successful than the writer if he is able to find any authentic trace of the legend in districts where the superstition is universal.

In the meantime other guests have arrived who have been to a neighbouring market-town, and want a dram to keep out the cold. As your lunch is finished, and you are going in the same direction, you join them; their company makes the way seem shorter, though you are not likely to pick up much to suit your purpose from them, except some such remark as this:—"You know why Providence didn't give the goat as long a tail as the cow?" "No." "Because he would only have switched his own eyes out with it." In about an hour your ways part; your own leads up a somewhat toilsome ascent. First, you pass a beech wood, every sprig of which is hung with long, delicate pointed crystals, thin and dainty as the frost flowers on a window. The trees are so thickly covered that it is difficult to understand whence the diamond fragments which lie scattered round your feet have fallen, though you soon notice that it is the birds that knock them down. The afternoon sun is shining brightly on your right, and the whole wood is ablaze with a splendour such as summer cannot rival. When you issue from it you come upon a piece of open ground, which is probably marshy in summer; the only trees before you are a few mountain ash scattered here and there along the road, each of which, as you approach it, you find to be clamorous with the birds that are eagerly stripping it of its berries. By the time you reach the watershed you are glad that you will have no more climbing to do to-day, and shortly afterwards you overtake the carrier-woman. She looks old and infirm, and you hope it is genuine pity that induces you to unbuckle your knapsack, to throw it upon her hand-cart, and to offer to drag the whole to the next village; but it is true that the straps have been galling your shoulders for the last few hours, and the change of motion is a relief. If you expected any pleasant conversation you are disappointed; the good lady who trots along by your side is evidently one of those who are constantly sacrificing themselves for the children and grandchildren whose lives they render unbearable by their constant complaints. Even to you she shows at least as much peevishness as gratitude, and the only remark of the slightest interest which she makes is that the new clergyman does not believe in the Devil, "but then he is young, and never had the rheumatism."

The sun has set when you leave her at her own door, and the road, which once again enters the pine forest, becomes dark and gloomy, though wherever the boughs part you catch a glimpse of the brightening stars. The cold, too, becomes more bitter than it has seemed since the first hour of your walk, but you do not much care, as you are now within a measurable distance of your dinner. On the bridge you pause a moment to cast a glance at the black water-wheel, studded over with huge icicles, which stands motionless on the solid mill-run; it looks strangely "uncanny" in the first rays of the rising moon. Then come the warm, cosy lights of the cottage windows, and in five minutes more you are in your inn. Your arrival is an event. You find the clergyman seated in the place of honour, the chief foresters, the head-gamekeeper, the proprietor of the saw-mills you have just passed, and a few of the richer peasants; all the aristocracy of the village, in fact, are grouped round the table. In summer this circle would rather avoid than seek your acquaintance, but a winter tourist is at least as rare as a black swan. They make room for you at once, and are eager to hear your adventures, or anything else you may have to say. In these circumstances it will be your own fault if you have not established friendly relations with all of them before the evening is over.

A QUADRANGULAR DUEL.

THE Metaphysical Society is dead. It died two or three years ago. But since it was, during its lifetime, a virtuous entity which promoted the welfare of mankind, the work it did still constitutes a factor in the progress of things in general. It has no longer any conscious existence, but its posthumous activity is still with us, and its posthumous activity consists chiefly of the magazine somewhat clumsily entitled the Nineteenth Century. Thus it happens that when the metaphysicians who made up the Society (and who are, most of them, still happily alive) feel constrained to make any observations, they can do so much as before, the principal difference being, that whereas formerly such observations were made for the edification of only a select circle of acquaintances, they are now published for the instruction of the world at large. During the first half of 1884 a controversy of an unusually picturesque and gratifying kind, upon a matter of the greatest possible interest to everybody, has been carried on chiefly under the editorial auspices of Mr. Knowles, the four combatants, each of whom has delivered himself of one dischargo, being men whose opinions and modes of thought differ, each one from all the others, about as widely as possible. The four are Mr. Herbert Spencer, Mr. Frederic Harrison, Mr. Wilfrid Ward, and Sir James Stephen, and the subject of their disputation is the prospect of religion in the near future.

Mr. Spencer may be regarded as the original challenger. At the beginning of the year he stepped into the arena and fired off an article called "Religion; a Retrospect and Prospect." The substance of it was, briefly, that all religions were in their origin identical with ghost stories, and were more deserving of the attention of Mr. Myers and Mr. Gurney than of the readers of the Nineteenth Century. As to religion, it had been reserved for Mr. Herbert Spencer, in the year 1884, to say the last word about it. This last word is that we are "ever in presence of an Infinite and Eternal Energy from which all things proceed"; that we do not, and never can, though perhaps some quite different and very superior sort of people, if there were any, could, know anything more about this Energy than the facts already stated, and that cultivated persons often derive some amount of satisfaction from their knowledge of these facts. This was the profession of faith of the self-appointed champion of Agnosticism. This blast having been blown, the challenge was not immediately taken up. February came, and the monthly reviews were published, but as far as the ultimate result of religious speculation was concerned there was silence. Every one appeared to be willing that Mr. Spencer should be left undisturbed in his probably solitary ecstasy of contemplation of the Infinite and Eternal Energy. But this forbearance could not endure. The prospect of tearing Mr. Spencer in pieces, and exposing his cui bono in all its naked deformity, was too alluring to be resisted. Accordingly, as when, in a languishing debating society, somebody has laid himself open to obvious retorts, and his resumption of his seat is followed by a pause, some veteran of the club rises modestly, and prefacing his observations with "Having waited, Mr. Chairman, in the hope that some worthier member, &c.," proceeds to dance upon his victim, so on the 1st of March did Mr. Frederic Harrison, the chosen champion of latter-day theology, and the hero of innumerable similar conflicts, stride into the well-known lists, and join issue with the presumptuous foe. Mr. Harrison is a person of much humour, and he is accordingly by no means ashamed ab hoste doceri. Ten of the twelve pages contained in "The Ghost of Religion" might, not to say have, with the slightest alteration of specific terms, been addressed to Mr. Harrison himself. "Worship the Unknowable?" exclaimed Mr. Harrison; "pray to X to lighten the burdens of life? Find a base of belief and duty in an Infinite and Eternal Energy so neutral and impersonal that even its worshippers can only call it 'it,' and not 'He'? Expect to satisfy the craving common to all men for some unseen sort of a something to compensate for the existence of evil by presenting them with such a boneless abstraction as this? Preposterous!" And Mr. Harrison was even so far carried away by the torrent of his lively criticism as to laugh at "the Unknowable" for "getting itself spelt with a capital U," and generally to make as much fun of the lavish use of capitals as Thackeray did in the parody which gave so much offence to the author of Maltravers. But in one thing Mr. Harrison quite agreed with Mr. Spencer. It was quite true that the day of Christianity and its contemporary religions was past, and quite true that some substitute was required, though it could not be found in an Infinite and Eternal Energy, any more than in the discarded speculations about ghosts with which Mr. Spencer credits our simple forefathers. This was the opportunity to bring in Charles I. We must have a religion, and since we cannot worship an "it," our religion must be anthropomorphic. What, then, remains? Why, of course, "Humanity is the grandest object of reverence within the region of the real and the known, Humanity with the world on which it rests as its base and environment." Mr. Harrison concludes his paper, the iconoclastic part of which is admirable, with this brief but fervent assurance to all whom it may concern that Codlin is their friend, not Short. This was Mr. Harrison's shot, fired at Mr. Spencer with, it must be admitted, sufficiently destructive effects, and then it was Mr. Harrison's turn to receive the fire of Mr. Wilfrid Ward, the champion of the older form of religion which Messrs. Spencer and Harrison had agreed in treating with such lordly contempt. As might be expected, Mr. Ward, whose article appears in this month's National Review, is very merry and very amusing over his two predecessors. He begins by likening his immediate adversary, Mr. Harrison, to a most entertaining lunatic, who showed a sane visitor over the asylum in which he was confined. Everything he did and said was perfectly reasonable until he came to show off his last specimen of a monomaniac. This poor fool, he said, actually supposed himself to be Alexander the Great, in which he was "quite wrong, for I am Philip of Macedon, and my son was a much taller man than that." Similarly, Mr. Harrison was quite sane as long as he was exposing the absurdity of Mr. Spencer's Energy, and only showed of what stuff he was made when he began to sound the praises of his own Humanity. The difference between Mr. Spencer and Mr. Harrison was the difference between Tweedledum and Tweedledee. The one thing on which they were agreed, and which was therefore true, was that you must have a religion of some kind, from which Mr. Ward had no difficulty in proving that the only possible one was Christianity. It is a pity that Mr. Ward did not publish his article sooner. He was so long taking aim that Sir James Stephen, who had to fire the concluding shot, got tired of waiting for him, and in the event the two last weapons went off simultaneously. Owing to this hitch, Sir James Stephen covers a good deal of the same ground as Mr. Ward. He likens his two victims to the well-known pot and kettle, and proceeds to demolish them both. By dint of being a lawyer as well as a metaphysician, Sir James has acquired a disagreeable habit of inquiring into the meaning of words, and this enables him to demonstrate in a convincing manner that Mr. Spencer's disquisitions about Effort, Force, and Energy have no meaning at all, and might as well have been left unwritten. He then insists upon the exceeding flimsiness of Mr. Harrison's deity with a force and freshness which are really surprising, considering that he is doing it, as he himself candidly observes, "for perhaps the fiftieth time." One of his sentences is so refreshing to the healthy mind that we cannot refrain from reproducing it:—"Mankind is the object of our worship—mankind, a stupid, ignorant, half beast of a creature, the most distinguished specimens of which have passed their lives in chasing chimæras, and believing and forcing others to believe in fairy tales about them—a creature made up mostly of units, of which a majority cannot even read, whilst only a small minority have the time, or the means, or the ability to devote any considerable part of their thoughts to anything but daily labour. For my part, I would as soon worship the ugliest idol in India, before which a majority of the Queen's subjects chop off the heads of poor little goats."

By these and similar expressions is Mr. Harrison's own poor ghost of a religion made mince-meat of. So far Sir James Stephen and Mr. Ward to the same effect, each applauding Mr. Harrison for his destruction of Mr. Spencer, and each turning Mr. Harrison's guns against himself, and taking cruelly complete advantage of the weak point Mr. Harrison had left in his own lines. But after this comes the part of Sir James Stephen's paper which is really a reply upon Mr. Ward, and which ought therefore, if the combat had been fought out upon strictly chronological principles, to have succeeded it instead of accompanying it in publication. For whereas Mr. Ward concludes that the Agnostic and the Positivist, having failed to supply the blank left by their supposed destruction of existing religious sentiment, have thereby shown that they have failed to destroy it, and that it is, in fact, as necessary and as much justified in its existence as ever, Sir James Stephen tells quite another tale. Upon the question whether the general belief in Christianity is really going, as Mr. Spencer and Mr. Harrison suppose, to fade away and expire, the judge does not commit himself to any opinion; but he suggests hypothetically a view which, as far as we know, has never been stated openly before, and which, whether we agree with it or not, deserves attention. Suppose, says Sir James Stephen, that Agnostics, or Positivists, or any one else should succeed in persuading people at large that Christian theology is not true, then we may confidently expect that the morality which is distinctively Christian will die with it. If people cease to believe Christian dogmas, they will cease to believe, or to profess to believe, in the virtue of self-sacrifice as such. They will not any longer profess to believe it right to turn the other cheek to the smiter, or to make over one's coat to the spoiler of one's cloak. But so far from declaring, like Mr. Ward, that some religion which will inculcate these duties is necessary, Sir James Stephen thinks that we shall get on about as well as we hitherto have without believing them to be duties at all. For he advances the bold proposition that no religion has ever been really popular or enthusiastically adopted by the mass of mankind. People have acquiesced, he thinks, in these particular theories as part of a religion which they have accepted as a whole, but they have not practically believed in them enough to make their conduct habitually conform to them. And he suggests that, if these particular parts of Christian morality are abandoned, there will still remain a substantial amount of morality independent of theology, and not very much less in extent than that which now practically regulates the lives of most people. Therefore, while agreeing with Mr. Ward that the two earlier disputants have attempted to set up new gods of no value, he denies his inference that theology cannot be suffered to become extinct, and asserts, on the contrary, that, if it should become extinct, it would make less practical difference than most people are apt to suppose.

The quadrangular duel is thus complete. No Theology, anthropomorphic or otherwise, says Mr. Spencer, but an Infinite and Eternal Energy. Neither Theology nor Infinite Energy, but the truly anthropomorphic Religion of Humanity, says Mr. Harrison. Neither Energy nor Humanity, but Theology, says Mr. Ward. Certainly not Energy or Humanity, says Sir James Stephen, and as for Theology we shall be able to get along without it if necessary, and shall certainly be much better without any meaningless shams in substitution for it.

RACING AT EPSOM.

ONE of the most important things in a racecourse is elastic turf; but at the late Epsom meeting the ground was as hard as iron, and almost without herbage. Owners of valuable race-horses had good cause to tremble when they saw them battering their legs on ground that rivalled flagstones in consistency. Yet a two-year-old that had cost 3,000 guineas as a yearling was brought out on the first day for the Woodcote Stakes. This was the Duke of Portland's Rosy Morn, and he was opposed by his stable companion Baron L. de Hirsch's Laverock, a colt which had been purchased for a very similar sum early in May. Other owners, however, were less adventurous; and the field for the Woodcote Stakes was the smallest on record, only four of the fifty-one horses entered taking part in the race. Laverock had already won two races, and Rosy Morn was to run for the first time, yet 5 to 2 was laid on the latter, while 7 to 1 was laid against the former. Ducat and Ierne, a colt and a filly by Kisber and Hermit, who had never before run in public, were about as much fancied as Laverock. Ducat, closely followed by Rosy Morn, made the running, and Laverock and Ierne came on together a short distance off. Half way down the hill Rosy Morn, who was close to the rails, took the lead, and came into the straight clear away from the other horses. A quarter of a mile from the winning-post Cannon brought Laverock gradually forward, and at the distance Laverock's head was at Rosy Morn's girths; but at that moment Archer roused Rosy Morn, who shot away at once and bounded in three lengths in advance of Laverock. The other pair were some distance off at the finish. Rosy Morn is by Rosicrucian out of Bonnie Katie, and while he shows all the quality that might be expected from such high breeding, he is on a larger scale than many of the stock of his sire. He is entered for the Two Thousand, the Derby, and the St. Leger of next year, and if he keeps sound, it is not unlikely that he may become a leading favourite for one of those races.

There was a fine race for the Juvenile Plate between St. Rule, ridden by Rossiter, and Gaythorn, ridden by Cannon. Gaythorn appeared to have the race in hand at the distance, but St. Rule rushed up and snatched the prize from him by a head at the winning-post. Shrivenham, who had been the first favourite, was a bad third. There was a fine race, again, for the Chetwynd Plate, which was won by the first favourite, Mr. L. de Rothschild's Aladdin, a two-year-old by the Derby winner Sir Bevys; but the odds of 3 to 1, which had been laid on him, were scarcely justified, as he only won by a neck.

We described the Derby at some length last week. The objection which was lodged against St. Gatien by Sir John Willoughby a day or two after the race excited but languid interest, as it could in no way affect the disposal of the bets. The only other race of special interest on the Wednesday was for the Stanley Stakes, which immediately followed the Derby. Grecian Bride, who had run Lonely to a head at Newmarket, was made a very strong favourite. She won in a canter by a length and a half, and she ran like a smart filly. Her breeding is good, too, as she is by Hermit out of La Belle Hélène. She shows many excellent points, but exception has been taken to her loins and the length of her back.

The Epsom Grand Prize, which is run for on the Thursday of the Epsom week, is one of the most valuable three-year-old races of the season. The Derby was worth 4,850*l.* this year, and the Epsom Grand Prize 3,782*l.*; but the entrance for the Derby is 50*l.*, and half forfeit, whereas it is only 25*l.* and 10*l.* forfeit for the Grand Prize. Thirteen horses came out to run for it last week; the only competitors that had run in the Derby on the previous day being St. Médard, who had started second favourite for that race, and Woodstock, who had made the running for a short distance as the field went up the hill. Cherry was a very strong favourite. This filly had run once last year and once this year, winning on both occasions. She had been a late foal, and consequently had not run in public until the autumn, when she came out for the Cheveley Stakes at Newmarket, and won in a canter by half a dozen lengths. This spring she had started only fourth or fifth favourite, at 10 to 1, for the Kempton Park Grand Prize, in which she was giving weight to everything in the race, but she won easily by two lengths. Only 6 to 4 was now laid against her for the Epsom Grand Prize, although she looked rather rough in her coat, and some critics thought she moved a little short in her preliminary canter. Fantail, who was receiving 7 lbs. from Cherry, was a good second favourite. When receiving 13 lbs. from Superba, she had run her to a head, and she had won four races. Other backers fancied St. Médard, who was receiving 2 lbs. and sex from the favourite. Kinsky also was supported by many people at about the same odds as St. Médard. He had been a very moderate two-year-old, but he had won the only races for which he had run this season. Campanile made the running as far as the road, St. Médard following with a cluster of horses in close pursuit, among which were Cherry and Kinsky. About a quarter of a mile from the winning-post, Archer, who was riding Cherry rather near the rails, saw an opportunity of getting through the cluster by which he had been shut in, and immediately dashed to the front. Almost at the same moment Cannon shot forward on Kinsky, on the other side of the course, and from this point the race virtually became a match between Kinsky and Cherry. It was a very fine struggle, and the two famous jockeys had to use all their skill. Opposite the Stand, Kinsky seemed to be overhauling Cherry, and he succeeded in getting up to her neck, but the filly stayed the longest and won by half a length. Cherry, like Harvester, is by Sterling; her dam, Cherry Duchess, is by the Duke, and she inherits double crosses, within the fifth degree, of the blood of no less than five different sires. The Royal Stakes on the same afternoon produced an interesting race between Thebais, Coruuna, and Modred. Thebais was giving 3 st. 5 lbs. to the former and 3 st. to the latter, but after a splendid struggle she won by a head, while Coruuna beat Modred by a neck. The pace at which the race was run told against Thebais, under her very heavy weight, for Deceiver went away from the start, as hard as he could, leading at one time by half a dozen lengths.

In noticing the race for the Oaks, it is necessary to recall the race for the One Thousand Guineas. Busybody had won the latter race by half a length from Queen Adelaide, and Whiteloek had been a length behind Queen Adelaide, while Sandiway was close up; but, as the last-named filly had been scratched for the Oaks, we need say nothing further about her. Legacy had also run, but she had had enough of it before reaching the Abingdon Bottom. Superba had been unplaced in the Two Thousand, the only race for which she had started this season; but it was understood that she had wintered very badly, and it was generally agreed, among judges of racing, that she was far below her best form on the day of that race. As it was, she had run fairly, finishing fourth, about three-quarters of a length behind Harvestor and St. Médard, who were only separated by a head. The official handicapper had estimated her at 7 lbs. below Busybody, and 3 lbs. below Queen Adelaide. Last year she had beaten Queen Adelaide at even weights, and Talisman, and Harvester (twice), giving him weight on each occasion. She had won seven races, and had earned considerably more than six thousand pounds in stakes; so that, if she should have returned to her two-year-old form, there was no denying the fact that she would have a great chance of winning the Oaks. Quilt, a chestnut filly by Hermit, had won four of the dozen races for which she ran last year. Her form had not been of the highest class, and she had not been out before this season; but Hermits are so often dangerous when least expected, that they must always be taken into account when they start for a race, even when their previous performances have been but second-rate. Kinfauns had only won one race out of six last year, but she had run St. Médard to a neck, and she had run within a length and a half of Harvestor. Like Quilt, she had not run in public this season before the Oaks.

Nine fillies went to the post, where there was some delay owing to the vagaries of Whitelock, who was very fretful and caused several false starts. Kinfauns, Legacy, and Pinta made most of the running, but as they were going round Tattenham Corner, Busybody began to work her way to the front, and on crossing the road she took the lead, attended by Quilt, Kinfauns, and Wild Shot. Halfway up the straight, Queen Adelaide came up to the leading horses as if she were going to gallop past them, and Superba, who was ridden by Archer, was following in a manner which seemed to threaten danger, especially when the usual tactics of her jockey were considered; but when Cannon, who was riding Busybody, saw Queen Adelaide coming alongside, he set his mare going in earnest, and at the distance Queen Adelaide was beaten. Superba, however, was not to be so easily disposed of, and Archer brought her up with one of his famous rushes. There was now a fine battle, for the third time during the meeting, between Cannon and Archer, and for a few moments the result seemed doubtful, but Cannon held his own to the end and won by half a length. Busybody has now repaid her owner, in stakes alone, nearly half the 8,800 guineas she cost him, nor should it be forgotten that the price received for her by her former master has now been raised to about 11,000*l.* Queen Adelaide's running in the Oaks did not seem consistent with her previous performances; but she had had a hard race in the Derby two days before, which may have made her a little stale. On the other hand, her indifferent finish in the Oaks may tend to throw some doubts upon the value of the form she showed in the Derby.

The clever thoroughbred pony, Lucy Ashton, started first favourite for the Acorn Stakes for two-year-olds, but she unfortunately split her pastern during the race, so we are not likely to see more of her for some time to come. The finish was fought out between Grecian Bride, the winner of the Stanley Stakes, and Vacillation. The latter won easily; but she was receiving 9 lbs. from the former. This was Vacillation's fourth victory, and her winnings are already approaching a couple of thousand pounds. The celebrated three-year-old St. Simon, who would in all probability have won the Derby if he had run in it, walked over for the Gold Cup; and so ended a dusty, cloudy, windy meeting.

COLONIAL BORROWING.

THE rush of the colonial governments to borrow money in the London market shows no sign of abating. During the past six months not fewer than twelve colonial governments, including the Indian, and three municipal corporations, have applied for no less a sum in the aggregate than 26¾ millions sterling, and it is known that several more issues are impending. It must be admitted that, on their side, investors appear as ready to lend as the colonial governments are to borrow. Only last week the Government of Queensland was able to raise nearly 2¾ millions sterling, paying no more than 4 per cent. per annum; and a little previously the Indian Government borrowed 3 millions at 3 per cent. Indeed, none of the governments have had to pay more than 5 per cent. When it is borne in mind that the population of Queensland at the end of 1882 did not quite amount to a quarter of a million, and that its debt then exceeded 13 millions sterling, it will be understood how significant it is that this government, with a population less than that of a second-rate English town, has been able to borrow at the rate of 4 per cent. The truth is that really sound investments are becoming so scarce that the thrifty classes know not how to dispose of their money. The Government of the United States is paying off its debts at so rapid a rate that United States bonds are no longer held in Europe, and very few of them are held even in America itself by private individuals. Our own Government, again, has adopted a scheme for the redemption of the debt which is estimated to clear it all off in fifty years. In the meantime Europe has been turned into a vast camp, and may at any moment be plunged into a war of which no man can foresee the consequences or the end. And, lastly, American railroad securities are utterly discredited by mismanagement, over-construction, and dishonesty. Under these circumstances, the professional man who has to provide for his children out of an income that will die with himself, the country gentleman whose estate is entailed, and who has to make provision in his own lifetime for daughters and younger sons, and the commercial man whose savings are larger than can be employed in his own business, eagerly accept offers from colonial governments to pay them from 3 to 5 per cent. They argue that a British colony will be better governed than any foreign State; that it will be strict in the observance of all its obligations; that, at the worst, it will be saved from bankruptcy by the Imperial Government; and that therefore their money will be perfectly safe in its hands. At the same time, the interest offered is much higher than can be obtained with the same certainty. The debenture stocks of our best Railway Companies yield only about 3¼ per cent., while the yield upon the ordinary stocks fluctuates too much to be a favourite form of investment with those who have to consider the future of widows and daughters. We are not now concerned with the correctness of this reasoning; our object is only to explain why it is that colonial loans stand in such high favour in the London money market, and the fact that they do stand in such favour is shown conclusively by the instances we have already referred to.

It will be seen from the foregoing that the colonial governments are under a very strong temptation to go on borrowing. In every colony there is an urgent need for public works—for opening up unoccupied lands by means of railways and roads, for constructing harbours, for laying down telegraph wires, and, in short, for supplying the community with all the requirements of modern civilization. In every one of the colonies, therefore, public opinion is strongly in favour of the rapid construction of public works, and as in none of the colonies is there capital enough for such construction, this is only another way of saying that there is a strong public opinion in favour of constant borrowing in England. Another reason that makes borrowing so popular is that the flowing in of foreign capital creates a fictitious prosperity. The money is borrowed generally, as we have said, for the construction of public works, and therefore is expended in paying for labour and buying materials. Wages in consequence rise, and so do prices, and the commercial and labouring classes therefore seem to benefit. There are few countries, indeed, in which a large Government expenditure is not popular even where it is undertaken for warlike purposes, but it is especially popular where it is incurred for the construction of public works. The works undoubtedly will prove useful in the long run. They enable unoccupied lands to be settled much more rapidly than they otherwise could be; they attract immigrants, and at the same time they make it possible to export the surplus production of the colonies. If, then, the borrowing were kept within moderate limits, there could be no dispute that the policy pursued by the colonial governments is a wise one. But the figures given at the beginning of this article show that the borrowing is not kept within moderate limits. It is, on the contrary, being pushed on far too rapidly, and it is almost certain that it will be pursued more quickly in the future than it has been even in the recent past. The temptation is so strong to the colonial governments to avail themselves of their present high credit in the London money market that they are unable to resist. At any moment circumstances may change. A great war may break out, or American railroad securities may again be taken into favour by the British public, and then it may not be possible to borrow upon such easy terms. The governments therefore are apparently acting upon the old adage which advises to "make hay while the sun shines." But it is never so necessary to urge caution as when there is a strong temptation to excess. In the United States at the present moment we have an example of what follows from too rapid a construction of public works. Our colonies, prosperous as they are and rapidly as they are growing, are far less prosperous than the United States, and are growing far more slowly, yet in a few short years the Americans have sunk so much capital in building railways that they have brought on a great panic, have depreciated railroad securities of all kinds, and have caused widespread ruin and distress. The new American railways, it is true, have been built by private enterprise, while in the colonies the public works are being constructed by the governments. There is a difference here, but the difference is not so great as at first sight it appears. When the Companies and syndicates which have built the American railways found that the railways did not earn the interest upon the capital sunk, and that they had themselves exhausted their means, they were obliged to declare themselves bankrupt, and so there was brought on a panic; but even when the colonial railways are unable to earn the interest upon the capital sunk in them, it is not probable that the governments will become bankrupt. The general taxpayers, however, will have to find the money. There will thus be a great addition made to taxation, and the prosperity of the colonies will be seriously checked. If the colonial governments should then stop the public works, the mischief would not be irreparable, for in a few years population would grow sufficiently to give a traffic to the railways. It will, however, be more difficult then to suspend operations than it is now. To stop borrowing would be to put an end to the inflow of foreign capital, to throw workpeople out of employment, and to cause a depression in trade. But to do this at a moment when the railways had become a serious charge to the colonial taxpayers would be to raise an outcry in the various colonies which few governments would care to face. The danger is, therefore, that if once the colonial governments engage in a rash construction of public works, they will have to go on, just as the Parisian Municipality has had to go on, and that they may thereby involve themselves in inextricable embarrassments.

There is another aspect of the question which should not be lost sight of by investors either. In the recent past this country has been the only great colonizing State in the world. Since the end of the struggle between England and France in North America and in India, France had, until a few years ago, almost given up the attempt to found colonies, while the other great European Powers had never entered upon the enterprise. Of late, however, there has been a revival of colonial enterprise in France, and it looks as if both Germany and Russia were about to endeavour to found transmarine settlements. Within the present year the Recidivist question has brought to the minds of us all how possible it is that a quarrel in the Pacific may break out between this country and France. If there should, the Australasian colonies would certainly be involved in it, or rather, perhaps, it would be more correct to say, would in the beginning be principals in it. Across the Atlantic, again, the position of Canada is not without grave danger. The United States hitherto have loyally observed their neighbourly duties; but there is a party in the United States anxious to raise a quarrel between that country and ourselves, and it is always possible that a dispute may arise which would involve Canada. As to the political dangers, native and otherwise, of the South African colonies, it is hardly necessary to do more than refer to them. There are, then, grave political questions looming in the future, which may impose upon several or all of our colonies sacrifices and exertions of no small magnitude; and it would be in the highest degree unwise on the part of the colonial governments so to compromise their future that, if a day of danger did arise, their credit would be already too deeply pledged. Dangers of this kind are happily remote, and we may hope that they will never become real. But it is the duty of statesmen to provide for all contingencies, and those who are entrusted with the government of our colonies should never forget that dangers may arise, and should always so manage their finances that if they do, they may be able to guard the interests committed to their care. In concluding, we need hardly disavow any desire to lower the credit of our colonies or to deter investors from buying their securities. On the contrary, we believe that if the colonial governments are prudent, investors could not find safer or better securities, nor could the colonial governments themselves follow any wiser policy than that of a judicious and gradual development of their material resources. But the development ought to be gradual and judicious. What we wish to urge upon the colonial governments and upon investors is, that while the construction of public works is desirable and beneficial, it may easily be pushed to excess, may involve the colonies in great embarrassments, and may even compromise their political future.

PLAY AT THE COURT—THE LYCEUM.

HAD Play not been a comedy by the author of Caste and Ours, it would scarcely have lingered long on the stage, supposing that it had ever been represented. But in February 1868, when the piece was first given at the Prince of Wales's Theatre, Mr. T. W. Robertson and the house over which Miss Marie Wilton presided had become the fashion. That failure was not without the range of possibilities even for this popular management the production of a work by the late Mr. H. J. Byron—called Wrinkles, if our memory does not fail us—sufficiently shows. Play, however, just passed muster. There was a desire to see what Captain Hawtree would be like as the Chevalier Browne; how the part of Bruce Fanquehere would suit the actor who had made his mark as Lord Ptarmigan, Sam Gerridge, and the Prince Perovsky; and, to a still greater extent, how the representative of Polly Eccles and Miss Netley would fit herself to the character of Rosie Fanquehere. Stage realism of the better sort was just being made an important consideration. The scene of Play was laid at a German Spa; many persons in a Prince of Wales's audience had visited German Spas, and felt a curiosity as to the way in which the genuine thing would be reproduced. On the whole, it is not difficult to account for the fact that Play had a fair run; but it is equally easy to understand why it has never been revived by the management which first presented it. Mr. Robertson usually imported some strong dramatic incident into his comedies. In Society, by no means the best of the series, there are two or three sympathetic episodes. Caste, particularly in the scene which leads up to and brings about the return of George D'Alroy to the wife who has mourned his death, is a very striking play. Ours has at least one moving scene, at the end of the second act—the departure of the troops for the Crimea. In Play, however, the author fitted his characters moderately well with the sort of parts likely to suit them; for the rest he trusted to his facility for writing smart dialogue—which nevertheless is not very smart—and to a few theatrical tricks which might persuade the unwary spectator that a coherent plot was being treated. The piece has been produced at the Court without the glamour which overhung Prince of Wales's comedies, and it is not to be disguised that it is a very crude and thin contrivance. Mr. Robertson's pieces, written for certain people, must of necessity be given after a method not easily to be imitated. Play is sadly invertebrate. The first act would be well enough if it led to something more marked. Frank Price is in love with Rosie; the Chevalier Browne accidentally ascertains that the girl, niece of his disreputable associate the Hon. Bruce Fanquehere, is an heiress, and proposes to commit bigamy in order to win her and her fortune. Obstacles to the union of Frank and Rosie have to be raised, and no plain way of raising them occurred to Mr. Robertson. Such interest as the plot contains is based on these matters, but the structure of the play is built up with ill-fitting and badly devised bits. The Chevalier meets his wife, Amanda Tarleton, the celebrated actress, in a ruined castle, whither the characters have gone. This is no sort of reason why Rosie should suspect that her Frank is Amanda's husband, though the audience is invited to suppose that such a mistake has arisen temporarily to wound Rosie's trusting affection. There is a great deal too much make-believe in this, as also about the incident which leads to the Hauptman Stockstadt's challenge. Frank, it may be remembered, unburdens his mind by relating to Stockstadt the story of his attachment to Rosie; and the Prussian officer, who does not comprehend a word of English, is understood to fancy that the gesticulating Englishman is deliberately insulting him. The idea of Stockstadt's brother officer, the Graf von Staufenberg, gravely saying "Illustrated London News," and nothing else, for the purpose of showing that he is not wholly unacquainted with our language, is a weak jeu d'esprit, quite unsuitable for the stage. The humour of Mr. Bodmin Todder and Mrs. Kinpeck, again, have very little to do with the story. The acting and the reputation of the theatre saved Play sixteen years ago. Unfortunately most of those who are concerned in the revival at the Court have failed to catch the trick of such a comedy as this. Mr. Clayton plays adroitly, but his Chevalier is a rather sombre personage; and Mr. Mackintosh, who follows Mr. Haro—with a difference—as Fanquehere, makes the man into a melodramatic villain. The horrible faces Mr. Mackintosh draws to show the emotions which afflict him are far from the purpose of playing comedy, and especially such comedy as this. It is not that Mr. Mackintosh is too robust an actor to bring himself down to the level of the work, supposing that anything in the nature of bringing down is involved. Mrs. Stirling is one of the most robust of actresses, with a long experience of powerful plays, drama, melodrama, and even tragedy; yet in another of Mr. Robertson's pieces, Caste, her representation of the Marquise de St. Maur was superlatively good. The humours of Mr. Bodmin Todder, the dyspeptic tradesman, lie on the surface. Mr. Arthur Cecil has no difficulty in giving a broadly comic study of this strongly marked personage. The companion picture, Mrs. Kinpeck, the disagreeable and avaricious widow, is much overdone by Miss Victor. The lovers, however, are decidedly well played by Miss Venne as Rosie, and, especially, by Mr. H. B. Conway as Frank Price. An affectation of extreme archness has frequently made the lady's performances preposterous. No one off the stage ever was so terribly arch as Miss Venne was on it. Happily this can be spoken of in the past tense. Rosie is very naturally and prettily played. The love scene in the ruined castle which forms the setting of the second act is the best written episode in the comedy, and it is also the best acted. Frank Price is here altogether admirable. Frank is a lad just growing into manhood, and Mr. Conway's boyish impulsiveness is singularly pertinent and true. A very effective piece of "business," to employ the technical phrase, has been omitted in the revival. After the challenge had passed, in former days at the Prince of Wales's, Stockstadt and Frank met in the Kursaal; Stockstadt had no light for his cigarette, and Frank, noting his enemy's search, courteously proffered him a light from his own. Such a civility might not be expected to pass between challenged and challenger where both were accustomed to the situation. But Frank is a boy who knows nothing of duelling; is told by his countrymen, who are much older and more experienced than he is, that he ought to fight, and accepts the challenge accordingly, bearing no ill will to his antegonist. The remembrance of Miss Marie Wilton and Mr. H. J. Montague as Rosie and Frank is not easily effaced. With the pleasant recollections which linger of their performance, it says much for the new pair of lovers that they can make Rosie and Frank acceptable. Miss Amy Roselle, as the doting wife of the Chevalier, does ably all that is requisite. The mounting of Play is in no way remarkable. Modern audiences have unaccountable tastes, and it is therefore well that a critic's duty does not include prognostication as to the success of theatrical pieces.

The return of the Lyceum company to the Lyceum Theatre naturally aroused much interest not unmingled with regret that they are so soon again to leave it. We have been unable to discover the new blemishes which one critic assures us that Mr. Irving has "developed" in the part of Benedick during his absence. On the contrary, he, like Miss Ellen Terry, seemed to us to play with even more fineness and fire than before. The transference of that fine comedian, Mr. Howe, to the part of Dogberry makes a very decided improvement in the cast.

REVIEWS.

TEMPLES AND ELEPHANTS.*

THIS book must be the result of a sheer love of adventure and travel. Having achieved success in Borneo and told us much about its Head-hunters, Mr. Bock explored a large part of the kingdom of Siam and of the country of the Lao chiefs who are tributary to King Chulalunkorn. We do not make out that he had any particular mission to fulfil. His main object was not to correct mistakes in geography, to show a variation in the course of rivers and the altitudes of mountain ranges, or to search for coal and other minerals. He certainly tried to get specimens of birds and beasts, in which attempt he was much hindered by the prejudices and fancies of chiefs and priests, but his main desire was to see and describe strange scenes and customs. And he has put together a very instructive work. An apology for "imperfect English" was hardly needed. Many a florid writer in our language might do worse than imitate Mr. Bock's style. In one or two instances only are we reminded that a foreigner stumbles, as might be expected. Once, for instance, he talks of "wild fowl" where the context shows clearly that he means not waterfowl, but the jungle cock. He is, as we remarked previously in our notice of The Head Hunters, not much of an Orientalist, though he may be right in deriving the word Siam "from the Malay Sayam, which means brown and refers to the colour of the race." But, in this view, it is quite as possible that Siam may come from the Sanskrit Syama, black. There is a sprinkling of Sanskrit words, Isara lord, Vangsa family, Kumaritana princess, in the Siamese phrases and titles recorded in this work, just as there is in Burmese. The illustrations of men and women, temples, landscapes, and so forth, are very well executed, and there is a picture of a white, or rather a yellow, elephant which is very opportune. It seems, however, that a judicious washing of tamarind-water imparts a lighter colour to this wonderful animal, and that under its application dark patches disappear, for a time at least. Mr. Barnum may take a hint.

* Temples and Elephants: the Narrative of a Journey of Exploration through Upper Siam and Lao. By Carl Bock, Author of the "Head Hunters of Borneo." With Maps, Plates, and Illustrations. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1884.

Mr. Bock's work may properly be divided into two main sections. He stayed at Bangkok before commencing his explorations, and when he had ascended the Meinam and its affluents as high as Kiang Tsen, he returned and spent more time at the capital. We may therefore consider his narrative as one which deals first with Bangkok and then with the interior. The reigning monarch treated this inquisitive foreigner with much consideration. He was favoured with a private audience, and we note that the old etiquette by which every one had to prostrate himself in the august presence is now abolished. King Chulalunkorn is a "progressive" as well as a "thoughtful" ruler. He is abolishing slavery by degrees. He has encouraged education, and he sends yearly a number of young Siamese of noble family to be educated in England and on the Continent. Members of his council are allowed to submit their opinions to him in writing. He has completed a magnificent temple, which was begun so far back as 1785, and had remained unfinished owing to want of funds and other difficulties. At the epoch of the centenary of the capital, in 1881, a splendid national exhibition was opened. Jewellery, silver ware, valuable rings, goblets, mother-of-pearl and lacquer work, sacred manuscripts in thousands, had their sections and compartments, as well as the coarser articles of wicker-work and bamboo, elephant tusks, the horns of the buffalo and the rhinoceros, gamboge, teak and other timber, resin, sugar, beeswax, and minerals. Pictures were rather a failure, native artists not being usually adepts in the rules of perspective; and it was with some difficulty that an ambitious dauber was dissuaded from sending his works to the Royal Academy. But, splendid as the Siamese Exhibition may have been, it is eclipsed by the annual ceremony of kateen or the royal visitation to the temples. The King is carried in state to several temples in succession. Presents are distributed. The High Priest preaches a sermon. But the grandest feature is the procession of the royal barges, about fifty in number. The state barge is manned by one hundred and twenty rowers, who have been as hard at work for a month previous as if they were University oarsmen, practising swing and time. The account of this imposing ceremony is followed by a ghastly story of the execution of a woman, with minute details. The only satisfactory part of the affair is that the culprit was a nobleman's wife who had murdered one of her servants in a diabolical fashion, and that the King, though as averse as King Louis Philippe to signing death warrants, thought it fit in this case to show himself no respecter of persons. Mr. Bock, we may remark, has rather a liking for these repulsive sights, for when up the country he was anxious to witness the execution of a Chow or chief, of the city of Lampoon, but unluckily arrived just after the decapitation. This "unfortunate nobleman" seems to have been condemned on three counts. He had offered an insult to the Siamese Commissioner. He had injured the elephant of a brother Chow. And he was generally a scamp and therefore fitted to be a scapegoat. In many respects, there is still a good deal to be done at Bangkok. Most of the roads lately constructed by the King are below the water-level. There are no ghauts or landing-places of stone or brick, as there are in India. The city of Bangkok is often flooded in the rainy season, seeing that it is built on an alluvial plain level with the river. And at other seasons the lanes and streets are receptacles of filth. Yet it is refreshing to hear of an Eastern potentate who reads English newspapers, transacts business regularly, has a mint, a library, and a museum, encourages research, is civil to foreigners, does not torture or harass his own subjects in the genuine Oriental fashion, and has visited Singapore, Java, British Burmah, Calcutta, Bombay, and Benares. When an outbreak of cholera occurred in 1881, this enlightened sovereign did not content himself with charms and sentences in Pali and prayers to the evil spirits or Nats, but he erected temporary hospitals and sent steam-launches up and down the river with medicines and doctors.

All this is interesting enough, but the journey through the interior gives Mr. Bock much more to tell. He seems to have stood the hot and moist climate very well; for we only hear of one or two attacks of fever which yielded more to quinine than to Dr. Sutton's magic pills. He also was well provided with presents to propitiate native functionaries, such as cloth, tobacco, needles, and scent-bottles. On more than one occasion he made zoedone do duty for champagne in a fashion which would have delighted Sir Wilfrid Lawson; and he evidently has the traveller's resolution and pluck, and makes light of trials and inconveniences, indifferent commons, thunderstorms and wet, and all the worries incidental to an exploration in Siamese jungles. On leaving Bangkok he had to pole up the stream when a comfortable steamer could go no higher. The Indian custom, so familiar in wearying journeys up the Ganges and Jabuna, where the boatmen tie one end of a rope to the mast and walk on the bank hauling the other end, seems unknown in Siam. After a time the boat was exchanged for a howdah and an elephant; and then, again, Mr. Bock went down the Mekok river in a small canoe. In this way he stayed at the towns of Raheng, Lakhon, Lampoon, Kiang Mai and Kiang Hai, Merang Prau and Kiang Tsen, covering more than six degrees of latitude and living exactly as the natives did. Of course events did not always run smoothly. The farther he proceeded into the interior the less potent were the orders and passports which he had obtained from the King of Siam or from Chows and other high officials. Buddhists had a great aversion to the slaughter of birds and beasts; and, though he obtained permission for a native hunter of high repute, one Mau Sua, to get him specimens, very little was obtained by this means. Mr. Bock was accused of bringing tigers round the houses at night; and we cannot think that he was well advised in trying to carry off two large images of Buddha from a great cave in one of the Lao States. We note that a large tiger shot by the villagers was actually cut up and eaten. The tongue is cut out by Indian mahouts, and when dried, used as a medicine in fever; but only the most degraded of the aboriginal or semi-aboriginal tribes in that country ever think of eating tigers, jackals, or lizards. Once Mr. Bock's talent for drawing got him into a scrape. He was sketching the wife of a Karian chief, and unluckily touched her chin in order to get her into position. This was one of those blunders that are worse than crimes in the East, and some unpleasant consequences were only averted by diplomacy. Mr. Bock hastily made a duplicate sketch, which he tore in half to appease the "evil spirits"—having cleverly managed to secrete the original.

There is a good deal about Buddhism in these pages, its forms, worship, discipline, and Nirvan, or final extinction. At p. 200 there is a curious sketch of Mount Zinnalo according to the cosmogony of the Laosians. It is like a pillar on a pedestal with a top-heavy capital. The whole is divided into compartments allotted to persons who, while on earth, shall have attained divers degrees of merit either as merely good spirits, or who have built houses for priests, worn white clothing, and said many prayers. The order of merit and the allotment of wives by thousands and millions according to the respective worth of deeds performed on earth, sounds more like the Bihisht of the Mussulman; but then Buddhism comes in after all, as the darkness, which in the picture sits like a cloud on the top of the pillar, represents Nirwana, the place where there is "no care" and only "perfect happiness." According to Mr. Bock, in several respects the Laosian Buddhist has privileges not accorded to his brethren in Siam and in Burmah. Priests may possess property and many own domestic slaves and goods and chattels. There are many degrees of the novitiate. The day begins with alms-begging, but in lonely tracts the villagers save the priest the trouble of going round with his bowl for rice and fruit, and bring food themselves to the temple. The ordeal of rice-chewing is applied to priests accused of unchastity, but we are not told what the exact punishment is. The perpetual propitiation of evil or angry spirits show the inability of the Buddhist creed to satisfy the human craving for something to worship. The Buddhist is not censurous or idolatrous like the Hindu, or bigoted like the Mahommedan, but, whether in Lao, Siam, or, as Captain Forbes has told us, in Burma, he must have something to fear, invoke, or propitiate. Besides the Wat or temple with its images of Buddha, there is generally another structure, the Phrachedu, which is erected everywhere to gain favour with some deity and to atone for some sin. Though smoking is forbidden to priests, they all smoke and chew betel. The latter custom is carried to a very unpleasant excess by everybody, and it is said to aid the digestion at the expense of the teeth and of all appearance. The priestly life in general seemed to Mr. Bock one of indolence from a "Western point of view," but surely not more so than that of friars or monks. A Hindu Mahant at a temple at Gaya and elsewhere does not suggest a career of activity, but the Hindu ascetic or pilgrim makes longer journeys and endures more hardships, we think, than the Buddhist, though the latter does wander about the country in the dry season and visits the Pira Bat, "where Buddha is supposed to have left his footprint." Tattooing is described at some length, and with difficulty the author obtained from an expert the design in fashion in the Lao Country. Dyak women endure this infliction to please their lovers; the Laos to satisfy the female sex. The middle part of the person down to the knee-cap is covered with figures of pigeons, vultures, lions, tigers, monkeys, and demons; and the operation must be extremely painful, causing irritation and swelling and sometimes death. In the eastern parts of Lao the natives wisely content themselves with an odd figure or two on the leg and chest. Mr. Bock naturally draws attention to the facilities for trade and commerce afforded in Siam. He would like to see a railway from Bangkok to Raheng, a distance of three degrees, or roughly calculated, of rather more than two hundred miles. This work would present no greater difficulties than the line from Rangoon to Prome, which is only a trifle less in extent, and the enlightened monarch has only to find the money and send for the English engineer. We hear, too, something about fine timber and minerals, especially copper and tin, but Chinese companies are already in the field and in some places have obtained a monopoly. Mr. Bock met with traders from Yunnan, and pictures of these men with their mules and ponies are amongst the best of the illustrations. We wonder that the author did not attempt to cross the ridges and jungles between Siam and our Burmese provinces, for he especially mentions the trade route to Moulmain. But very likely this would have been no easy adventure, and we can quite understand his wish to return to Bangkok and renew his acquaintance with its enlightened ruler, to whom he has done full justice, as he has to American missionaries and to divers English and other gentlemen employed in the Government service in a country where prestige is still valued and where invidious distinctions of race and colour have not yet been entirely swept away.

WALES SIX HUNDRED YEARS AGO.*

WHEN we read of disturbances on the restless borders of the Cape and Natal, we are content to console ourselves with the reflection of Sydney Smith, "Mankind live and flourish, not only in spite of storms and tempests, but (which could not have been anticipated previous to experience) in spite of colonial secretaries." Mankind probably flourish—in a way, and certainly live, at a distance fortunately remote, in spite of Boers, Basutos, missionaries, colonial bishops, Zulus, raids, and Dabulamanzi. Six hundred years ago the English stoicism which easily endures the discomforts of South African politics would have been more hardly put to it by trials nearer home. Wales and the Welsh Marches were in almost exactly the same condition as the Natal frontiers between Boers, Zulus, and the late philanthropic Bishop Colenso. Substitute Gruffyth and Llewellyn for Cetewayo and Dabulamanzi, and Archbishop Peckham for Dr. Colenso, and one has a pretty fair idea of what Wales and England made each other endure. The Welsh clergy occupied the place of missionaries, and were the cause of even more severe perplexities than that modern species of evangelist who eke out his stipend by selling gunpowder and "square face" gin to the savages. Archbishop Peckham, however, it is fair to say (fair both to him and to Bishop Colenso), was an Englishman first, a philanthropist afterwards, and at a considerable interval. He was most anxious to prevent the Welsh from breaking themselves against the rock of English determination. But when, being exceeding wilful, they would go to war, then Peckham turned round, lectured them fiercely, and maintained that, as descendants of Trojan wanderers, they inherited all the vices of Paris of Troy. There certainly was a good deal of the Celtic character in Paris, so the Archbishop's ethnological theories were not without justification.

The new volume of Archbishop Peckham's Letters (edited, with an excellent preface, by Mr. Charles Trice Martin for the Rolls collection) contains nothing more interesting than the picture of English dealings with Wales. English and Celtic characters have only altered for the worse in the last two hundred years. Our savage neighbours in Australia and Africa may still call us faithless, cruel, overbearing; but we have added to these qualities the horror of "blood-guiltiness" when we are getting the worst of it. Our savage neighbours in Ireland or America still remain eager to pick a quarrel, still unamenable to civilization, still content with their own peculiar and prehistoric conceptions of faith, justice, honour, and industry. But they, too, have added cowardice to their other demerits, and only wage a midnight war on kitchenmaids and third-class passengers.

It is not easy to give an account at once brief and lucid of the state of affairs in Wales at the time when Archbishop Peckham was doing his best for the strayed sheep of the fold. Llewellyn ap Jorwerth, a kind of Celtic Panda, who had brought all Wales under his dominion, died in 1240. He was succeeded by his son David: but the people and priests preferred the bastard Gruffyth, whom David kept in confinement. The captive, being a heavy man from want of exercise, broke his neck in trying to escape from the Tower by the old plan of making a rope of his sheets. David died next; the Welsh rejected his sister's son, and did homage to Owen Goch and Llewellyn, son of Gruffyth. When the pair had ruled together for some time, Owen and his younger brother David rose against Llewellyn, and were put down; after which Llewellyn desired to free Wales wholly from English rule. After a border war of various fortune, a treaty was made in 1267 between Llewellyn and Henry III. The conditions of this peace were never kept. The English John Dunns of the period, early settlers in Wales or on the Marches, were ever at informal war with Llewellyn, and their stations, or castles, were perpetually being burned. Edward I. succeeded to Henry III., and Llewellyn refused to do homage. He was bent on finding an excuse for war, and, to be fair, excuses were not far to seek. The English, wherever they had the chance, were imposing their ideas and customs, their distasteful industry, and their singular theory that murder was a public crime and not a private diversion, on the idle, revengeful Celts. War broke out; Llewellyn found that his cause was hopeless, and a new treaty was signed in 1277. In 1278 Llewellyn signed an extradition treaty, sorely against his will, and, as he says, "compelled by the fear which may fall on a constant man," the fear which fell on Messrs. Carey and his allies when they found themselves in peril. After this matters dragged on for two or three years, the Welsh always complaining that the English disregarded their national laws, on the flimsy pretext that these "were contrary to the Ten Commandments." The English answered that they would only accept Welsh laws when Welsh laws were "reasonable." As all the customs by which these gallant Celts set most store were, in English eyes, "unreasonable," our neighbours had much to endure. Wrecking was a well-established and cherished custom of these children of nature, and Llewellyn bitterly laments that his subjects are interfered with in the exercise of this cherished privilege. Then there were the usual quarrels of hostile races. English masons insulted Celtic "nobles," and probably held Welsh titles very meanly. "Welsh farmers selling their produce at Rhuddlan were obliged to take what the English offered or be flogged. Woods were cut down, probably" (Mr. Martin thinks) "to make roads." The English Constable of Oswestry hanged two young Welshmen of noble family, "which hanging their parents would not have borne for 300*l*." In fact, the Welsh were treated much like black fellows in Queensland. We may presume that they also stole cattle, burned and robbed when they got the chance. The spirit of the people became rebellious. In 1280 Edward again offered to observe "all just and reasonable Welsh laws," but irritated the Celts by speaking as if Wales were part of his kingdom. In all the letters and proclamations we mark the common sense and complete self-confidence natural to Englishmen in dealing with backward races. Industry, honesty, justice, the Englishman argues, are obviously reasonable. Tippling, idleness, the blood feud, long days spent in listening to lying legends are obviously unreasonable. The Welsh had much better adopt English ideas and be done with it. In the course of six hundred years the Welsh have been led or bullied into acquiescence with a "reasonableness" which is certainly not "sweet." But St. George's Channel has saved the Irish from this sad fate, and "Irish ideas" are still much what Welsh ideas used to be in the days of Edward I.

Mr. Martin points out that the endless troubles of the Welsh borders were far more hopeless and inveterate than those of the Scotch Marches. On both sides of the Debatable Land the Jocks of the Cow and the Hard-riding Dicks were of the same English blood, and of equal pluck. They fought and plundered according to the rules of the game, and "thanked each other for the sport they had shown." The Welsh, suffering and inflicting all that a lower race endures from and avenges on its masters, broke into rebellion in the Easter of 1280. By July 15, Edward, with a conquering army, was at Rhuddlan. Then Archbishop Peckham stood out courageously between the King and the insurgents, and endeavoured to win the blessing of the peacemaker. As General Gordon was anxious to go alone and meet the Mahdi face to face, so Peckham set forth to meet Llewellyn, "knowing that there was no one else in England willing to undertake such a task." The King, like the present Government, did not sanction the visit to the stranger prince; but Peckham, unlike General Gordon, went his own way all the same. He did not conciliate Llewellyn. Indeed, Peckham's statement of the superiority of the English force and of the favour in which the English cause was held in Rome (p. 436, Letter cccxl.), was likely rather to irritate the Welshmen. Peckham writes, "We most bitterly bewail the report that the Welsh are more cruel than the Saracens [crudeliores Saracenis], for when the Saracens take Christians prisoners, they hold them to ransom; but the Welsh are said to cut their captives' throats on the spot, as if they cared for nothing but blood. And, what is even worse, when they do accept ransom, they are reported first to take the money, and then to cut the throats all the same." Which would certainly be the comble of meanness. Llewellyn replied that the English spared neither age, nor sex, nor sacred buildings. Probably the border wars were as relentless as feuds between Western settlers and Apaches.

A very bad thing happened now. The Archbishop left Llewellyn for three days, and the English made a treacherous and unsuccessful attack on his position. They were the ancestors of the men who, after teaching the Maoris that Sunday was a taboo day, took the Maori camp on a Sunday, when all the Rangatiras were at their devotions. After this foul blow the honest Maoris gave in. "Where is the pleasure," they said, "in fighting men who behave like you?" Edward was irritated by all that had happened. He offered private terms (which were refused) to the now united Welsh princes. David, in particular, declined to go to the Holy Land. The poor Welsh only asked that they might not be excommunicated, as they were fighting in self-defence. It was now that Peckham lost his temper. Though he afterwards scolded them for their love of the Tale of Troy, he now declares that "they were descended from a Trojan, a friend of Paris, the adulterer," from whom they derived a certain laxity in love affairs. How extraordinary has been the influence of the divine story of Priam and his people! In the time of Herodotus remote barbarians were claiming Trojan descent; in the time of Edward I. the Welsh were basing their claims to wild Wales on their kinship with the wanderers from "the crumbling clay fort on the windy hill" of Hissarlik. To this ancient title Peckham objected that, if the Welsh were Trojans who turned the Scythian giants out of Albion, why should not the English turn them out? "Woe to thee that spoilest, shalt thou not be spoiled?" This argument, such as it is, holds good against the absurd argument of the Irish Nationalists. The land was theirs before the snub-nosed Saxon came. But it must have belonged to somebody, whether a Scythian giant or not, before the ancestors of such Land Leaguers as are Celts came that way. Peckham was not more conciliating when the Welsh demanded the restoration of their own "unreasonable" laws. As for the legislator "Howelda," auctoritatem ei Diabolus delegavit. So Peckham poured Biblical texts and insults on the Welsh; they continued in revolt, and Llewellyn was killed in a skirmish by a knight who did not know him.

Here ended for the time Peckham's connexion with Wales. His other letters are full of most interesting details about the private life of clergy and laity, abbesses and priors, and public rights in churches and Welsh fashions in dress, about Jews and friars and nunneries. Peckham was a man just within the letter of the law, but not tolerant of new Jewish synagogues nor old Welsh ideas. His letters are a valuable addition to the materials of the historian, who has great cause to praise Mr. Martin.

FRENCH DRAMATIC CLASSICS.*

IF a taste for exact literature is not implanted in the minds of the coming generation, it will not be the fault of the latest purveyors of school-books. Everywhere we see the signs of a more liberal system of education, and of the substitution of what is bright, fresh, and accurate for the respectable generalizations of the dull old school. The little books before us are a striking instance of this. Instead of being edited by schoolmasters or professors, they are introduced to us by two well-known poets, the name of each of whom suggests to the public anything rather than the labours of Dr. Dryasdust. Yet there is no real reason for surprise. Why should young people be dragged with discourteous violence to the Temple of Instruction? Nor are the poets worse teachers, from the purely technical point of view, than the dreariest pedagogue in the country. In point of exactitude, in comprehension of the words and passages which present difficulty to the untrained, in patience of research and in sympathy for ignorance, Mr. Dobson and Mr. Lang have nothing to learn from their most experienced colleagues in education.

The series to which these little books belong is edited by Mr. Saintsbury, and under his guidance aims at something quite new in the treatment of modern dramatic literature. His own edition of Corneille's Horace, which appeared two years ago, has supplied the type of a modern French play approached exactly as a scholiast would approach a Greek tragedy, with copious prolegomena and full illustrative notes. The text, very carefully collated with the best editions, forms the centre of the work, and is placed in a setting which exhausts all that curiosity can desire to know regarding the author and his antecedents, or the play and its relations. For instance, the Barbier de Séville opens with a sketch of the life and writings of Beaumarchais, and this is followed by an essay on the progress of French comedy, which is to be repeated in each edition of a comic play. This essay is by Mr. Saintsbury, and is noticeable for its breadth of view, and for the skill with which the critic contrives to show us the central thread of unaltering Gallic wit running through the various dramatic literature of six hundred years. In the Barbier de Séville there then follows, by Mr. Austin Dobson, an essay on the stage in the time of Beaumarchais, another on the "Drame Sérieux" before Beaumarchais, and a third to introduce the particular play to students. All these essays are full of interesting matter, gracefully applied, and the text is finally succeeded by nine pages of ingenious notes.

As far as literature is concerned there can be no doubt that Beaumarchais is less known than Molière, and Le Barbier de Séville less read than the Précieuses Ridicules. It is, therefore, to Mr. Dobson's volume that we turn with particular curiosity. His life of his author is careful and minute, and contains facts which are, if not new, yet certainly not familiar to the ordinary student. His account of the well-known Angelucci, or, as it is sometimes called, Hatkinson incident, differs widely from that which Beaumarchais himself gave forth, and which his biographers have repeated. According to this story, the dramatist was sent on a delicate mission, in 1774, to suppress a libel on Marie Antoinette which was being prepared by a Jew, who called himself Angelucci in Amsterdam and Hatkinson (or Atkinson) in London. Beaumarchais's romantic tale was that he succeeded in bribing the Jew to burn both editions of this brochure, but that Angelucci succeeded in secreting a copy, and hurried off to Nüremburg to reprint it. Beaumarchais started after him, caught him in a wood in Bavaria, and valorously felled and stripped him, only to be himself despoiled and wounded a little while afterwards by brigands. Unfortunately, it now appears, as Mr. Dobson tells us, that there was no Angelucci, that the pamphlet was Beaumarchais's own, and that the wounds received in the wood at Neustadt were self-inflicted. This is very discreditable, but it is an interesting trait in the character of Figaro.

Among Mr. Austin Dobson's notes we may mention one or two which seem to us new and very happy. The famous "Ce qui ne vaut pas la peine d'être dit, on le chante" he traces to a passage in the eighteenth Spectator, "Nothing is capable of being well set to Musick, that is not Nonsense." In the same scene we do not think that any one before our editor has pointed out the relation of "Je me presse de rire de tout, de peur d'être obligé d'en pleurer" to Byron's words in Don Juan:—

> And if I laugh at any mortal thing,
> 'Tis that I may not weep.

Mr. Andrew Lang has a lighter touch in prose than Mr. Austin Dobson, who seems to keep his laughter for his verses. To Mr. Lang, on the contrary, as we all know, not palæontology, nor church architecture, nor the deities of the Society Islanders are safe from the arrows of a universal spirit of mirth. However serious he may be for a moment, it needs but for one of the abstruser sciences to approach him, and

> Quand il la prenait dans ses bras,
> Sa gaité s'éveillait encore.

In the prolegomena to his text of the Précieuses Ridicules he is as thorough and as learned as possible, but we are never certain that we shall finish the page without a laugh, often at a very small point, where the critic is really speaking sotto voce, and cracking a little joke with himself. The subject of his play gives him infinite opportunity of passing gibes at the foibles of our own contemporary society, with its weaknesses and follies, its tasteless revolts against brutality and dulness, and its tyranny of fashion. We may close with a paragraph which we find in a little essay on "The Comic Stage in the Age of Molière":—

Not much attention was paid to stage effect and scenery. When Thomiris called A moi, soldats! the advance of the Scythian lovies was indicated by a painting of an army, which was drawn over an impracticable bridge. . . . As to archæological accuracy, no one ever dreamed of attaining it. As late as 1811, a modern inkstand with quill pens was placed on the table of Agamemnon! And this was after Wolf's celebrated Prolegomena, in which it may be said to be demonstrated that the Homeric age did not use quill pens.

SOME NEW PHILOSOPHICAL WORKS.*

THE appearance of the translation of Lotze's Logic and Metaphysics is an event of considerable interest. It argues, for one thing, that even at Oxford it is becoming known that there have been thinkers in Germany since Hegel. The fact, too, that the idea of this translation originated with the late Professor Green suggests that the Hegelians, or those who have been taken to be such, are finding it worth while to see what is said by thinkers whose mode of philosophizing is in many respects directly opposed to that of Hegel. The work of translation has been carried out by a number of Oxford men—the editor, Mr. Bosanquet, undertaking to keep the whole consistent and uniform. And both he and his collaborateurs are to be congratulated on their success. The translation is in the main clear and idiomatic, and the differences of style of the several contributors do not force themselves disagreeably on the reader's notice. Lotze's thought is often of the subtlest, and his style correspondingly difficult; so that the labour of conveying his precise meaning into our less philosophically developed language is very considerable. To a large extent these difficulties have been surmounted. Thus such troublesome words as Vorstellung and gleich (which last means not simply equal in magnitude, but perfectly similar or identical) have been managed very well. We cannot, however, commend the almost habitual rendering of Seele by "soul." The term mind has become fixed in modern English psychology; and to talk of soul when there is not the remotest reference to the hypothesis of a spiritual substance is unidiomatic, if not positively misleading. It sounds, indeed, almost grotesque when the translators talk of a "dog's soul" and of a "busy soul." We do not understand, too, why, when the term stimulus (which can always be helped out by "excitant") has become the firm possession of psychology, the word "irritant," which has a distinctly physiological reference, should be employed to denote the external agent or influence (Reiz) which excites the mind to activity.

Lotze repels or attracts, according to the nature of the reader, by the very fact that he cannot easily be labelled. He does not fit readily into our pigeon-hole arrangements. In many respects he might be called a materialist. It is certain, at least, that he fully recognized the fact that mind co-exists with and is in a manner determined by body. His early physiological studies, undertaken with the view of making medicine a profession, gave him a familiarity with the facts of physiological psychology, to which branch of science, indeed, he made valuable contributions. Yet with the scientific materialism he combined a thoroughly spiritualistic view of mind. His wide and accurate acquaintance with the methods of physical science led him to view the course of nature as a mechanical process everywhere conditioned by definite antecedents. At the same time, by resolving the inner essence of material things into a quasi-spiritual principle, he is enabled to give a teleological significance and something of a poetic colouring to the movements of nature. Again, while setting out with the idea of Leibnitz and Herbart, that the universe consists of a multitude of simple independent existences, he finally abandons this Pluralism for a Monism which asserts the interdependence and unity of the sum of things. His mind was too critical and too original to allow him to follow in the track of any one philosopher, and thus we find in him points of contact with Hegel as with Herbart. Nothing, indeed, could be better fitted to teach Englishmen how far we still are from having heard the last word in philosophic speculation than a perusal of Lotze's writings. He is always pointing out difficulties, and suggesting new vistas of thought, where we are apt to suppose that everything has been made clear and definite.

By aid of the two volumes now translated the English reader has an opportunity of studying Lotze's principles at first hand. The Logic is in many respects a remarkable book, if only for the original way in which the author conceives and deals with his subject. It consists of three books—on Thought (Pure Logic), on Investigation (Applied Logic), and on Knowledge (Methodology). The first unfolds the doctrine of Formal Logic by means of the author's conception of thought as an active process, supervening on the passive reproduction of ideas, by which a consciousness of "the ground of their coherence" is added. The treatment of the Concept, the act of Judgment, and Inference from this point of view is striking and suggestive. Subjects of great interest not usually dealt with in logic, such as the relation of the different parts of speech to the process of thought, and the nature of the impersonal judgment, receive careful attention. The second book deals with induction, and, though making no reference to Mill, has evidently been written in view of his system. Lotze's intimate acquaintance with the methods of physical inquiry here stands him in good stead. And an interesting application of principles to political science appears in the shape of a chapter on election and voting. The last book supplies what is wanting to make up a complete theory of knowledge, and forms a natural transition to the second volume on Metaphysic. This work again falls into three books (Lotze seems to have almost a superstitious fondness for the number three), dealing with "The Connexion of Things" (Ontology) "Cosmology," and "Psychology." We have already hinted at the underlying idea of this volume. We must leave it to the reader to find out for himself the art with which it is developed into a systematic doctrine. As the latest attempt by a thinker of the highest calibre to reassert, in full view of recent scientific speculations on the origin of life and so forth, the necessity of the teleological view of things, this volume deserves careful attention. Whether the reader agree with the author or not, he cannot fail to have his intellectual horizon widened, and to be stimulated to follow out new and interesting paths of inquiry. It may, however, be as well to tell the reader who intends attacking these volumes that they will probably seem hard reading at first. The peculiar cast of Lotze's mind, and the circumstances and influences which helped to shape his thought, put him at a great distance from the stream of English speculation. Yet this circumstance need not be altogether a disadvantage. Lotze is far less artificial and technical than Kant, whom of course everybody reads; and much less transcendental than Hegel, whom (according to some) we all ought to read. And a little effort at the outset will carry the beginner over the difficulties of a new standpoint and a new method. One cannot but wish, however, that Lotze had been introduced to English readers in his much more readable work, Mikrokosmus, which smacks less of the professor and more of the man of letters. But we are glad to learn that this want is soon to be supplied by the same enterprising hands that have given us the present two volumes.

It is a long step from Lotze to Hartmann. The former has all the thoroughness and all the rigorous exactness of the trained academic metaphysician. The latter has all the clearness and all the pointedness of the popular thinker. To Lotze the problem of the universe was infinitely complex; to Hartmann it is perfectly simple. His essentially inductive mind, which reminds one not infrequently of Herbert Spencer, seizes a principle in a multitude of facts, and, using this as a lever, is able to get at the foundation of the cosmic structure. The steady onward movement of his mind towards a clearly seen goal is exhilarating to the reader. And then how interesting the regions explored, the curious half-lit domain of organic processes, animal instincts, mysticism, art-creation, and so forth! Nothing is less interesting than what is perfectly understood, and nobody has better realized this truth than Hartmann. And even when, having come to the end of his inductive path, he places himself in the company of the accredited metaphysicians and proceeds by the aid of his blind "unconscious" and the intellectual or logical principle which, like a pitiful Cordelia, comes to the aid of the sightless sufferer, to deduce the great world-process, how delightfully concrete, imaginative, anthropomorphic is his thought, in spite of the appearance of metaphysical abstruseness and logical severity! Little wonder that Germany, which must have a system of philosophy, and has grown rather tired of late of its very technical teachers, should rush to the Hartmannian fountain, and drink off nine successive editions of the Philosophy of the Unconscious.

There is nothing like success to make men agreeable in their manners. Only the weakest and most stupid of persons grow bombastic and arrogant through good fortune. A clever man knows that it is much better to practise at such a time, in the presence of his admirers and others, a little judicious self-disparagement; and the circumstances of the case render this exercise of virtue easy. Others have deprecated praise; but few, perhaps, have gone so far as Hartmann in running down his own system. Some time ago he published an anonymous volume, in which he urged a variety of arguments against his philosophy. The secret of the authorship was kept for a time, and the originator of the joke had no doubt a hearty laugh at the gullibility of his hostile critics, who of course greeted the appearance of another assailant with acclamation. When he had had enough of this, he judiciously allowed the secret to come out; and thus he had the deeper delight of being acknowledged as a large-minded man, far from the tyranny of system, and yet so certain of the strength of the foundations of his edifice that he could afford to play at throwing stones at its upper stories. A like recklessness, only possible to the man who is assured of fortune's smiles, displays itself in the curious prefaces to the later editions of his opus magnum. Here the great man shows himself in the most gracious of moods. He sets himself, quite in an impartial objective way, to account for the success of his work, just as though the idea that the writer's ability had anything to do with this result had never occurred to him. With charming naiveté, he describes the state of philosophical hunger which preceded the appearance of his work, to which of course all his success is due, modestly observing that Essays on the Philosophy of Theism. By the late W. J. Ward, Ph.D. Edited by W. Ward. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co. 1884.

The Theory of Morals. By Paul Janet. Translated by Mary Chapman. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark. 1884.

"the exaggerated estimate frequently formed of the Philosophy of the Unconscious must be in large measure attributed to the circumstance, that its value was measured against the background (sic) of the Guild-philosophy, which gave it an intrinsically undeserved prominence by the force of contrast." There seems to be only one tiny shadow of discontent to mar the bright serenity of his spirit, and that is the reflection that the scientific world has not yet hailed him as a new light. But here again he displays his striking magnanimity by abstaining from all appearance of complaint, and by exercising a spirit of generous compassion for men sunk in the slough of a "crass mechanical and anti-teleological" view of nature.

We have said enough perhaps to suggest to the reader that Hartmann and his "Unconscious" are a phenomenon worthy of study. In many respects, indeed, the appearance of such a work in philosophical literature is unique. To use an Americanism, we may say that it is the biggest thing in the way of speculation which this age has seen. And we have little doubt that it will be read by the English-speaking race as by the Germans. In truth, it can hardly fail to be delightful reading, whether approached with the attitude of reverent discipleship or with that of sceptical levity. As a piece of dashing literary composition it is sure to command attention. And, if other reasons were wanting, the fact that the author manages in the course of his argument to hit all the respectable authorities, academical philosophers, theologians, and the rest, is certain to secure him a wide hearing. Whether there is latent in the English mind just now much of that pessimistic temper to which the book so effectually appeals in Germany remains to be seen. However this be, the work was too phenomenal a one not to be translated. And Herr von Hartmann is fortune's favourite once more in having so excellent a translator. Mr. Coupland is already known to a few as a close and accurate student of psychology and philosophy. And the effects of special training in a subject in giving certainty, accuracy, and ease to a translator's touch show themselves in every chapter of the volume. We have not been able to find a single considerable error. The way in which that crux of translators of German philosophy, "Vorstellung," is managed is excellent. "Presentation," "representation," "idea," these and other words are made to render its meaning according to circumstances. The author is to be commended, further, for his courage in holding to the form of the German where this is distinctly Hartmannian, as, for example, in the heading "The Becoming-Conscious of the Idea." And to this technical accuracy Mr. Coupland adds considerable stylistic excellence, so that he manages very skilfully to reproduce the vigorous idiomatic and homely phraseology of the original.

Mr. Wilfred Ward's republication from the Dublin Review of Dr. Ward's Essays will be welcomed by this thinker's admirers. Dr. Ward occupied an exceptional position in English philosophy as a Roman Catholic thinker. Among the popular leaders of the hour J. S. Mill naturally attracted a good deal of his attention. And the first volume of these Essays is mainly occupied with a critical examination of his philosophic position. Dr. Ward shows much of that acuteness in criticism which seems to be in a special manner the concomitant of modern Catholic belief of the more reflective sort. The point of his criticism of Mill is that, though professing to dispense with "intuition" in the pursuit of truth, he surreptitiously introduces it in the very groundwork of his system. In his postulate that memory is trustworthy, and in his further assumption that nature is uniform, Mill is essentially an intuitivist. According to Dr. Ward's editor, Mill, Professor Huxley, and the rest are conjurors performing feats of sleight-of-hand, and Dr. Ward is the smart "scientist" who attends the performance in order to find out the jugglery. Perhaps the author, who is always polite, would not have approved of this vivid but rather saucy way of putting the matter. As is only natural in an editor who seems also a relative of the author, Mr. W. Ward looks very complacently on the results of his hero's efforts. Others may perhaps be less dazzled by the skill of Dr. Ward's dialectic. It almost makes one smile to hear that the author made a great discovery in showing that Mill assumed the veracity of memory. As if anybody sane enough to conduct a controversy would ever dream of questioning its veracity. When Mr. Ward has shown that we all, as a matter of fact, do admit some intuitive knowledge, he is still a long way from showing that we all, as a matter of consistency, ought to admit a definite group of intuitions specially singled out as such by a particular school of thinkers. What we really want is a criterion of genuineness by which to test so-called intuitive truths, a criterion which will satisfy everybody; and this Dr. Ward has not yet given us. Dr. Ward's long dispute with Mill, Dr. Bain, and Mr. Shadworth Hodgson, on that well-worn topic free-will, shows his strength and adroitness in debate, but cannot be said to add anything to a thoroughly exhausted controversy. Yet, whatever the reader may think of the force of Dr. Ward's reasonings, he will be ready to admit that his writings deserve to have a place among the landmarks of modern philosophical and theological thought. He thinks steadily and expresses himself clearly and vigorously, and to say this is by no means small praise.

It is not easy at first to understand why M. Janet's work on morals, published apparently some eleven years ago, should be selected for translation. Ethics, though slow of gait, does move on; and since this work was written the theory of morals has been considerably developed in this country as abroad. It is difficult, too, to discover anything very distinctive in M. Janet's fundamental conceptions or in his mode of treatment. Like earlier members of the philosophic school of which he is a distinguished member, his doctrine is largely an assimilation of German ideas. It is only fair, indeed, to the author to say that he explicitly avows the eclectic character of his theory. He strongly approves, he tells us, "the method which is called conciliatory." It must be understood, however, that this effort at conciliation embraces only writers having fundamental principles in common. The whole work might without serious inaccuracy be described as a going back to Aristotle's Ethics, with the advantage of having read Leibniz, Kant, Schleiermacher, and some other modern intuitivists. This retrogression may be a proof of M. Janet's sagacity; for a good case can be made out for the ultimate insolubility of ethical problems; and supposing them to be insoluble there is much to be said for listening to Aristotle's account of them rather than to that of a modern, say Mr. Spencer or Mr. Sidgwick. On the other hand, there are a good many persons who do not take this despondent view of moral science. They see, or think they see, that we have moved far away from the standpoint of Greek ethics, and that we are on the road to a practical solution of ethical questions. Work like that of Mr. Sidgwick, Mr. Spencer, or Mr. Leslie Stephen, is distinctly in the direction of a reconciliation of opposing tendencies in ethics such as M. Janet has not conceived of in his plan of conciliation; and those who have thoroughly assimilated those writers are hardly likely to go back to Aristotle. While, however, M. Janet's work cannot be described as "epoch-making," it is in many respects interesting and suggestive, and gives side glimpses into regions of the history of morals which are not too familiar to Englishmen. Indeed, the chief merit of M. Janet's writings is that they evince careful study of other men's ideas. His is essentially the historical mind which finds a value in all systems (provided they are only intuitional at bottom) just because they are historical, and proposes to itself as its highest goal the assimilation of what is best in the systems. The translator, it may be added, appears to have done her work conscientiously, and to have succeeded in reproducing the sense of the original in a fairly readable form.

TWO NOVELS.*

MR. BLACKMORE'S new book is neither allegory nor novel, neither satire nor romance, but a mixture—not altogether a successful mixture—of all four. A good, sturdy, valiant Englishman, with a profound contempt for Radicalism and Radicals, and a passionate affection for the old-fashioned national virtues and the old-fashioned national glories, he has worked his indignation with things as they are into a counterfeit presentment, partly humorous and partly symbolical, of things as he thinks they ought to be; and the resultant is something which, while often very good reading indeed, is wholly satisfactory from no single point of view, but is felt to be a trifle disappointing, whether we consider it as fiction or as satire, or even as the hybrid the author has intended it to be. The elements of character and manners and romance are hardly full and strong enough for a good novel; the allegory and the sarcasm are hardly happy and complete enough in conception, or sustained and vigorous enough in execution, to make a good satire, political or social. Mr. Blackmore, in fact, has chosen to sit on too many stools at once, and between them has rather come to the ground.

The hero, Sir Thomas Upmore, Bart., M.P. (plain Tommy Upmore to all Europe), is the son of Bucephalus Upmore, a highly respectable soap-boiler in the Maiden Lane of a certain number of years ago. And his story, such as it is, sets forth how Tommy not only married the girl of his heart, but actually saved his country from Panclast and the Radicals, and became immortal for mustering a tremendous Conservative majority, for re-awakening the antique British spirit. This he did while yet a mere youngster, as the representative of an East Anglian pocket-borough; but before he did it he had (Mr. Blackmore being a professional novelist and humorist) to go through a certain amount of fiction, achieve a certain round of adventures, and appear, for all the legendary quality to which he was presently to owe his fame, as the principal figure in a certain number of scenes of manners and studies of character. Beginning as nearly as possible ab ovo, he tells us of his boyish games in Maiden Lane, of his father and mother, and of how "there used to be a fine smell in our parlour of lemons and sugar and a black bottle" when his sailor Uncle William appeared on the scene: with some pleasant particulars about their neighbours—Chumps the butcher, with his valiant son, and Windsor the soap-boiler, with his genteel wife and Polly, their daughter, a charming young person, though flat-footed. In due course he reaches his schooldays at the Partheneion, where he studied the humanities under Dr. Rumbelow (now a bishop), and met his great and glorious friend Professor Megalow (who reminds us of Professor Owen), and developed the peculiar capacity by whose exercise he was one day to save his country and bring confusion on the head of Panclast—Panclast, as like Mr. Gladstone as one pea is like another. 'Twas a strange and perilous gift, for it amounted to nothing less than the ability to fly. Tommy's specific gravity was most abnormal. With the wind at his back he could go like a bird, but with the wind in his teeth even Polly Windsor, flat-footed as she was, could beat him easily; and when he was excited—with indignation, or romance, or any noble sentiment—he could rise into the air, and speed through it like a pigeon on the wing or the astral form of Mme. Blavatsky's best adept. This property it was which got him the acquaintance of those eminent "scientists" (Mr. Blackmore abhors the word, and pillories it between inverted commas), Professors Brachipod, Jargoon, Chocolous, and Mullicles, who debated upon him in a manner that suggests, albeit a little dimly and remotely, the manner of Molière's physicians, and in whose persons Mr. Blackmore evidently pretends to ridicule a good deal of what is ridiculous in modern culture. Tommy is no genius; but he is superior to his fellows in the matter of specific gravity ("Now these things are an allegory"); and thanks to this, he is everwhere successful. A flight at Yarmouth, or thereabouts, brings him into contact with young Sir Roland Twentifold and Sir Roland's sister, Laura. At Oxford, his superhuman lightness makes him the best coxswain that ever steered the Dark Blues to victory. And when, as Laura's betrothed and Sir Roland's nominee, he enters Parliament in the Conservative interest as member for Larkmount, it enables him to create that prodigious and most glorious sensation to which we have already referred.

The occasion was one which has much in common with a recent Vote of Censure debate. British officers had been sent out as British agents, and the British Government had abandoned them; and there was, besides, a Bill (the first of seven) to hand over all the foreign possessions of England to the nations to which they had originally belonged, and to distribute her fleet among them as well. Panclast had temporized and demurred and exhaled a mighty mist of explanation and argument; Lord Grando Crushbill, "without condescending to consult mephitic oracles," had arisen and "met the vile Bill with . . . . the downright 'damn' which every foreigner knows well to be the word by which we live"; Sir Roland had said his say, so had Joe Cowle, the sweep (M.P. for Chimneystacks), so had an honourable member who, from a trick he had of speaking against his party and voting for them immediately after, may be identified with Mr. Forster; Panclast had replied; and all seemed lost for ever. But Tommy rose to his legs, and from his legs to the roof of the Commons; from that eminence he caught the Speaker's eye; and producing a Union Jack from his pocket, he sang a song about a certain flag—

> The flag that's braved a thousand years
> The battle and the breeze.

The effect was electrical. Even the Irish members joined the chorus; the Bill was thrown out by a majority of fifty; the Government went out, and never came in again. Now the Panclast ideals are a thing of the past. "The humbug of" free-trade is dead at last. The blessing of "Paternal Government" (delivered over the wrong dish of broth) is gone back, like a curse, to roost at home. An Englishman now may eat his breakfast without gulping down more lies than tea; and may smile at his children without a smothered sigh at prolonging a race of dastards. In a word, we have now a Government that knows its own mind and has a mind to know," and we can at will, "to save our home, recall that true supporter of our shield and sword, noble once, and not yet ignoble, the sturdy old lion of England."

The New Dance of Death, like Tommy Upmore, is touched with actuality. But the actuality is of a different type; and the purpose of the work, its characters and scenes, its atmosphere and style, its significance, ethical and æsthetic, are different likewise. The book's matter is life as it is; its personages are the men and women of to-day—the professional beauties, the fashionable actors, the æsthetic curates, the pretty actresses, the Happy Elizas of the Salvation Army, the heroes of Monte Carlo and Sandown Park, the Wicked Noblemen who exist but to point a moral and disfigure a tale, and the fair women who make life beautiful and the brave men who make life honourable in spite of that "devil's rigadoon" which constitutes their environment. With these and their doings it is that Messrs. Hake and Lefebre have chosen to deal. They have much to say, and they say it in a style which, in these days of fine writing and finer morality, is worthy of praise. That the originals of their characters will be, rightly or wrongly, identified is unquestionable. Lord Wilborough is made up of more drunkards and debauchees than one; but everybody will recognize him for a particular debauchee and drunkard. Kitty Milroy, the actress of burlesque, recalls a good half-dozen vestals of the Sacred Lamp; but she will be at once identified with a certain individual priestess. And as it is with the characters, so is it with the plot, and with the incidents of which it is compacted. Whether the authors' method is, or is not, legitimate is a question that need not here be discussed. It is enough that they have thought fit to employ it, and that in the main they have something fresh and pertinent to tell, something novel and interesting to record. They are, indeed, so deeply interested in the fact that they are not always sufficiently concerned about its artistic expression. They know a good deal about life, but on the subject of character they are not yet able to discourse to us as artists should. In their next book they must give us less actuality and more creation; and they will be read, not for their experience, but for their art. That they have it in them to achieve this consummation certain scenes in The New Dance of Death—as, for instance, the meeting of Wilborough and Lenner Deigh at "The Jungle," and Wilborough's last interview with his wife, the latter of which, for all its incompleteness and artistic imperfectness, is one of the most daring things in latter-day fiction—abundantly prove.

TWO MUSICAL BOOKS.*

OF all the eccentricities into which people are led by the passion for possessing unique objects, the collecting of old violins without any idea of playing on them seems to be the most absurd and inexcusable. The beauty and interest of violins lie in nothing but the beautiful sounds they produce, and the marvellous manner in which a fine instrument lends itself to become almost part of the performer, and enables him to utter the most lovely and expressive music that can be heard in the world. It is but little better than robbery to be keeping them dumbly boxed up for show, and it is scarcely more excusable for millionaires to be running up the prices, and keeping such magical means of musical expression from men, and women too, who know how to use them, in order that their amateurish progeny may mock the subtle ingenuity of their makers by their unintelligent and irresponsible scraping. Even musical people are hardly aware for how much a first-rate instrument counts in the success of a first-rate violinist. They see, of course, when they use their wits, that the fulness and beauty of tone must make a good deal of difference; but they do not realize that a man can hardly lead a quartet of powerful players with success unless he has a really good instrument, and that there are some fine and powerful effects which are impossible on a second-rate one. When one knows what the difference amounts to it is enough to make one feel socialistic about fiddles, and wish that the treasures in the form of really fine examples could become the property of the nation, and only be given out to men or for occasions that are worthy of them. On the whole, there is comfort in the reflection that violinists are pretty fortunate, considering how entirely they are at the mercy of chance in such an important matter. Most distinguished performers on violin or cello at the present day are blessed with an instrument worthy of their powers, and some have even more than one. But it is a cruel thought that a man can hardly command success with his natural abilities, even if they are of a very high order, unless he can, somehow or other, become possessor of one of these excessively expensive luxuries. A really fine violin may cost twice as much as the finest pianoforte by Broadwood, Steinway, or Erard; and even with luck a man can hardly get a thoroughly good one by an old maker under the ordinary price of the cumbrous domestic music machine; and musicians are not, as a rule, blessed with the superfluity of funds needed for such outlay; while such a thing as picking up old instruments in out-of-the-way corners at lucky prices is next to impossible. Violin-hunting has been done almost more thoroughly and in a more businesslike way than even picture-hunting, which still occasionally rewards the artistic sportsman. Violins of the highest order are considerably less numerous than interesting examples of early Italian painters; and the hand of such a man as Luigi Tarisio, who searched all the corners of his country, and developed in himself a sort of special instinct for discovering the places where they lay hid, and the excellence or worthlessness of his quarry, pretty well cleared all the shy retreats where they could lie hidden. And so between the competition of artists and the fancy of rich amateurs the price of these wonderful instruments has got run up to many times their weight in gold; and perhaps they may go up further still if millionaires are not merciful, till it ultimately becomes the crowning marvel of the strange history of the instrument, that it is too expensive a luxury for any one who can play to keep. The history is altogether full of the strangest mysteries and perplexities, which the excellent little book of Mr. Fleming puts well, clearly, and comprehensively for any one who takes an intelligent interest in such a matter. In the first place, there is mystery enough at all times in a lost art, and it really appears as if the possibility of making a violin at all comparable to the old ones was utterly gone and unrecoverable. People have got all the advantages of the most delicate and sensitive machinery, all the experience of ages of musical development, and all the fruits of acoustical experiments and calculations, and yet they cannot put together a little box of wood with holes in it in such a way that, when compared with those made a couple of centuries ago, they are fit to be called even decent fiddles. And it is not the age of the old ones that makes the difference; it is the art with which they were made, and nothing more. In fact, the skill seems to have been developed by a sort of special instinct, just as it has been with the art to which these perfect instruments minister. The mathematical problems to be coped with would probably be beyond the capacities of even distinguished modern mathematicians—considering the many conditions which have to be allowed for—and they certainly were beyond such men as Joseph Guarnerius and Nicholas Amati, or even the practical-minded Antonio Stradivari, with all his experiments. The great makers evidently arrived at some general principles in the course of a few generations, and then achieved their masterpieces by giving their whole minds to the matter: The achievement seems to have been done by a sort of happy guesswork; or, at all events, by that kind of loose generalizing which a careful mechanic or a scientific experimenter in modern times would look upon as unpractical and unsafe. In later days and in other countries the same sort of conditions seem to have been favourable both in violin and bow making; for men like the unfortunate Jacob Stainer, the best of German makers, and the Forsters in England, were certainly not scientifically trained men; while in the line of bow-making, which seems to entail almost as difficult and delicate calculations as violin-making itself, the famous Frenchman and prince of bow-makers, Tourte, is described as wholly uneducated, and unable even to read or write; while the best of English bow-makers, John Dodd, was apparently something of the same stamp, and spent great part of his life in beer-shops, and ended it in Richmond Workhouse. The most successful of modern French violin-makers, Vuillaume, was a different sort of person; but he, too, seems to have had a special instinct to help him, which he improved by a patient study of the works of the great masters of his art, and by copying them with minute care, and so mastering at least the feeling of their work. A further mystery is that those great masters should have sprung from such a few, and those not first-class, towns in Italy. Gasparo da Salo, who was one of the earliest of the great group of makers, worked in Brescia; and so did Maggini. The Amatis, from Andrew downwards; the family of the Guarnerius, all the Stradivari, and Carlo Bergonzi lived at Cremona. So two towns of no great importance claim all but one of all the makers whose instruments are fit for great violinists to play on; and the why and the wherefore it should be so is certainly enough to puzzle a modern, who naturally enough thinks everything ought to be possible with our knowledge of acoustics and mathematics. There is another point, too, which is liable to be overlooked, and it is rather funny as well as puzzling—which is, that a great proportion of these unsurpassable fiddles were made, and certainly the earlier part of the work of deciding their form was gone through, when there were neither fiddlers of any ability to play on them nor music fit for them to play. Even up to the time of our Charles II. the violin was not looked upon as quite a respectable instrument. Musical men of dignity and self-respect used to play upon viols—stiff, clumsy, heavy, thick-wooded, but picturesque, instruments, with almost every deficiency in the matter of expressive power that could be devised in a member of the violin class. Corelli's and Biber's works for violins, which are the first works of the kind that appear to us to have any musical interest or expressiveness in them, were not before the world till after 1680; and Gasparo da Salo was out of the world by about 1610, and Maggini by 1680. Nicholas Amati—greatest of the name—must have nearly finished his work when Corelli began, for he died in 1684; Antonio Stradivari, the greatest of them all, was Corelli's contemporary, but he did a great deal of his work before Corelli's time; and even Corelli's works, smooth and pleasant as they are, are not the things to draw out the powers of such wonderful instruments as these. It seems as if the instruments were made on speculation a century or so before they were wanted, and without quite knowing what they were wanted for; for their makers cannot possibly have had the least conception of the sort of use a Paganini or a Joachim were going to put their works to; and music such as Beethoven's or Wagner's could never by any possibility have entered into their wildest dreams. There were some few makers besides these few Italians who had fair success. There was, for instance, the French family of Lupot, whose most distinguished member, Nicolas, did such good work that Spohr was able to achieve many of his successes with one of his instruments. But most of the great violinists and cellists have depended upon the little circle of Italians; and except it be Jacob Stainer, who was actually a pupil of the Amati house, it would be difficult to find how they could safely trust themselves elsewhere.

Mr. Fleming's book, besides plenty of general information well and amusingly put, contains a few details about all the makers worth knowing, from the days when lute-making, and viol-making, and violin-making were in the same hands, till Vuillaume, and makers and distinguished repairers even of the present day, and a complete list of names and dates, and an index which makes the book most useful for reference. He also enters fully into the difficult question of varnish and violin acoustics, and expresses his opinion about the pernicious habit of collecting violins with the view of gloating over their dumb bodies in a manner which every one with a feeling for music ought to endorse warmly. He also expresses an idea that a school of violin-making might be successfully worked in this country in connexion with one of the big musical educational establishments, which in times when all things connected with music seem to be improving in the country, need not be altogether impracticable.

Another book which serves to show us pretty clearly how we stand for musicians in this country is a collection of portraits of "Celebrated Musicians," with short biographical notices, which was first brought out in Germany without much reference to this country, and has been republished with an "Appendix for England," under the careful superintendence of Miss M. F. S. Harvey. The representatives of the art from Palestrina and Lasso and Tallis and Byrd down to the present day, have been very carefully and well chosen, and the portraits, which are little oval medallions, are well arranged at the rate of thirty or so on a page. The modern ones are mostly from photographs, the old ones from well-authenticated pictures, which it must have been no small labour to get at. It certainly will be very pleasant to most musical people to be able to see what the men whose works have interested and delighted them looked like in the flesh; and the little biographical summaries, though condemned by the limits of space to be incomplete in matters of detail, are certainly in most cases quite to the point, and give in as few words as may be the characteristics and principal titles to fame of their subjects. German musicians are most copiously represented, as it is right they should be; but Englishmen have liberal space as well, and it is to be hoped that if another appendix is wanted thirty years hence, it may have to occupy twice as much room.

THE CHAMPION ON BILLIARDS.*

THIS book is the joint production of Mr. Cook—who decorates his name on the title-page with the proud, but of late years transient, addition of Champion—and Mr. Payne, who, in the capacity of editor, contributes, by way of introductory and concluding chapters, nearly half the entire letterpress. Between them they cover the whole range of billiard literature. The editor leads off with a formidable account of the difficulties incident to the manufacture of a really good billiard-table and accessories. He observes that "the impenetrable wilds of Africa have to be searched to find the ivory" wherewith to make balls that will run true. If the requisite quality of ivory can only be obtained by searching impenetrable wilds, we should have thought that the initial difficulty attending the successful performance of this operation would prove insuperable. Surely no one but an Irishman would undertake to search for ivory or anything else in "impenetrable" wilds. The furniture suitable to a billiard-room must be bought from the manufacturers of the table and accessories. Where this has not been the case, our editor has been often struck "with a peculiar want of harmony." "Taste," he adds, "is a certain something which is quite indescribable." After this not altogether satisfying definition, he descends from the contemplation of the fitness of things to explain how a billiard-table and accessories may be kept in good condition.

The Champion then proceeds to give instructions how to play the game. In the early part of these instructions we come across the following sentence:—

> It has been a common subject of speculation why so much difference should be exhibited in the game of billiards between first-class professionals and first-class amateurs, a difference not so [sic] shown in almost all other games of skill, or at any rate not nearly to so great an extent.—P. 14.

This sentence led us to prepare for the worst. We fully expected to find the explanations of the various strokes confused and ill arranged. We were, however, agreeably disappointed; for although there are indications that the letterpress has not undergone careful revision either at the hands of Mr. Cook or his editor, we must in fairness allow that the practical explanations are clearly expressed, and well illustrated by a series of correctly-drawn diagrams and of facsimiles of photographs of the author in the act of striking the ball. Moreover, the general instructions both to beginners and to more advanced players are, we think, for the most part sensible, and to the point. The amateur is warned, as he has been many times warned before, against the almost universal tendency to put on side and screw when not required. May this warning produce more effect than its predecessors have done. Mr. Cook also utters a note of warning against the common practice of hitting the ball too high, and observes that he himself rarely strikes the ball above the middle. He is justly indignant with those who come to him to learn, "and all the time think secretly that they know best." "Perhaps," he adds with well-merited sarcasm, "when they read in print the same directions that I have so often told them in the billiard-room, they will think more of it, just as a child thinks far more of what the book says than what the man says who wrote the book" (p. 34). It is, we submit, hard upon children to represent them as enjoying, together with obstinate pupils, a monopoly of that really not uncommon species of folly which is of enormous advantage to the literary profession, and consists in thinking "a book's a book although there's nothing in 't." We do not, however, by any means wish to encourage Mr. Cook's obstinate pupils, and we hope they will duly take to heart the solemn remonstrance addressed to them. The only criticism we shall venture to offer with respect to the general instructions contained in his book, is to suggest a doubt as to whether he does not lay somewhat too great stress on the exact position to be observed in striking the ball, and the proper method of holding the cue. Some great players permit, and even encourage, considerable latitude in these respects, and we think Mr. Cook displays a little too much the temper of the drill-sergeant. He is, moreover, not always quite consistent. For instance, on p. 2 we read, "In taking your aim you should bring the point of the cue to nearly touch the centre of the ball, and then draw the cue backwards and forwards three times, striking the ball the third time"; and on p. 27, "Draw the cue backwards and forwards three or four times, the last time drawing it back rather further than before, then strike." Again, on p. 2 we read that the common fault with beginners is to put down their left hand too near the ball; while on p. 26 we are informed that they are apt to put their hand unduly far off, substituting a foot or more for 9½ inches—the proper distance. These discrepancies would seem to indicate an indisposition on the part of the author to revise what he has written—a feeling shared by many literary men. It will probably astonish many people to learn that Mr. Cook gives no directions whatever as to dividing the balls, except in the simple case of the half-ball, as he believes that any further directions would be practically useless. It is scarcely necessary to say that on this point he is entirely at variance with most of his predecessors, who have devoted a large portion of their treatises to this part of the subject, which is usually considered of great importance. He is, moreover, severe upon those persons who think the game can be taught on mathematical principles. He even objects to the statement that when a ball is hit against the cushion without any side, the angles of incidence and reflection are equal, on the ground that this statement is not mathematically accurate, inasmuch as those angles vary slightly with the elasticity of the cushion, the speed of the ball, and the amount of friction caused by the cloth. But in the following slipshod sentence he concedes to the mathematician as much probably as would be claimed:—"The only practical view," writes Mr. Cook, "to take of the angles of incidence and reflection being supposed to be equal is, that they are sufficiently nearly so that [sic] it forms a rough guide to players in calculating their strokes" (p. 19). The question of the application of mathematics to billiards is not settled, as our author appears to think, by the circumstance of his being willing to play any scientific gentleman who has calculated "the coefficient of dynamical friction" for a sovereign, and give him 30 in 100. Not content with being chief of the executive, Mr. Cook aspires to the position of legislator with regard to billiards. Having finished his practical instructions to beginners and others, he devotes a chapter to printing the Championship Rules, drawn up in 1870. The next chapter he devotes to an exposition of his own views of how those rules ought to be reformed, and in the following chapter he prints his New Code. The alterations are not in the majority of cases important, but by Rule 26 he proposes to introduce a startling innovation. By this rule it is laid down that, whenever a striker or an opponent obstructs or hastens the speed of any ball or balls, the opponent or striker (instead of, as at present, being given only the option of having the balls replaced or broken) may have the ball or balls placed where he thinks they would have run; and the striker, if he is the aggrieved person, may in addition claim any stroke (p. 116). We should certainly have thought that, in a match where there was an umpire or referee, the umpire or referee would be the proper person to decide the very delicate question of where the balls would have run, and not the aggrieved player.

Mr. Cook also prints revised rules of pyramids and pool, and gives many useful hints to those who desire to become proficients in either game, where proficiency is so profitable. As regards pool, he dips slightly into the much-abused science of mathematics, with the view of showing the circumstances in which it is desirable to star. His remarks on this head are, however, confined to a very simple case, and do not possess any great value. Skittle pool, and other minor games are noticed; and Mr. Cook then gives his readers an interesting and instructive chapter on "Trick Shots, Fancy Shots, and Catch Bets." The part of the book for which the Champion is responsible ends with a short chapter on how to train for a billiard-match. Early rising, it seems, is not an essential part of the daily programme. Mr. Cook allows himself considerable latitude in this particular. He gets up "about 9 or 10 o'clock," and breakfasts at 11. He then plays racquets at Lord's, and usually walks for about two hours in the course of the day. He dines at 6, plays a thousand-up by gaslight, takes an hour's practice on the spot, and goes to bed at midnight. On the day of the match, if it begins at 8, he dines at 4, takes an hour's practice, but no other exercise, and carefully avoids all unaccustomed exercise shortly before a match, as tending to make the muscles stiff.

Thus far Mr. Cook; the remaining 136 pages are devoted to a History of Billiards from 1861 to 1882, compiled by the editor, partly from his own articles in Land and Water, and partly from the columns of the Sportsman and of a weekly journal of which the name is not disclosed. These cuttings, giving an account of the principal matches, are pieced together by a chronological summary of the less important events. From the formidable array of figures cited some interesting statistics may be picked out, showing the marvellous progress of the game as evinced by the great and increasing superiority of the younger players over those of the previous generation. In conclusion, we would ask the reader to take our word for it, that although Mr. Cook does not always come out grammatically victorious in the struggle to express his views as to the application of mathematics to billiards, he is nevertheless quite capable of giving a clear and accurate exposition of the practical aspect of the game. The book furnishes a striking example of the truth of Horace's remark:—

> Cui lecta potenter erit res
> Nec facundia deseret hunc, nec lucidus ordo;

and we believe it will rank as a standard work on the interesting subject of which it treats.

NORHAM CASTLE.*

IT would not be easy to name a nobler subject for a monograph than that grand monument of episcopal magnificence and princely power, the "Queen of Border fortresses," long the "Castle Dangerous" of the Scotch marches, still so stately in its ruins, the Castle of Norham-on-Tweed, the eventful annals of which it is the object of Mr. Jerningham to trace in the attractive-looking turquoise-blue clad volume now before us, intended, the author tells us, to furnish "a portable compendium in a readable form of the more bulky and exhaustive works devoted to the stronghold and the adjacent district." Founded by the Red King's bold and unscrupulous Minister, Ralph le Flambard, as the "Northern home" of the see, restored and partly rebuilt by Hugh Pudsey, raised to almost regal splendour by the magnificent Antony Bek, "the maist prowd and masterful Bushop in all England"—King, Patriarch, Bishop, and Palatine all in one—strengthened by Wolsey's early patron the wise and politic Bishop Fox, the negotiator of the marriage between James IV. of Scotland and the Princess Margaret, who made Durham one of the steps of his ladder of episcopal preferments which, beginning at Exeter and mounting by Bath and Wells, ended at Winchester—its last episcopal occupant was the saintly and deservedly revered Cuthbert Tunstall, whose ill fate it was to fall on troublous days of religious change ill suited to his gentle and peace-loving spirit. Not even the proud height of Durham itself, with the vast mass of the cathedral and castle frowning down upon the swiftly-flowing Wear, is more completely identified than Norham with the grandest memories of the historic see of St. Cuthbert, whose banner again and again went forth from its walls, at the head of the forces of "the bishoprick" and was never tarnished by defeat, and of the long line of spiritual princes who, in strange contrast with the meek ascetic of Lindisfarne, ruled the Palatinate. Nor is its place in civil history less conspicuous. The object of never-ceasing disputes between the English and Scottish kings, now in the hands of one power now of the other, repeatedly visited by the ubiquitous John, who in 1211 here received the homage of Alexander, the son of William the Lion, who had himself knelt before John as his feudal lord ten years before at Lincoln; besieged in 1215 by the same Alexander for forty days, with the ill success which usually attended the attempts on its massy walls; the scene of the meeting four years later, 1219, between Alexander and Pandulf, the Papal legate, to settle disputes between the two kingdoms; the head-quarters of Edward I., the "Malleus Scotorum," in his Scottish campaigns, who here with a large following of Northern barons, in 1291, as "overlord" of the kingdom, in the church still standing, heard, weighed, and decided on the rival claims of Baliol and Bruce to the Scottish Crown; Baliol, it is said, owing the preference, so disastrous to the peace of Scotland, to the influence of the all-powerful Bishop Antony Bek, who, in 1296, brought a force of 1,000 foot and 500 horse and 140 knights to his sovereign's aid, heading it himself in full armour—no place played a more distinguished part in all the stormy scenes of Border warfare. The Castle was long fruitlessly besieged by the forces of Robert the Bruce, and was at last taken by storm as the crowning exploit of the Border campaign, which ended in the recognition of Scotland as an independent sovereignty, and of Bruce as its king, by the treaty of Northampton. It was more than once attacked by James IV. of Scotland. The first time was when, in 1497, he crossed the Border with his forces

> To back the cause of that mock prince,
> Warbeck, that Flemish counterfeit, and appeared before it in person, but after a fortnight's sharp assault was forced to retire. Two years later a trifling affray beneath the walls of the Castle between some Scotch marauders and the keepers of the fortress led to wearisome negotiations between the two monarchs, which issued in the marriage of Henry VII.'s daughter to James IV., and thus eventually brought about the union of the Crowns. Once again, shortly before the disastrous battle of Flodden, James besieged Norham, which, though not without suspicion of treachery, was surrendered to him and very roughly handled. This is the epoch at which the magic pen of Sir Walter Scott has clothed

> Norham's castled steep
> And Tweed's fair river broad and deep with a not altogether fictitious romance in Lord Marmion's supposed visit to its Castellan, the husband of the Lady Heron, who, while "hostage for her lord" at his Court, had by her "witching eye" gained a fatal sway over the Scotch monarch's impressible heart, causing him to waste in "amorous dalliance" the precious hours when a gleam of success had shone upon his arms, and

> First they heard King James had won
> Etall and Wark and Ford; and then
> That Norham Castle strong was ta'en;

and then

> That while his host inactive lay,
> And melted by degrees away,
> King James was dallying off the day
> With Heron's wily dame.

The spell of the enchanter is too potent to allow us to inquire whether "Sir Hugh Heron's" true name was not William, and whether, at the time of Lord Marmion's visit to Norham, he was not a prisoner in Scotland, while his lady was living in his own castle at Ford. Whether his details are strictly accurate or not, Scott in a few lines has given Norham Castle a more vivid reality, and enabled us more fully to realize the kind of place it was and the life that was lived in it, as well as many of the chief events with which its stern grey towers have been illustrated, than Mr. Jerningham has done in the two hundred and seventy pages of the volume before us, to which we must now direct our readers' attention.

We wish we could say that the book was worthy of its surpassingly attractive subject. Unfortunately, the perusal of a very few pages is sufficient to prove that Mr. Jerningham is unequal to his self-imposed task. To write an historical work, it is certainly desirable that the author should have some rudimentary knowledge of history; enough, at least, to save him from blunders as to elementary facts which would disgrace a child of the higher standards of our elementary schools. And this is more than we can say for Mr. Jerningham. And yet it is as an historical work that Mr. Jerningham desires his monograph to be regarded. In his preface he calls attention to "its strictly historical character," and emphasizes "the especial care he has taken not to prejudice the work by inaccuracies"—"so far, at least," he somewhat naïvely adds, "as lay in my power." To show the pains he has taken to secure accuracy, he appends a list of the "authors and authorities consulted in the course of the work." It is a strangely heterogeneous assortment, in which "Ecclesiastical History of the English Nation. By Ven. Bede" (sic) ranks next to "Froissart's Chronicles," and "Camden's Brittania" (sic) is followed by "Select Charters and Constitutional History"—apparently one and the same work—"by Stubbs"; while "Bosworth's Anglo-Saxon Dictionary," which he elsewhere introduces to his readers as "a most elaborate and interesting work," stands side by side with such recondite works as the "Border Magazine," "Collins's Peerage," and "Dibdin's Antiquarian Tour." The list of "Histories of England" consulted, besides those of Lingard, Hume and Smollett (sic), and Froude, contains one by a certain "Valentine Green," which puzzles us not a little. There certainly was an engraver of that name, who somewhere about the end of the last century published a "History of Worcester." But we never heard of his literary ambition going beyond the limits of his native city. A History of England from his pen is new to us, and we think to the world of letters also. Is it possible, we are inclined to ask, that our lamented friend John Richard Green lurks behind this pseudonym? Mr. Jerningham's power of blundering renders such a confusion by no means impossible. The History of the English People is certainly often quoted.

Instead of all this parade of research, far exceeding his power of digestion, it might have been as well if the author had read with attention any cheap Compendium of English History that he might find in the schools at his own door. Any one of these would have taught him that Adela, Stephen's mother, was the daughter, not as he states the sister, of William the Conqueror; that the Empress Maud was also the daughter, not the niece, of Henry I., and that Geoffrey, Duke of Brittany, was the younger, not the elder, brother of Richard Cœur de Lion; and, to omit other blunders hardly less gross, would have shown him that Henry I.'s nephew, William Earl of Flanders, son of Robert Curthose, having died seven years before his uncle, could hardly have been the next heir to the throne on his decease. As an example of the hopeless muddle Mr. Jerningham makes of his history and his want of comprehension of the best known facts, let our readers take the following passage:—

> In 1135 King Henry died. He never recovered the loss of his beloved William in the wreck of the White Skiff [why, we may ask in passing, this affected spelling? White Skip is surely the English of "la Blanche Nef"]. He never smiled from the hour that, on hearing the news which deprived him of all that he loved, and of an heir on whom he had placed all his hopes, he had fallen unconscious to the ground.
> His nephew William, son of his brother Robert, was his heir, but Henry hated him.
>
> His niece Maud, widow of the Emperor Henry the Fifth of Germany, was a favourite.

One would suppose from this that Maud was one of many nieces, the special object of her uncle's affection:—

> And despite the seeming strangeness of seeing a woman succeed, Henry recognized her as his heir, and married her to the Count of Anjou.
> On the other hand, Stephen, son of the Conqueror's sister Adela, married to the Count de Blois, was also a claimant to the throne on the demise of his cousin William, which happened the same year as King Henry's death.

After quoting without acknowledgment Mr. Green's account of Stephen's uproarious welcome by the citizens of London, and their oath to "defend him with money and blood," while omitting the somewhat essential fact of London having claimed the right of electing the sovereign, Mr. Jerningham proceeds:—

> Thus the claim of Maud was set aside, but Geoffrey of Anjou was not likely to allow this without a struggle. The late King had recognized Maud as his heir; his Council at his suggestion had ratified the choice; Stephen had an elder brother, and the people of London were not the people of England; so reasoned Geoffrey.
> Here was ground for dispute, and no wonder that for twenty years England became the scene of anarchy and misrule.

It may be asked what has this precious piece of history to do with Norham? But on reading on we shall find that its purpose is to introduce the first siege sustained by the Castle after its erection by Ralph the Firebrand—perversely called "De Flambard" by Mr. Jerningham (p. 56), as if "Flambard" were a place-name—by King David of Scotland, who, "having warmly embraced the cause of Geoffrey Plantagenet, practically evinced his sympathy with Matilda and dislike for Stephen in the invasion of Northumberland," and attacking its strongholds. Wark resisted successfully, but Norham capitulated, and was held by David till his defeat at the Battle of the Standard compelled him to restore it to its episcopal master. Mr. Jerningham omits to mention the cause of David's efforts in behalf of Maud, for whose name he so strangely substitutes that of her husband Geoffrey. Does he need to be told that David was her mother's brother, who might naturally be expected to exhibit some "sympathy" for a niece deprived of her inheritance, and "dislike" for the usurper who was keeping her out of it? For anything that appears in Mr. Jerningham's narrative, David was simply swayed by personal likes and dislikes, and might just as reasonably have espoused Stephen's side as Matilda's.

We have given a specimen of Mr. Jerningham's mode of dealing with civil history; let us now try him on the side of religious history. Here he is equally at fault. Disregarding Horace's condemnation of the poet who he begins his history of the Castle of Norham with the landing in Iona of St. Columba—"the giant-sized Columba," as he calls him, through a mistaken deduction from the "lofty stature"—"alta proceritas quæ vertice nubes tangere videbatur"—in Adamnan's story of Oswald's vision. The "nota major imago," as Dr. Reeve reminds us, was "of old an acknowledged property of the shades." The connexion between St. Columba and Norham Castle is not self-evident. It requires a little thought to trace it. Here it is. Norham Castle was built by Bishop Flambard of Durham. It had long been part of St. Cuthbert's patrimony. The first church there had been built by a Bishop of Lindisfarne. Two hundred years before St. Aidan had become the first bishop of that see. Aidan was a monk of Iona; Columba its first abbot. And so the chain is fitted together. But, if it had been desirable for Mr. Jerningham to go so far back in his history and trace the "origines" of Norham up to their founder's head, it would have been as well if he had been more accurate in his facts. His romantic tale of the arrival of St. Aidan at Iona, prophetically announced to St. Columba, is utterly baseless. We give some sentences as a specimen of our author's grand style:—

> The welcomed stranger was a young man of comely face and gentle manner, between eighteen and twenty-two in age.
> His bright blue eyes spoke as to his gentleness, while his tall, graceful figure bore visible testimony to the nobility of his birth.
>
> Making his way to the little cell on the eminence outside of which sat the giant-sized Columba, he knelt before him, asked for his blessing, and the favour of being admitted among his disciples.
> Aidan, or Ædhan was his name, and in him Columba saluted the first apostle of Northumbria, the future founder of Melrose and of Lindisfarne.

Will it be believed that there is not a word of all this in Adamnan or Bede, and that nothing whatever is known of St. Aidan's early history? The whole story, when not, like the famous camel, developed from Mr. Jerningham's inner consciousness, is based on a mistaken identity. Adamnan, it is true, does record the advent of a "molestus hospes," who would force the brothers to break their Wednesday's fast, being revealed to Columba, and that the name of the unwelcome guest was Aidan. But, though "vir valde religiosus," he was an altogether different person from the Northumbrian apostle, requiring two folio columns of Colman's Trias Thaumaturga to identify him among the twenty-three Aidans in the Irish Calendar. The storm which gives Mr. Jerningham an opportunity of launching out into a grand description of "mountainous waves," "giant waters," as the tempest "develops in intensity," is also borrowed from the story of the arrival of St. Cainneth, similarly predicted by St. Columba, and has nothing whatever to do with this or any other Aidan. The reception of Oswald, the future sainted king of Northumbria, when "a little boy of great promise," at Iona, and his being "placed for instruction under the special charge of the gentle Aidan," with a number of petty details of "early friendship" and "boyish dreams," is an equally bold fiction. It is true that when his father Ethelfrith lost his kingdom and his life, Oswald, with his brothers, took refuge across the Scottish border, and that he received baptism at the hands of the disciples of St. Columba. But there is not a tittle of evidence that Oswald ever set foot in Iona, while it is beyond question that Aidan was personally a stranger to the young King when, at his request, he was sent by the brethren of Iona to take the place of the crabbed Corman—not Corman, as Mr. Jerningham spells the name, for which the more than doubtful authority of Hector Boethius is the only warrant—to evangelize his pagan Northumbrians. Even if Mr. Jerningham were writing an historical romance, it would be well to make sure of his facts before he set about dressing them up in a picturesque narrative. But the emphasis he lays on the "historical character" of his book, and on his care to avoid inaccuracies, renders the mistakes that meet us on almost every page the less intelligible, and, we may add, the less excusable. To mention one or two of the more marked blunders we have noticed in the earlier pages of the work—to catalogue the whole would be a herculean task—the bishop who built the first stone church at Norham, which he so oddly tells us caused "a great commotion in that pretty village," at that time certainly non-existent, was not Egfrid, but Ecgred; while the pious King Ceolwulf, whose body "it was whispered everywhere was to be translated to the new church," had certainly never been "a bishop of Lindisfarne," but simply, after resigning his crown, a monk of the house. It is novel geography to make Deira—the modern Yorkshire—comprise "the actual Northumberland," while Bernicia is restricted to "the country between the Tweed and the Forth"; and with a vivid recollection of Wilfrid's missionary adventures among the pagans of Sussex and the Isle of Wight, and the itinerant preaching of St. Chad among the heathen of Mercia, it is somewhat startling to be told that the provinces just named "were the last portions of the British Isles to receive the teaching of Christianity." It is only once that Mr. Jerningham ventures to touch etymology. The single instance is enough. In happy ignorance of the force of the genitival an so frequent in Anglo-Saxon place-names—e.g. Bathan-ceaster, Cissan-ceaster, Aebban-dun (Abingdon), Huntan-dun, and the like—he dogmatically pronounces the old name of Norham, Ubban-ford = Ubbas ford, "to be a mistake," and that the true form of the word is "Ufan-ford," "the high ford or the ford above," and this chiefly because in Boswell's "Anglo-Saxon Dictionary"—that "elaborate and interesting work"—he cannot find a single word "beginning by ub." The name Ubbanford is of course an interesting Danish relic, answering to Hubbasthorp, Hubberholm, and Hubberston in other parts of England. When we have mentioned that the "Welsh marches" are turned into the "Welsh marshes," among which King John is said to have contracted a fever, and that we are treated to such forms as "Pictaria or Poicten," "Sirousby" for Scrooby, Archbishop "Turstin," and Bishop "Ruttall," while Bishop Tunstall is innocently styled the "last Catholic bishop of Durham," the leading representative of "a clergy doomed to disappear for good or for evil within the next few years," our readers will know how far Mr. Jerningham can be trusted as an historical guide.

The architectural description of Norham Castle, one of the noblest remains of the noblest period of castle-building in England, having been borrowed, with his permission, from a paper by Mr. G. T. Clark (Mr. Jerningham cannot even copy this gentleman's initials correctly. He stands in his pages as Mr. J. G. Clark), in the Journal of the Archæological Institute, we need hardly say that this part of the book leaves nothing to be desired. It is as masterly and as vivid as that gentleman's descriptions always are. The chapter embodying Mr. Clark's remarks may be safely recommended as the best worth reading in the whole volume. Mr. Jerningham, however, should not have talked of "barbacans," or have translated the name of Bishop Pudsey's architect "Robertus Ingeniator," by Robert "the Ingenious."

We have said enough to show that Mr. Jerningham, in undertaking an historical work, has mistaken his vocation, and that any one adopting his book as an authority is more likely to be led wrong than right. It would be unfair, however, to a gentleman who has evidently taken great pains to get up his subject, and who writes with the enthusiasm of one who has a hearty affection for that which he is writing about, not to say that his book affords in a moderate compass a fairly readable account of the history of the fortress and of the stirring events which have been enacted at or near its walls. Those who care more for broad general effects than for historic truth and circumstantial accuracy may, faute de mieux, take it as their travelling companion when next they visit the Tweed and the Border, with the hope that they will not find it otherwise than interesting, especially when read among the very scenes of which it treats.

HAY FEVER.*

AT this season of the year the above-named disease is a subject of painful interest to the not inconsiderable number of persons who are liable to its attacks; and to all such Dr. Morell Mackenzie's lecture and Dr. Moore's pamphlet will be full of interest. The name "summer catarrh" is perhaps preferable to the more commonly used "hay fever" and "hay asthma," as the pollen which is the cause of the disease may be derived from other sources than the flowering grasses, and neither elevated temperature nor asthma necessarily accompany the attack. Mackenzie gives Bostock the credit of having first described this affection in 1819, whilst Moore says that Hoberden mentions it in a Latin treatise published in 1802. Though the cause of summer catarrh was not recognized until the beginning of the present century, the disease had probably been in existence long before. Various irritants—such as cold air, the poison of measles, sulphurous acid, ipecacuanha—may cause similar symptoms to those produced by the application of pollen to the mucous membranes, yet none of the former are likely to be applied with the persistence of the latter, with which the atmosphere is loaded at this period of the year. Hence the following definition of the disease by Dr. Mackenzie may be considered correct—namely, "a peculiar affection of the mucous membrane of the nose, eyes, and air passages, giving rise to catarrh and asthma, almost invariably caused by the action of the pollen of grasses and flowers, and therefore prevalent only when they are in bloom."

Patients of nervous temperament are most obnoxious to this disease, and consequently it is not surprising that it is more common among persons of the upper and middle classes who work with their brains than among those who gain their living by manual labour. It is, however, curious that women, in spite of their sensitive nervous organisation, are much less subject to it than men. As in all neurotid affections heredity plays an important part.

The symptoms of summer catarrh are like those of a violent cold in the head, but, unlike those symptoms, do not pass away in a day or two, but recur day after day during the spring and early summer months. The heavy, swollen, and watering eyes; the streaming nose rapidly becoming red and sore round the orifices of the nostrils; the paroxysms of sneezing; the dull headache; the harsh dry skin; the distaste for work or play; the irritability of temper and disgust with the world in general, present a mental picture of a condition with which we are only too familiar in our own persons or those of our friends. In those subject to asthma, their distress is terribly aggravated by the addition of difficulty of breathing to the foregoing symptoms. Drs. Mackenzie and Moore both point out that nettle-rash is frequently associated with summer catarrh; this fact, as well as the frequent occurrence of asthma, is evidence of the neurotic constitution of the sufferers from this disease. No danger to life is to be apprehended as the result of attacks of this affection, nor is there much risk of structural injury unless the asthma occurring with it is very prolonged and severe, when pulmonary emphysema would be likely to be produced. May and June are the months during which summer catarrh is most prevalent; these months being the flowering season of most of the grasses; but its intensity varies with the amount of pollen in the atmosphere, and this changes greatly under different conditions of temperature, moisture, force of wind, &c. As the disease is caused by the access of pollen-laden air to the ocular and nasal mucous membranes, the first object of those endeavouring to escape an attack must be to prevent such access. Both our authors point out that this indication can be most successfully carried out by removal of the patient to a situation in which the atmosphere contains very little pollen, such as a small island, e.g. Sark in the Channel Islands, or a long sea voyage may be taken, or the same object may be less completely attained by residence at the seaside. For obvious reasons, this plan can only be carried out by a very small proportion of sufferers from summer catarrh. It remains to be considered how those who must live and work under constant exposure to the irritant can best protect themselves from it and mitigate its evil effects on their health.

Dr. Mackenzie recommends plugging the nostrils with cotton-wool and wearing spectacles with large frames fitting accurately round the orbit. If this plan be adopted, the plugs should be sufficiently loose to allow of respiration taking place through them, so that the mouth may be kept closed, and they are rendered more effectual by being moistened with carbolated oil. Dr. Blackley has invented a nasal respirator, which can be worn with comfort and is scarcely noticeable from a short distance. Dr. Mackenzie also suggests that a fine gauze veil should be worn, fastened round the hat and attached below to an iron ring resting on the shoulders. The irritability of the nervous system should be reduced to a minimum by great attention to the general health in such matters as diet, exercise in the open air, early hours, cold bathing, avoidance of over-fatigue, &c., and by the exhibition of nerve-tonics, as quinine, arsenic, and valeriaeate of zinc. Dr. Mackenzie relies more particularly on valerianate of zinc. When the disease is established, a combination of quinine, morphia, and camphor is the most powerful remedy for relief of the catarrhal symptoms. Where asthmatic attacks complicate the disease, inhalation of the fumes from burning nitre-paper, stramonium, datura tatula, or Himrod's Powder will often give great relief. It cannot, however, be too strongly impressed upon every sufferer from this distressing disease that he will best consult his own interest by seeking the advice of his medical attendant, who, from his knowledge of the patient's constitutional peculiarities, will be best able to judge of the plan of treatment most likely to prove serviceable.

LITHUANIAN MYTHOLOGY.*

THIIS is an excellent work in which a subject of great interest is treated in a thoroughly scientific manner. Dr. Veckenstedt, during the four years which he spent at Libau in Courland, where he was one of the Professors of the Nicolai Gymnasium, devoted his leisure time to collecting and studying the traditions still current among the Lithuanian inhabitants of the Government of Kovno. The result of his labour of love is the present rich collection of stories and statements, by the aid of which we are made acquainted with more than "a hundred forms of Samogitian mythology and Saga-world, which have hitherto been either utterly unknown to science, or of which little more was previously known than their names." It forms a worthy successor to the sound and exhaustive work which Dr. Veckenstedt published in 1880 on Wendische Sagen.

Lithuanian mythology was treated as early as the year 1615 by Lasicius, who said of the gods and demons mentioned in his work, De Diis Samogitarum, that their number was "almost as great as that of the divinities named by Hesiod," and it was elaborately dealt with in 1835 by Narbutt in his Mitologia Litewska; but as Schafarik said in 1839, these studies were only "fore-studies." Since then such writers as Schleicher, Nesselmann, Kurschat, Tettau, Temme, Langkusch, Bezzenberger, and many others, have done much to render popular the study of Lithuanian speech and mythology, and the recently founded Lituanische Litterarische Gesellschaft, an excellent Society too little known in Western Europe, has thrown much light upon many dark portions of a long almost untrodden field of research. The late Wilhelm Mannhardt devoted several years to exploring that field, and he is said to have left behind him a valuable, but as yet unpublished, work upon Lithuanian mythology. It is to be trusted that it may soon see the light. Meantime we cannot be too thankful to Dr. Veckenstedt for the trustworthy work he has produced, which has certainly cost him much pains, and is said to have cost him his professorship. For the Russian Government, which had already forbidden the printing of Lithuanian texts in any but the Cyrillic character, has recently, it appears, set its face against any scientific study of the Lithuanian language.

* Die Mythen, Sagen und Legenden der Zamaiten (Litauer). Gesammelt und herausgegeben von Dr. Edm. Veckenstedt. 2 Bde. Heidelberg. 1883.

About that language some linguists have indulged in rather wild conjectures. Certain persons, says Dr. Veckenstedt, have declared that any Lett could make himself understood in India; Lettish standing in the same relation to Lithuanian, to employ Schleicher's simile, as Italian to Latin. We have ourselves heard an erudite but erratic German philologist assert that, if Sanskrit had perished, it might have been reconstructed by means of Lithuanian; and the statement is often made that Lithuanian stands nearer to Sanskrit than any other European language, and is almost on a level with it in antiquity. On this point the opinion of Professor Leskien, the joint author with K. Brugmann of an excellent work on Litauische Volkslieder und Märchen, is worthy of being cited. It is to be found in the Transactions of the Philological Society for 1877. In a report on the group of tongues to which he proposes to give the name of "Baltic Languages," comprising Lithuanian, Lettish, and Old Prussian, he says:—"Lithuanian is intimately allied only to the Slavonic family, just as Zend is to Sanskrit, and is by no means of such thoroughgoing antiquity as a few arbitrarily chosen examples might easily make any one believe who has no special knowledge of the language." At the same time Professor Leskien lays due stress on the undoubted fact that it "is of primary importance in the comparative treatment of the Slavonic languages."

Old Prussian has long ago been silenced as a spoken tongue, and it has left behind it all but no literary remains. With Lettish Dr. Veckenstedt does not deal. The language to which he devotes himself is that of the Žamaiten, or Samogitians. Nesselmann, in his Lithuanian Dictionary, says that Žemaitis means Ein Niederunger, an inhabitant of Russian Lithuania, which lies lower than Prussian Lithuania. As far back as the year 1420, Witold, Grand Duke of Lithuania, in writing to the Emperor Sigismund, stated that the terra Samaytarum was called Szomuth, because that word in Lithuanian meant "lower land." But Dr. Veckenstedt says that, as a matter of fact, Samogitian is spoken over the whole of the Northern portion of Prussian Lithuania, as well as in Russian Lithuania. The material for his present book he has collected exclusively in the Russian province of Kovno. In obtaining it he has been assisted by several well-known scholars, and also by many unlettered natives. Among the persons who contributed stories were several schoolboys, for relying upon whom Dr. Veckenstedt has been most unreasonably taken to task in the Neue Dörpt'sche Zeitung. He remarks that the aid of schoolboys in similar circumstances has been acknowledged by such thoroughly scientific collectors as Bernhard Schmidt, Virgil Grohmann, Karl Bartsch, and Wilhelm Mannhardt. He might have added to this weighty list of names that of J. G. von Hahn, who says in the preface to his well-known collection of modern Greek tales, that he did not succeed in obtaining a single story till the happy idea occurred to him of offering a reward to a number of schoolboys, who were leaving Athens for their holidays, if they would collect tales for him while they were at home. The longest, and perhaps the most important, legend contained in Dr. Veckenstedt's book, called by him the Stammsage of the Žamaiten, he obtained from a peasant woman, whose mother had often heard it from the lips of her grandfather, a farmer who had lost the sight of his eyes during a fire, and who devoted his enforced leisure to recitation. The Saga in question occupies more than sixty pages of the book. It may be summarized as follows.

Ages ago men became so wicked that God determined to destroy all but a very few. The rare exceptions were for the most part preserved, along with pairs of all sorts of animals, in a golden palace on a mountain-top. A boy and girl, born of parents who were "neither good nor bad," had been previously carried off by an angel from their respective homes on the day of their birth, and were brought up in a crystal palace suspended in mid air, where they were tended by a mute female figure of gold. When they grew up, they married, and a girl was born to them. The destruction of the wicked having been effected by fire, the earth was thereby greatly smirched. So giants were sent to wash it clean. They used so much water that a deluge was produced, and the waters rose so high that the golden palace and its inmates were in danger of being submerged. But Auksstis, the Lithuanian Varuna, rescued them by means of a capacious nutshell, which the rising waters wafted up to the crystal palace in which the young couple and their girl resided. That child was left in pledge with the golden figure. The father and mother joined their fellow men and women in the nutshell, which drifted with the ebbing wave till it was stranded on the reappearing earth. The passengers landed and occupied the country from which the waves had receded. Meantime, the girl who had been left in the crystal palace grew up, and was conveyed to heaven, where she married Perkunas—originally the Lithuanian counterpart of the Vedic Parjanya, a rain-god, afterwards the Lithuanian Indra or Thor, the thunder-god. As she was of earthly descent she had been named Žamaite, žémé meaning earth (cf. Russ. semlyá, Lat. humus), and the son she bore was called Dîngis, apparently the sky, dangis being Lithuanian for heaven. After a time Žamaite was sent down from heaven to the golden palace on the mountain-top, where she was provided with a mortal husband. From their union sprang a family, which multiplied exceedingly. These descendants of Žamaite borrowed from her the name of Žamaiten, earth-born, Autochthones. Becoming troublesome, they were turned out of the golden palace by their ancestress, who ordered three angels to conduct them to their destined abode. This being done, Žamaite was at liberty to return to heaven, the spell which bound her to earth being broken. The wandering Žamaiten encountered numerous difficulties. They were at first starting as simple as Gothamites, but they gradually acquired experience. Most of the nations whose lands they traversed were hostile to them. But the Letts received them kindly, and eventually joined with them in their wanderings. For the Žamaiten continued their nomadic life, having been told to move on "half towards the evening and half towards the midnight," apparently in a north-westerly direction, until they should receive word to stop. After leaving the territory of the Prussians, by whom also they were hospitably received, the united wanderers passed through districts inhabited by all sorts of monsters, such as giants, dwarfs, centaurs, and Medusas. At last they came to a land near the sea, where Žamaite appeared to them in all her glory, carrying a banner on which was written "This is your land." There they settled, but the Letts went on a little further and occupied a district close to the sea. After a time the Žamaiten offended their ancestress, who sent her celestial spouse Perkunas to punish them. Many of them were thunder-smitten. The rest humbled themselves. Then Žamaite read the survivors a useful lesson, conducting them down through a mountain cleft into hell, where they saw how the wicked are punished, and afterwards leading them across a cobweb bridge and up a golden staircase into heaven, where they were shown the just enjoying themselves. For awhile they behaved well, and during this period they and the Letts, and their old friends the Prussians, united into one nation. After a time they fell away again, and were, in consequence of their bad behaviour, grievously tormented by the Plague and the Cholera and other female demons. At length Žamaite took pity upon them, and sent her divine son Dîngis to rule over them. Then ensued the golden age of the Žamaiten. But at last he was recalled to heaven. Before he went there he led all his warriors into the interior of a mountain, which then closed in upon them. There they still sleep. Dîngis lives in heaven with his father Perkunas and his mother Žamaite. But the day will come when he will obtain leave to go back to his people on earth. There he will reappear together with his divine parents. He will rouse from their long slumber his sleeping warriors, all enemies shall be swept away, and the Žamaite millennium will begin.

We have left but scanty space for the shorter tales that abound in Dr. Veckenstedt's volumes, which are provided, we are thankful to say, with an unusually excellent index. It must suffice to state that there are very many of these stories which we should be glad to quote, dealing as they do with some of the most interesting of the Lithuanian deities or demons. Many of these mythological beings will be now for the first time brought before the eyes of most readers. It is true that Perkunas, partly on account of his great similarity with the Russian thunder-god Perun, has long been vaguely known to comparative mythologists; Auszra or Ausca, the Dawn, has already been linked with the Vedic Ushas; Potrimpus, a supposed water-god, Kremutis, a suggested patron of pigs, Bangputis, the ruler of the waves, and other divinities of old Lithuanian religion, have been already submitted to much critical investigation. But it may be assumed as certain that to the great majority of mankind the names are utterly unknown of such once honoured personages as Ugniedokas and Ugniegawas, the divine smiths, closely allied with the Saints Cosmas and Damian of Russian mythology, beings closely connected with the worship of fire, the word for which is in Lithuanian ugnis, differing but little from the Russian ogon, almost identical with the Vedic agni; or the spring and youth goddess Ziline, whose name is derived from talas, green, in Russian зелень; or Beslea, the goddess of calamity, the spouse of the Devil; or a number of personifications of all that is most annoying, such as Mares, the Plague, whose name is derived from the root mir, to die, the Sanskrit miri, Liga or Disease, and Smertis, Death, who bears a name akin to the Russian smert', the Latin mors, and the Sanskrit mriti. The name of Kolera, a "Woman in White" who traverses the land in a black car, attended by dusky forms, and followed by the wailings of widows and orphans, does not require explanation. It appears that, besides what he has printed in the present work, Dr. Veckenstedt is in possession of a rich store of information due to his persevering study of Lithuanian mythology. It is much to be hoped that he will soon make it public.

MISS SHIRREFF ON THE KINDERGARTEN.*

MISS SHIRREFF has long been known, among all those in any way interested in education in this country, as one of the most careful and skilful of thinkers and workers on this subject. The subject itself has hitherto never been one of those which in England catch the general taste. Success is the rough and popular test of merit; and so many people achieve success without education, that a superstition which it will take some little time to eradicate has arisen that the two are independent of one another. It may be in one sense creditable to our country that such beliefs should exist. They at least show a certain self-confidence and readiness to meet new situations which are among the elements of success. But they happen to be untrue. We have attained success in spite, and not because, of the unorganized state of our education. Of special and technical education it is needless to speak. It is well known that a trained German has, in many walks of commerce, an undoubted superiority in England to a native Englishman; and this is due simply to the fact that the one is educated to his work and the other is not, and has not had even the opportunity of being trained. The word "Pædagogy," which is the only one by which one can shortly describe the science of education, has to English ears such an air of pedantry about it that one never uses it if one can find any other way of expressing the same idea. Yet it stands for a number of simple facts that ought to be familiar to all educated people. The nursery education which, in the case both of boys and girls, should precede any more advanced teaching whatever, and which, if rightly conducted, cannot fail to exercise a life-long influence for good upon the child, has been till lately altogether ignored in England. It is now still in general held in little esteem, and only among those specially interested in education is the subject ever seriously discussed. Miss Shirreff has been again lately, as for many years past, pressing the matter upon public attention; and there is no subject in the world more worthy of careful discussion.

* The Kindergarten at Home. By Emily A. E. Shirreff, President of the Froebel Society. London: Joseph Hughes. 1884.

The common idea, even in countries where education has been far more highly valued than in England, has been that in the earlier years of a child's life he or she may be best left alone. It is true that in these years the child is far better left alone than miseducated. Nature is often kind enough to supply the lack of teaching in cases where she cannot later on make good the results of bad teaching. But that even in the nursery instruction may be systematically given in such a way that it will bear useful fruit in after life, and at the same time put no hurtful strain on the child's mind; that he may be systematically taught without more mental effort on his part than he spends in his play, and with quite as much pleasure to himself; and that the earliest years of his life are now in nearly every case wasted as far as education goes—is what is at present generally unknown in England, and only partly understood in the countries where education is scientifically treated. As there is no chance that any step will be taken at present by the Government or any public body in furtherance of the Kindergarten scheme, Miss Shirreff has written a little book to show parents how the system can be carried out at home. Though Kindergärten exist in England, they are so few in number that at present the great majority of parents cannot possibly make any use of them. And until the public mind is more awakened on the subject there is no likelihood of their becoming more numerous. Still, although the complete training which cannot be got except at a public institution is out of the reach of most English children, much in the same direction can be done at home. It is to urge this fact on parents that Miss Shirreff has written her book. Froebel, as we need not remind our readers, understood education in the complete sense—as the art of training all the human faculties, of which some can be best trained in the earliest years of life, and in the training of all of which some steps may be taken very early. His work consisted in systematizing this training, and making it applicable to the very young, which practically means making it pleasant to them. This is done by various skilfully devised methods, in reading about which many people must reflect how much happier their childhood would have been if they had been so employed, instead of being left to themselves or to their nurses. That the child's earliest education should be its amusement, and that this amusement should lead up to and fall in with the work of later education, is the key-note of Froebel's system. What the child naturally does of its own accord, Froebel would so direct that the child should unconsciously, but with pleasure, so do that it lays the foundation of future and higher education. Not the least of these methods is the cultivation of the power of exact observation. It is now a trite saying that this power is as rare as the power of reasoning. But its rarity arises from the fact that, though infinite trouble is taken (much of it unsuccessfully) to teach people to reason, the faculty of observation is, in our present systems of education, pretty much left to take care of itself. Yet without accurate observation, which can only be taught to the young (though one may have a born aptitude for it, which dispenses with teaching), and which cannot be acquired in later life, half of our reasoning is false, and nearly all the artistic pleasure of life is lost. The whole subject of the Kindergarten, and its influence on future life and of its relations to the forms of education which follow it, is fully discussed by Miss Shirreff. The main lesson that may be learned from this valuable little book is that, if parents are in earnest about the education of their children, they need not wait till a Kindergarten is set up near them. They can make a Kindergarten at home.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THREE volumes (two of them of considerable size) which M. Alcan has published, and which are edited, the first by M. Charles Yriarte (1), the others by M. Espinas (2), contain the brief record and the not inconsiderable achievements of a rather remarkable life. Fernand Durand-Desormeaux, who was born in 1840 and who died three years ago, does not appear to have published anything in his lifetime. He was a very busy man, having been constantly employed in the judicial branch of the French legal profession, besides which he was latterly a member of the Conseil-Général of the Yonne and "directeur du personnel" in the Ministry of Justice. Also, he was a man who went a great deal into society, and (apparently) who gave considerable time to his own family; he married, for a Frenchman, rather young. He seems, however, to have been constantly occupied upon, and to have in considerable degree accomplished, a large, if rather amorphous, philosophical work, which now appears under the care of two of his friends. M. Yriarte's pamphlet (for it is little more) contains, besides a short notice, certain Pensées of a miscellaneous kind. The larger volumes for which M. Espinas is sponsor contain, the one a "Théorie de la connaissance," the other a "Théorie de l'action." Or, to speak with greater precision, they contain a large number of essays or studies on psychological points which are all carefully dated, with the time and place of composition, and which are frequently in direct connexion with each other. The book altogether is a curious one, and it shows how strong is the hold which philosophy of the ethical-literary type, the "philosophy" which had the name almost to itself in the eighteenth century, still has in France, while it has for the time, at any rate, almost disappeared out of England and Germany. In reading these volumes of M. Durand-Desormeaux one might, putting individual characteristics and degrees of merit aside, be reading Vauvenargues or Helvétius. Whether the philosophy of technical terms and pseudo-scientific arrangement has not had a long enough reign is a question not calling for decision or discussion here. But those who think so, and who like philosophical discussion of a not too arid kind, might do worse than turn over these three volumes. We have not observed in them signs of a very extraordinary originality of thought or felicity of expression. The writer seems to have been somewhat superficially acquainted with the literature and history of his subject, to have approximated, as thoughtful Frenchmen do frequently approximate, rather too nearly to the type of the eloquent and somewhat sentimental phrase-maker, and sometimes to have been the dupe of his and other people's phrases. His Pensées lack precision; his philosophical discussions directness and grasp. But he must have been what is vaguely called an interesting person, and his "remains" are in many ways interesting remains.

We do not know whether the advanced Republican party will discover that there is treason to the Republic in the fact of a book by the successor of the Comte de Chambord having attained its seventh edition. They are quite capable of it. Such, however, is the fact in respect to the Comte de Paris's well-known pamphlet on "Trades-Unions in England" (3).

A very elaborate treatise on the Income-tax might, perhaps, hardly be expected from a country where the Income-tax does not exist. M. Joseph Chailley has, however, composed such a treatise (4), which we do not pretend to criticize here in detail, but which appears to be a very careful discussion of the history as well as of the economics of the subject. M. Chailley may be said to be a partisan of the tax, and desirous of its introduction in France; but he does not blink the difficulties. We do not notice, indeed, that he gives full weight to the great argument for an Income-tax in more or less democratically governed countries—to wit, that it places the main burden of taxation on the shoulders of those who have least political power.

The late Jules Noriac did better work than Paris tel qu'il est (5), which, indeed, deserves only to be put to his credit, and not at all to his debit, inasmuch as it is a mere unrevised collection of newspaper tales and miscellanies. But, if it is not as good as Le 101me or La bêtise humaine, it is by no means unamusing to turn over. When the author describes his horror at certain remarks of a pretty lady he met in the train—remarks from which he falsely inferred that her husband was a resurrection-man or, at best, a professional embalmer—and when he remarks upon the extraordinary abundance of diamond rings which the heroes of novels up to quite recent dates appear to have possessed, he is, if not exceptionally brilliant, amusing enough in all conscience.

They do autocratic things even in these democratic days, and if some Minister would lay main basse upon all French books dealing with Germany, from those of the great M. Tissot downwards, he would do an act, arbitrary no doubt, but far from unpatriotic. It is difficult for any one who has a kindness for France and French literature to read this branch of the latter without disgust. Of the two authors before us (6), M. Amic is the Frenchman of many bonnes fortunes, respecting whom Thackeray once gave a salutary caution to foreigners; M. Narjoux (7), the Frenchman who waves the banner of la revanche. The latter's book has some quaint illustrations not without merit. Both Volumes, as coming from a vanquished nation about its victors, are written in the worst possible taste, and with an absence of all sense of dignity.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

WE have only one fault to find with Mrs. Pringle's book, and that is its absurd title. Towards the Mountains of the Moon (Blackwood & Sons) has a catchpenny look, and might well have been discarded for something shorter and simpler. It is a part of our modern rage for claptrap that a traveller nowadays is never content with putting "Travels in Balnibarbi" on his title-page as his grandfather would have done. Having paid her tribute to contemporary stupor, however, Mrs. Pringle is steadily sensible for the rest of her book. She accompanied her husband when he was sent from Scotland to Blantyre, the Free Kirk Mission station near the Shiré in Africa, to inquire into the rather remarkable doings of the gentleman in charge of that institution. These affairs, now forgotten, and we suppose remedied, are conspicuously absent from Mrs. Pringle's pages. She tells all about the journey by sea, river, and over hills up to Blantyre, and has plenty to say about the habits and customs of the natives and of the Portuguese at Mozambique and elsewhere. The missionary tone is pleasantly avoided, and instead of it we get a shrewd lay scepticism as to the efficacy of preaching and the three R's to civilize savages between to-day and to-morrow.

In his book on Red Deer (Longmans & Co.) Mr. Jefferies is more thoroughly master of his subject and of his means than he has been in most of his recent work. He does not try to be profound or mystic, or to interpret the soul of things, but keeps steadily to descriptions of beasts and of nature; in other words, he has come back to the right path, and is duly rewarded by complete success. The red deer of his book are the red deer of Exmoor. Mr. Jefferies talks pleasantly about their history, habits, speed, and beauty. Incidentally we learn a good deal about Exmoor and its human inhabitants; and it would be hard to say which of the three the author loves best or describes with the most obvious pleasure. The kind of sport followed in this part of Somersetshire is, to our mind, far more attractive to hear about than the stalking, and still more the driving, of the Highlands, which has a certain resemblance to assassination. In the West of England the red deer is hunted on horseback. Fair law is given, and the hunter has a respectable chance of breaking his own neck, or even of being gored when the stag is hunted or driven to death.

The Outlines of Historic Ornament (Chapman & Hall), translated from the German by Mr. G. R. Redgrave, is a species of catechism for the use of art students. It covers the whole field, beginning with the pottery and beads of the savage, and ending with the "baroque and rococo styles." One hundred and seventy octavo pages is a very limited space to deal with so large a subject in, and the book consists of what are strictly outlines; but the facts seem generally well stated, and the illustrations are both numerous and clear. Now and then we find what looks like an error of judgment—as when the author says that the Assyrians neglected beauty of form—and occasionally an inaccurate term is used. It is, for instance, rather slovenly to say that the Moors conquered Spain in the eighth century. It should have been the Arabs.

Mrs. Pitman's Life of Elizabeth Fry, contributed to the "Eminent Women Series" (Allen & Co), is a sound book on an interesting subject. It requires an effort of imagination to realize the fact that our prisons were in the infamous state described by Mrs. Fry and her biographer only sixty years ago. We could wish, however, that Mrs. Pitman and other writers on the same subject would recognize the fact that, if our modern prison discipline is more efficacious than the old, that is less because it is more humane than because it is more intelligently severe. Criminals hate the enforced cleanliness and order of a modern gaol far more than they did the slovenly old system.

Hints on Cataloguing Titles and Index Entries (Sampson Low & Co.) is not a very enticing name for a book. Not the less Mr. Blackburn has contrived to turn out a very amusing volume on the subject. It is not exactly a book to read, but it is a book to dip into. The author shows how to catalogue, and also how not to do it, and illustrates both by amusing examples.

What are you to do with a writer who puts "What is Art?" on his title-page, and begins his first chapter as follows:—"What is Art? It is Worship. It is Religion. It is Poetry. It is Truth. It is the apotheosis of the," &c.? Manifestly we can only pray for his soul and deposit his volume on the shelf. This is the sad case of Mr. J. S. Little and his book (Swan Sonnenschein & Co.)

To learn shorthand is, according to Dickens, more difficult than to learn several languages. The student of this portentous mystery may find his way smoothed by Mr. R. E. Miller, who publishes a neat pamphlet called Lessons in Shorthand on Gurney's System (L. Upcott Gill).

A gentleman who proposes to correct Kant, and return to Dualism, can only be treated with time and elbow-room. The first object may be attainable and the second desirable, for aught we know; but we must content ourselves with noting the fact that "Scotus Noventicus" undertakes to show how to do them in his Metaphysica Nova et Vetusta (Williams & Norgate).

The volume of Dialect Proverbs and Folklore in "The Gentleman's Magazine Library" (Elliot Stock) is a book for the lazy person with a taste for confused reading to dip into, and which a dozen specialists combined might possibly criticize adequately.

Mr. H. S. Foxwell, M.A., has edited a collection of reprinted articles by the late Dr. Stanley Jevons. It appears from the preface by Mrs. Jevons that her husband had nearly finished revising these Investigations in Currency and Finance (Macmillan & Co.) before his death. They make a thick volume, full of useful information, political economy, and diagrams.

The Selection from the Poetry of Elizabeth Barrett Browning (Smith, Elder, & Co.), made by Mr. Browning, is republished in two neat volumes. We have also to notice a translation of Dr. Hermann Kolbe's Short Text-Book of Inorganic Chemistry, by Dr. F. S. Humpidge (Longmans & Co.) Mr. Thomas Satchell edits a pretty reprint, nicely bound, of A Booke of Fishing with Hooke and Line, made by L.[eonard] M.[ascall] in 1590 (Satchell & Co.; sold by Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.) Mr. Sydney Lupton, M.A., publishes a text-book on Numerical Tables and Constants in Elementary Science (Macmillan & Co.) The Illustrated Dictionary of Gardening (L. Upcott Gill), now coming out in shilling and sixpenny numbers, is clear in language, and the drawings are capital.

ROYAL GRAMMAR SCHOOL, HENLEY-ON-THAMES.—The Governors are desirous of receiving applications for the appointment of HEAD-MASTER.
The Master must be a Graduate of some University in the United Kingdom, but need not be in Holy Orders. He will be allowed to take Boarders on his own terms.
The School House is large and commodious, and will accommodate forty pupils. There is an excellent schoolroom and a productive garden, also a gravelled playground. All rent, rates, taxes, and substantial repairs free.
The School is conducted under a scheme settled by the Charity Commissioners in 1878.
Candidates are requested to send applications not later than July 7, with testimonials of recent date, to Mr. JOHN COOPER, Solicitor, Henley-upon-Thames, the Clerk to the Governors, of whom all further particulars may be obtained.
Henley-upon-Thames:
June 3, 1884.

TO PARENTS and GUARDIANS.—A VACANCY will shortly occur for an ARTICLED CLERK in the Office of a SOLICITOR with a large and varied practice in the City. Preference given to a gentleman who has been either at one of the Universities or Public Schools.—Apply, CONSERVATIVE, care of Messrs. Howard & Jones, Cullum Street, E.C.

C. BRADLAUGH and "ROWDY RELIGION."—Why does this free-sworn loud Advocate of Liberty keep a dogged silence for more than a month as to my CHALLENGE TO DISCUSS in public "WHO IS GOD AND WHAT IS HIS WORK"? See London and Country Press, May 10.—June 8.—WALTER BEAMONT, 31 Half Moon Street, London, W., who in 1881-2-3 addressed large audiences in Northumberland, Durham, &c.

LEEDS CORPORATION CONSOLIDATED THREE-AND-A-HALF PER CENT. DEBENTURE STOCK.—Further ISSUE of £250,000 THREE-AND-A-HALF PER CENT. STOCK, being part of £4,614,500 to be raised under authority of the "Leeds Improvement Act, 1877," and the "Local Loans Act, 1875."
Messrs. FREDERICK BANBURY & SONS are authorized by the Corporation of Leeds, as their Brokers, to receive TENDERS for £250,000 of the Stock, and to state that subscribers can take either registered stock in amounts of not less than £50, divisible by £10, or certificates to bearer, in sums of £100, £500, and £1,000 each, and that the minimum price of tender has been fixed at £100.
The half-yearly Dividends will be payable at Messrs. Glyn, Mills, & Co., London, or Messrs. Beckett & Co., Leeds, on January 1 and July 1, on the registered stock by warrants sent by post, and on the certificates to bearer by coupons attached; and interest at the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum will accrue from July 1 next.
The certificates to bearer may be converted into registered stock at any time, free from expense, on surrender of the certificates with all unpaid coupons, and registered stock may be converted into certificates to bearer on delivery of the certificates and payment of the necessary stamp duty.
Transfers of registered stock will be chargeable with the ordinary stamp duty of ½ per cent., and will be registered free of charge.
By Clause 27 of the Local Loans Act, 1875, trustees authorized to invest money in the debenture stock of any railway or other Company are empowered to invest in the registered debenture stock of this Corporation.
The securities for due payment of the dividends and principal at maturity are:—
1. The Borough Fund.
2. The Borough Rate.
3. The Waterworks Undertaking.
4. The Gasworks Undertaking.
5. The Markets Undertaking.
6. The revenue respectively derived from all those sources, and from all landed and other property, vested in or belonging to the Corporation, or which may hereafter be acquired.
The Borough Fund consists of all the property of the Corporation, such as parks, lands, buildings, &c.
The Borough Rate is not limited in amount, and the rateable annual value of the property within the Borough of Leeds amounts to more than one million sterling, and is daily increasing.
The debt of the borough at the end of the last financial year was £4,043,750, of which £3,784,270 has been expended on the gas, water, and market undertakings, the incomes from which are more than sufficient to meet all expenses connected therewith; and the charges for rates, and tolls are far below the maximum allowed to be charged.
The money now sought to be raised is required for the purposes of paying off portions of existing mortgages on the undertakings referred to in the Leeds Improvement Act, 1877 (sec. 65), to which the Consolidated Stock is subject, under that Act.
By the Act a sinking fund is established, and £503,000 has already been invested under Government supervision, for the redemption of the stock on July 1, 1927, and no earlier repayment can be made without the consent of the holder.
Tenders may be for the whole or any part of the stock, and must state what amount of money will be given for every £100 of the stock. Tenders for other than even hundreds of stock, or at a price including fractions of a shilling other than sixpence, will not be preferentially accepted. Tenders are to be delivered at the offices of Messrs. Frederick Banbury & Sons, 59 Old Broad Street, London, E.C., before two o'clock on Monday, June 9, 1884. Tenders at different prices must be on separate forms.
A deposit of five per cent. on the amount of stock tendered for must be paid at the same office at the time of the delivery of the tender. Where no allotment is made the deposit will be returned, and in case of partial allotment the balance of the deposit will be applied towards the first instalment.
In the event of the receipt of tenders for a larger amount of stock than that proposed to be issued, at or above the minimum price, the tenders at the lowest price accepted will be subject to a pro rata diminution.
The dates at which the further payments on account of the said loan will be required are as follows:—

On Allotment	(so much of the amount tendered and accepted as, when added to the deposit, will leave £90 to be paid for each £100 of stock;
	On Tuesday, July 15, 1884,	£25 per cent.
	On Friday, August 15, 1884,	£25 per cent.
	On Monday, September 15, 1884,	£40 per cent.

These payments must be made at the banking-house of Messrs. Glyn, Mills, & Co., 67 Lombard Street.
Scrip certificates to bearer will be issued in exchange for the allotment letters, and bankers' receipts, duly endorsed, at the offices of Messrs. Frederick Banbury & Sons, 59 Old Broad Street, on and after June 17, 1884.
The instalments may be paid in full on or after July 15, 1884, under discount at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum. In case of default in the payment of any instalment at its proper date, the deposit and instalments previously paid will be liable to forfeiture.
The stock will be inscribed in the books of the Corporation, and bonds to bearer will be delivered in exchange for the scrip certificates at the Offices of Messrs. Frederick Banbury & Sons, on and after October 1, 1884, but scrip paid up in full in anticipation may be inscribed forthwith.
Copies of the Acts of Parliament can be seen, and forms of tender obtained, on application to Messrs. Frederick Banbury & Sons, 59 Old Broad Street, London; or George V. Morrison Esq., Town Hall, Leeds, solicitor to the Corporation.

LONDON GOVERNMENT BILL.—At a MEETING of the CASTREYMEN of the Parish of ST. MARY ABBOTT'S, KENSINGTON, in the County of Middlesex, held at the Town Hall, Kensington, on Wednesday, May 14, 1884, the Rev. C. DARBY BRADE, M.A., in the Chair, it was Resolved:—
"1. That this Vestry dissents from the London Government Bill on the ground that the position assigned the city to the proposed District Councils is so inferior that, although the work of the several districts must devolve upon them, it will not be possible to secure upon such District Councils the services of persons of ability and good social standing, and that consequently the staff of paid officers must be largely increased.
"2. That this Vestry is further of opinion that if a Central Council should be formed for the whole of London the number of Vestrymen might be greatly reduced, and all such Vestrymen made members of the Central Council.
"3. That the Central Council should determine the general principles upon which the government of London should proceed, and that the administration of each district should remain with the several Vestries as before.
"4. That a petition be presented to Parliament against the Bill."
GEO. C. HARDING, Clerk to the Vestry.
Town Hall, Kensington:
May 30, 1884.

LONDON GOVERNMENT BILL.—At a MEETING of RATEPAYERS of HIGHBURY, held at the Highbury Athenæum, on Monday, May 26, 1884, Resolutions condemnatory of the London Government Bill were proposed by Mr. J. F. OSWALD, seconded by Mr. STROUD, and carried unanimously. The Chairman was empowered to sign a petition to Parliament against the Bill, and forward the same to Alderman Sir Andrew Lusk, M.P., for presentation.
THOS. W. VINE, Chairman.

LONDON GOVERNMENT BILL.—At a PUBLIC MEETING of RATEPAYERS, held at the Chapel of Ease Schoolrooms, Lower Holloway, on Tuesday, May 27, 1884, Mr. W. LAMBERT in the chair, it was Resolved:—
"That, in the opinion of this Meeting, the London Government Bill will destroy all real local self-government and tend to extravagance in the expenditure of the rates, and that the Chairman be requested to sign (on behalf of the Meeting) a petition to the House of Commons against the Bill."

LONDON GOVERNMENT BILL.—CHELSEA WORKMEN and the LONDON GOVERNMENT BILL.—At a numerously attended MEETING of DELEGATES connected with the INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATION of the WEST LONDON DISTRICT, held at the Assembly Rooms, Montpelier Row, Brompton, on Friday, May 30, 1884, it was Resolved:—
"That, in the opinion of this Conference of Representative Workmen of the West London District, the new London Government Bill introduced into Parliament by Sir William Harcourt is a highly dangerous measure, owing to its centralizing character, and is destructive to every principle of local self-government. Furthermore, this Conference believes that the passing of the aforesaid measure into law will greatly increase the already over-burdened taxation of the people of the Metropolis, and will enhance the difficulties and troubles of the work-earning classes of London; therefore, this Conference resolves to oppose the Bill by every means in its power."
It was also Resolved:—
"That Copies of this Resolution be sent to the Prime Minister, the Lord Mayor, the Home Secretary, the Town Clerk, and to the Members of Parliament for West London boroughs."

LONDON GOVERNMENT BILL.—At a PUBLIC MEETING of RATEPAYERS, held at St. Andrew's Schools, Bethnal Green, on Friday, May 30, 1884, it was moved by E. B. CURRIE, Esq. (member of the Hackney Board of Works), seconded by W. H. REDMAN, Esq., and Resolved (with one dissentient):—
"That this Meeting, having considered the provisions of the London Government Bill now before Parliament, enters its protest against its principle of centralization and consequent loss of local self-government, and views with alarm the increase of taxation to the already over-burdened Ratepayers which must follow the passing of such a measure."
The Chairman was empowered to sign a petition against the Bill.
A. MCALISTER, Chairman.

LONDON GOVERNMENT BILL.—CHARLTON.—At a MEETING of RATEPAYERS, held at Old Charlton, on Monday, May 26, 1884, it was proposed by W. DICKSON, Esq., seconded by E. TAYLOR, Esq., and Resolved:—
"That this Meeting of inhabitant Ratepayers of Woolwich, Charlton, and Plumstead pledges itself to do all in its power to obtain a Charter of Incorporation for itself, as it reserves to the Ratepayers the power of local self-government and independence, and will, in the opinion of this meeting, be far better than one gigantic system of centralization."
The Chairman was requested to forward copies of this Resolution to the Prime Minister, the Home Secretary, the Borough and County Members, the Town Clerk of the Corporation of the City of London, and to Her Majesty's Privy Council.
R. C. RATCLIFFE, Chairman.

LIFE AND LABOUR IN THE FAR FAR WEST.

By W. HENRY BARNEBY,
Of Bredenbury Court, Bromyard, Herefordshire.

This very entertaining volume contains a description of a Tour in the Far West, undertaken during the Spring and Summer of 1883. The Author, in the course of his tour, passed through some of the finest scenery in North America, and had many special opportunities of observing the condition of Agriculture, more especially in the Dominion of Canada and British Columbia, and of considering the suitability of the country as a field for Emigration and for the investment of Capital.

THE CONFERENCE.

THE reported massacre at Berber, and the singular directions of Lord GRANVILLE for the extrication of General GORDON, would invite comment if the first-mentioned disaster were more certain. As it is, the negotiations with France are still the chief point of interest in the Egyptian question. The advance of the pledges of Mr. GLADSTONE and Lord GRANVILLE in reference to the Conference is no doubt a matter of satisfaction. Their former engagements would have been compatible with the doing of almost irreparable mischief; their latter, unless Mr. GLADSTONE excels even himself in construing the pledge he has given, is not so compatible. It is true that, if the country finds itself face to face with an unacceptable agreement, it will still be in a very awkward position as regards Europe, and if, as it must, it rejects the agreement, a precedent likely to cause the greatest inconvenience in future diplomatic arrangements will have been set. But the change of the relations of Government to Parliament probably necessitates this, and in the present instance, at any rate, it is by far the least of two evils. Yet it must remain a curious comment on the supposed confidence of Parliament and the country in Ministers of the day that Parliament and the country have only been kept quiet by the Ministry formally undertaking not to avail themselves of their undoubted power—not, indeed, to make monetary arrangements, but to dispose of the forces of the Crown and avail themselves of its other prerogatives. "We have the fullest confidence in you, but "mind you do absolutely nothing without obtaining our "sanction," is the eccentric fashion in which Great Britain, by Parliament and by the public voice, expresses her reliance on Mr. GLADSTONE'S discretion. There have been Ministers who would have found the compliment not exactly to their taste.

On this point, however, it is unnecessary to say more; nor need the difference between the CHILDERS-LESSEPS agreement, in which the Government dealt with a private firm, and the present Anglo-French negotiations, in which at least two great nations are concerned as such, be insisted on. The whole affair, whatever may be its result, is a distinct, and by no means encouraging, confirmation of the strictures of those who say that, whether Mr. GLADSTONE'S Government is a good Government or a bad Government, it is a Government which has the very rudiments of foreign policy to learn. But it is more important for the present to consider what the stipulations of this long-debated "communication" between England and France really are. On this point all the PRIME MINISTER'S statements, all Lord GRANVILLE'S honest indignation at being called imbecile, all Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE'S promises to answer questions when he has got leave to answer them, convey not one tittle of positive information. The PRIME MINISTER'S rebuke in the character of a pir gravis to the putters forth of rash and unauthorized statements on the subject was very impressive in form, but in matter it unfortunately applies to anybody, everybody, or nobody. For aught that appears, it may wring the withers of those who stardily deny that certain things are in the agreement as much as it galls those who have asserted that they are. For, if some at least of these details fail to make their appearance in the announcement for which England is so anxiously waiting, will any reasonable person doubt that their absence is due to the protests which have been made—growing every day in strength and distinctness—against surrender. It may be added that some of the most valiant defenders of the Government have practically admitted the truth of some, at least, of the rumours in question in the very act of denying them. There is not, it is said, a hard-and-fast engagement to go out of Egypt; but there is a conditional engagement to leave it in three years. There is no positive promise of an English loan or guarantee; but there is an understanding concerning something of the kind. There is to be no multiple Control; but there is to be a multiple Audit Board, which may have an English president. And, lastly, the extraordinary negotiations with the Turkish Government, if they have not had for object a distinct Turkish crusade against the Soudan, have been such that Mr. GLADSTONE had to resort to one of his most labyrinthine formulas of admissive denial in order to dispose of Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL'S question. By Mr. GLADSTONE'S admission there has been something going on with Turkey; by the admission of his supporters there has been something going on in the direction of tying English hands in Egypt, reintroducing a foreign Control, and increasing the pecuniary liabilities of the country while limiting her occupation. And it is further to be observed that in London, in Paris, and in Constantinople the best-informed persons agree, with exactly that margin of difference which is to be expected in genuine information about points not publicly known nor finally settled, as to the three chief clauses of the new Concordat—a more appropriate term equally taken from the diplomatic glossary would perhaps be the new Capitulation.

It is nearly certain that, unless this intelligence is very grossly mistaken (and it has in its favour, as has been repeatedly pointed out, the impossibility of discovering cause for such protracted and secret negotiations if anything more innocent has been under discussion), the conduct of the Government will not be approved by the country, and it is quite certain that it ought not to be approved. For the two portions of the project are hopelessly out of keeping with each other. It may not be in itself objectionable that England should in one form or other lend her credit to free Egypt from difficulties which, to speak with frankness, are, to no small extent, of England's causing. But, if that credit be so lent, no matter in what form, it becomes from the mere fact of the lending inadmissible that English dealings with Egypt should be hampered either by stipulations as to the period of occupation or by intrusion of foreign meddlers in the management. If we are to take the responsibilities of the concern, we must have the control of it—a proposition which is, one might have thought, self-evident, even putting aside the events of the last two years, which constitute an additional reason for not relinquishing the guardianship of Egypt to any other hands. On this point there is, it is believed, absolutely no difference of opinion among nineteen-twentieths of those Englishmen who either understand the subject or are capable of understanding it. On the face of the matter, therefore, there appears to be a choice only of two suppositions. Either the Government have been occupied for months on negotiations about something utterly trivial, and have exercised in reference to that something useless irritation and dangerous reticence, or they will come forward with propositions which are disapproved by Liberals as well as by Conservatives, which are even distasteful to a considerable portion of the extreme Radical party itself. And there are indications that the Government are prepared to make the question one of confidence in a somewhat novel sense. Sir [illegible] Dilke's speech at Marylebone on Wednesday [illegible] little more than an adoption of the [illegible] Lord Salisbury! If you will "not have [illegible] offer you, you must have Lord "Salisbury [illegible] vague threats of terrible things from France. There [illegible] be no reason why a man like Sir Charles Dilke should speak in this fashion if no trial awaited the constancy of his party. Some members of that party, it is known, have already declared themselves. They say with much frankness that they know the Government is bent on schemes injurious to the welfare of the country, and that for all that they cannot and will not desert the Government. The disposition may be contemptible, it may be even criminal; but it is at least intelligible. The rest of the Liberal party, and especially of the representatives of the Liberal party in Parliament, have now to make up their minds whether they will adopt this disposition as it is, or whether, as Sir Charles Dilke seems to think more probable, they will adopt it under further stress of the bogey of France. If they are influenced by this latter, it is only fair to warn them that they are allowing themselves to be frightened by the emptiest of bugbears. Until France and Germany come to an understanding, which, in the present temper of the French people, could only be effected by even worse blunders on the part of English statesmen than any which Mr. Gladstone has yet committed, France is absolutely powerless in Europe, however much she may swagger and bustle in remote parts of the earth. Only Mr. Gladstone's unintelligible Germanophobia has made it possible for France even to annoy England; many things must happen before anything worse than annoyance is possible from her. Nor, on the other hand, is there anything whatever to be gained by truckling to France. Liberals as well as Conservatives may dismiss from their minds, in preparing those minds for the approaching decision, all questions save this one and simple question—whether the influence, the sacrifices, the interests, and the claims of England in and on Egypt are to be made of no effect at the bidding of, or in consideration of the probable consequences to, a particular set of English politicians? If a great majority of Englishmen do not answer "No" to this simple question, and if they would not answer "No" whatever individual party or partisans happened to be in power, then the political health of the country is in such a state that the loss of Egypt will pretty certainly be followed by misfortunes much more serious.

FOLLIES IN FASHION.

THE Old Cockpit, in Stoneygate, Preston, has fallen down with a tremendous crash. We cannot help regretting the Old Cockpit, and yet no one can wonder that it has selected this moment to fall. Perhaps the Old Cockpit, which is said to have been built at the expense of an old Earl of Derby, is felix opportunitate mortis. Without defending cocking, which is obsolete and perhaps cruel, we may remember that it was at least considered a manly sport. Socrates was fond of cocking; so was Mr. Windham; and Admiral Rous once used all his recognized powers of eloquence and logic in defence of a pastime which he thought the nurse of valour. The same generation which considers it a fine manly thing to desert General Gordon also considers cocking by no means ennobling. Perhaps Mr. Windham's opinion about these matters was worth as much as that of the extremely sensitive modern Radical.

However this may be, we can scarcely congratulate a race in which back-swording, wrestling, and other pastimes, blameless and robust, have been superseded by pin-hunting. Folly for folly, we are not quite certain that even the prize-ring had not advantages over the pin-hunt as conducted by muscle-readers and Psychical Researchers. The newspapers at this most busy season of the year continue to print long accounts of la chasse aux épingles, and long letters from all manner of men on this absorbing pursuit. The silly season is always with us. A gentleman who glories in being a Secretary of the Society for Psychical Research stands forth as an anxious but not yet convinced inquirer. He asks for "more experiments" by amateur pin-hunters, for he seems to distrust professional sportsmen. The question of pin-hunting has succeeded the question of the housing of the poor in the minds of the fashionable. Instead of going to see courts, and lanes, and slums, our giddy race is now running about the street after blindfolded men with their heads in bags. One may doubt whether, in this case, the blind are always leading the blind. If a person is blindfolded, the addition of a bag over his face does not make it still more impossible for him to see, but greatly increases the possibility of his removing, unnoticed, the bandage over his eyes. This is an example of the precautions which defeat themselves.

No humane man will seriously regret cock-fighting; but the increasing frivolity of our lives may remind us that, at least, the follies of our fathers had some actual interest, some basis in human nature. Where is one to find, except in almost inconceivable ignorance and stupidity, any human basis for an interest in Esoteric Buddhism, Theosophy, the conjuring feats of old women from Thibet, and the thought-reading exploits of much-advertised quacks? A welcome letter on this last stage of imbecile credulity is published in the Standard by a correspondent who signs himself "Anti-Humbug." He utters, not too soon, the voice of complete scepticism. His argument is merely the old inevitable one—does an experience of the world make it more probable that the pin-hunters do what they seem to do, or that they rely on the usual tricks of collusion? "The "pin-finding trick in a room is done by the interpretation "of unconscious muscular actions on the part of nervous "people. . . . Pin-finding out of doors is done by con-"federacy, like many other tricks." In fact, "such arts the "Gods who dwell on high have given to the Greek," and they were as well known to Mr. Barry Lyndon as to any modern pin-hunter. Mr. Lyndon employed his service in the comparatively worthy pursuit of gambling. Anything in the world is more credible than that the "thoughts," as they are called by courtesy, of a Canon pass through a copper wire to a pin-hunter with his head in a bag. That is the short and the long of the matter. All this drivel about thought-reading is forced on the silly part of the public as a conjurer forces a card, by a mutual advertisement system, in which persons attached to the Press, the Church, and the pin-hunting profession combine to make each other notorious. A varnish of sham popular science is the natural modern polish of the machine.

THE CHICAGO CONVENTION.

THERE is a paradoxical element in the surprise with which the Republican nomination at Chicago has been received both at home and in England. Mr. Blaine was the most conspicuous, if not the most popular, of the candidates; and it was known before the meeting of the Convention that he had a majority of supporters as compared with any single competitor. It was nevertheless supposed, except perhaps by some of the most skilful election managers, that, as in former cases, relative strength might be an indication of absolute weakness. With the exception of General Grant, all the Presidents since the war have been persons of secondary importance. No one hoped or feared beforehand the selection of Mr. Hayes or of General Garfield. Delegates to Presidential Conventions are generally pledged to a special choice only in the early ballots, so that they are at liberty during the subsequent proceedings to confine their attention to the defeat of obnoxious candidates. At Chicago Mr. Arthur's supporters, by a series of judicious coalitions, defeated the Blaine party in the preliminary skirmishes. The oddest episode of the Convention was a contest between two Republicans of colour for the temporary chairmanship; and on this occasion Mr. Arthur's negro was preferred to Mr. Blaine's. The large and respectable body of politicians which disapproved of both the principal candidates seems not to have been adequately represented at Chicago. Both Mr. Blaine and Mr. Arthur had attained political eminence as wire-pullers; and it was doubtful whether either of them, if he were nominated, could carry the State of New York. It is said, probably with truth, that the coming election will be decided by the neutral votes of citizens who are not professed or zealous members of either party. It is, therefore, unusually important that the nominees should command personal respect and confidence. Nothing has been said against Mr. Arthur except that he is a professional politician. Charges of misconduct, which have been brought against Mr. Blaine, are probably unfounded; but during his short career of Secretary of State he showed himself a turbulent and blustering diplomatist.

No Republican nomination since the accession of the party to power has provoked so much disapprobation as the choice of Mr. Blaine. It is true that, in accordance with a custom which has become so uniform as to have almost lost its meaning, the nomination of Mr. BLAINE was formally made unanimous; but the delegates were probably almost all active partisans, to whom success in the Presidential election appears of paramount importance. If the Democratic Convention, which is also to be held at Chicago, makes a popular choice, the nomination of Mr. BLAINE will probably be disastrous to the Republicans. It appears that having now laid aside an affectation of indifference, Mr. BLAINE intends to conduct in person the canvass, or, as it is called, the campaign. He already professes to rely greatly on the Irish vote, which must be purchased, if at all, by professions of ill-will to England. It is highly improbable that Mr. BLAINE's rumoured policy should be justified by success. The Irish voters have for many years served in the Democratic ranks; and there is no reason to suppose that they will detach themselves from their old connexion at the moment when, after four-and-twenty years, their party is likely to triumph. The great body of unpledged politicians would be more than ever alienated from the cause of a candidate who should propose to disturb international relations for his own personal aggrandizement. Notwithstanding the professions of political aspirants, the cause of Civil Service reform is not so far advanced that voters and agents will fail to anticipate lucrative results from the success of their party. Democrats will be generally disinclined to become deserters, when they may hope to elect a President who will have many thousands of salaried officers at his disposal. In calculating the chances of the contest, it must be remembered that the President is elected, not by a majority of the whole constituency, but by the several States. When the Republican journals of New York assert that Mr. BLAINE will not receive the thirty-five votes of the State, they have probably strong reasons for their opinion. It is also believed that several of the New England States will withhold their support; but it is conceded that Ohio and some of the other central States will vote for the Chicago nominee.

The Southern States, with one or two possible exceptions, will give their votes to the Democratic candidate. Those party Conventions which have up to the present time expressed a preference have almost unanimously recommended the nomination of Mr. TILDEN and Mr. HENDRICKS, who were fraudulently deprived of their right to the Presidency and the Vice-Presidency after the election of 1876. The rectification of a gross injustice is an intelligible object, which may perhaps prevent or simplify a contest for the nomination. The only obvious objection to Mr. TILDEN is that he is advanced in life; but there seemed to be no question of his competence to discharge the duties of his office if he is elected; but Mr. TILDEN has lately announced his physical incapacity to discharge the duties of the Presidential office to his own satisfaction. It is of course possible that his reluctance may be overcome; and, if he is nominated, he will be supported by all sections of his party. He will be especially strong in the State of New York, which, in the judgment of both parties, will exercise an almost decisive voice in the election. On the whole, Mr. TILDEN's prospects, both of nomination and election, would be brighter than those of any rival in either party. Foreigners ought to judge with hesitation and diffidence on subjects which can only be understood by the aid of detailed and local knowledge. Mr. BLAINE may probably derive advantage from Mr. TILDEN's refusal, especially if the Democratic Convention selects an unsatisfactory candidate. American institutions for the most part work so well that superficial criticisms on their supposed defects ought not to be readily hazarded. It is possible that no practical disadvantage may result from habitual toleration of mediocrity in the highest office which is in any part of the world bestowed by popular election. An English Prime Minister is always one of the first statesmen of the day, because he attains his rank by the tacit approval of his equals. It is apparently not necessary that a President should have similar claims to his position.

The only important issue which will be involved in the Presidential contest has been raised in the most definite form by the Republican Convention. The greater part of the Resolutions which constitute the Republican platform is devoted to an unqualified avowal of the crudest theory of Protection. As is usual with American advocates of monopoly, the Convention professes extreme solicitude for the interests of the working class. It is apparently rather for the purpose of maintaining a high rate of wages than for the increase of their own profits that Pennsylvanian manufacturers and their friends in Republican Conventions are anxious to exclude the products of European industry, which is sometimes rhetorically stigmatized as slave labour. Political managers are embarrassed by the difficulty of offering a sufficient temptation to the powerful body of farmers who have the strongest interest both in buying cheap goods and in promoting commercial intercourse with the markets of their grain and cattle. Luckily for the Republicans, it happens that wool-growers desire a share of the tribute which is levied on consumers by ironmasters and cotton-spinners. Probably for the sake of their shepherds rather than of themselves they object to the importation of foreign wool; and their welcome remonstrances supply a separate plank, as it is called, in the general platform. Everything American is to be protected; and especially wool. It remains to be seen whether the Democratic leaders will have the courage to rely on sound economic principles, and on the obvious interest of the great bulk of the community. It may be doubtful whether a bold profession of Free-trade doctrines would penetrate the dense ignorance of the mass of the people; but, unless they accept the challenge of their antagonists, the Democrats deserve to be defeated. At the last election the Democratic Resolutions were reasonably liberal and sound; but General HANCOCK, the nominee of the party, probably neither knowing nor caring anything about the merits of the question, took fright at the last moment, and repudiated in a published letter the principles to which his party was pledged. It is, perhaps, on this ground that, notwithstanding his respectable character and his military reputation, he has not on the present occasion been mentioned as a possible nominee. Mr. TILDEN, as a man of business, probably understands the subject better; but it is not known whether the Democratic Convention or the representative whom it may nominate will have the courage to denounce the system of privileged monopoly. If English interests were taken into consideration, it is extremely doubtful whether it would be desirable to make any change in the American tariff. The richest and most industrious of civilized communities might become a still more formidable competitor than at present but for the artificial restrictions which have confined the energies of producers and of traders. The election of a new President may have no direct influence on commercial legislation; but, if the contest turns on Protection and Free-trade, the result will be deeply significant. There is no other perceptible difference between Republicans and Democrats. This may perhaps be the last occasion on which the old party nicknames will be retained, especially if the Republican malcontents persist in their refusal to support the nominee of the Convention.

THE GREEN ABOVE THE ORANGE.

THE disastrous reversal on Sunday of the policy of equal justice to all parties in Ireland which Lord SPENCER after some hesitation had the sense and courage to carry out last year may be due to various causes. The narrow escape on the last Vote of Censure may have shaken Mr. GLADSTONE'S nerves, and it may have been thought necessary to propitiate the so-called National party by an open act of favouritism, in view of the difficulties of the Government with regard not merely to the Franchise Bill, but to Egypt. Such an act, moreover, is always popular with the extreme English Radicals, who hate equally Orange landlords and Orange Toryism, and the extreme English Radicals are not in much better temper with the Government just now than the extreme English Whigs, if any such party still exists. The most immediate cause for regret in the proceeding is the surrender of Lord SPENCER, who for many months has governed Ireland like a statesman—in other words, not like a member of the present Ministry. The step taken on Sunday, if persevered in, may perhaps bring about a United Ireland in a manner somewhat unexpected and by most Englishmen undesired—that is to say, an Ireland united in hatred of English rule. But it is impossible to see what result of any other kind it can possibly bring about. The means, however, of bringing about this particular result are almost more disastrous than the result itself. For it is impossible, if all tales—including the Government tale—be true, to avoid seeing that the Constabulary behaved with extreme harshness and imprudence to the party upon which their superiors in Dublin for the moment frowned; and this, considering the different position of the police in Ireland, is simply deplorable. Even the cooked and laboured report which Mr. TREVELYAN read in Parliament revealed clearly the fact that the attack was first made on, not from, the Orange hall, and that the initiative of violence in every case came from the Nationalist side. If this is the result of obedience to the law and to the good counsels of moderation which the Orange leaders gave in this case, it is quite easy to foresee what counsels will be adopted in another, and in what odour the law will shortly be. All men, and Irishmen most of all men, if they must be taken up at all, would rather be taken up for assaulting some one else than for being assaulted by some one else.

The confused details of the actual riot, however, are of far less importance than the conduct of the Irish Government which preceded, and (to speak plain English) which caused, that riot. In the duel of letters between the LORD LIEUTENANT and Lord ARTHUR HILL, the latter plainly has the best of it, even if the "disloyalty" of the Nationalists be put out of sight altogether. The contention of the Government is that that disloyalty must be put out of sight. It is a preposterous contention enough; but it is possible to grant it for the sake of argument. It will then inevitably follow that, if the purpose and spirit of the Nationalist meeting was a matter with which Government had nothing to do, the purpose and spirit of the Orange meeting was a matter with which the Government had nothing to do likewise. According to Lord SPENCER, Mr. O'BRIEN and his friends were guileless lambs, who merely wanted to sport in the meadows of Newry in pursuance of the sacred right of public meeting. Granting this, there could be no reason for preventing other guileless lambs from sporting in the same meadows and in pursuance of the same sacred right. If the sacred right of public meeting is decisive for Green it is decisive for Orange; if there are reasons for specially entrusting Lord SPENCER with the power of suspending it, there can be no conceivable reason why it should be suspended in the Orange case and not in the Green. When the defenders of the Government, finding themselves in a difficulty here, begin to say that there were special reasons, and that the second meeting evidently threatened a breach of the peace, they simply give their cause away. For so did the first meeting threaten such a breach, and the admission of any—no matter what—special reasons and considerations does away with the sacred-right-of-public-meeting argument altogether. The fact is that the Ministerial policy is absolutely indefensible except against partisans, if there be any such, who say that Orange meetings ought to be permitted and Nationalist meetings forbidden. We at least say nothing of the sort. In the present state of Ireland, and with the laws at present in force, the clear duty of Government is to prohibit every public meeting, no matter by whom held, which is likely to provoke or to end in a breach of the peace. Any deviation from this rule can only lead to heartburning and to headbreaking, and this particular deviation has led to plenty of both. But for the rare good sense of the Orange leaders—a good sense for the exercise of which they have been sneered at by English Radical newspapers—it is nearly certain that there would have been bloodshed at Newry on Sunday to an extent greater than has been known in Ireland for years. And the conduct of the subordinate agents of the Executive, who, unfortunately, may be trusted in every case to exaggerate the supposed tendencies of their superiors, is likely, as has been said, to make it very hard for the Orange leaders to exercise similar authority again.

The impossibility of accounting for this new fashion of partial impartiality on any rational principles may not unnaturally give rise to uncomplimentary suspicions of the motives of the Government such as those alluded to above. The plea of equal justice has been shown to be absurd, and no plea of expediency can be advanced with any show of reason. With the memory of the events of the past four years fresh, with the history of Ireland open, and with such investigations as that into the Barbavilla murder still going on, no one can sincerely argue that proceedings of this sort conciliate the National party. They feel no gratitude, and, to do them justice, they show none. Neither do they make the slightest secret of those objects which Lord SPENCER thinks either so praiseworthy as to deserve protection, or so obscure as at least not to call for interference. Every meeting held by the Nationalist party is held directly against the laws and Constitution of the country, and directly or indirectly in favour of treasonable designs. Nobody knows this better than Mr. TREVELYAN, who has said in his place in Parliament that nothing but the Government stands between Ireland and civil war, unless it be Lord SPENCER, who has actually had experience at one period of open, at another of veiled, insurrection. A considerable minority of the people of Ireland, a considerable majority of the people of Ulster, at present object to these demonstrations. They are not only not sustained in their objection (which sustainment, on a very pedantic theory of free government, though not, by the way, on any theory that squares with Coercion Acts, might perhaps be itself objected to), but they are positively put at a disadvantage in the expression of opinion. They are not allowed to reply; their opponents are allowed to assert. Their opponents have permission to meet, and a small army to protect them in meeting; they themselves are forbidden to meet, and a small army is employed to prevent them meeting and to coerce them—not when they transgress the prohibition, but when they, in self-defence, return the violence of the invaders. This, it must be admitted, is an admirable fashion of discouraging friends, a most broad and plain hint to all Irishmen that the way to secure Government protection is to be disloyal to the Government. It is contended by the Government henchmen that there is, in effect, a strong Romanist and Nationalist (the terms, by the way, are by no means interchangeable) party in Ulster. It must be granted that, if Mr. GLADSTONE'S Government continues its lately-devised policy, there bids fair to be little else, at least as far as politics go. Their somewhat aggressive Protestantism the farmers and townsmen of the North are not likely to give up; but it is probably forgotten by the politicians of the moment, who are in general utterly ignorant of Irish history, that one of the most troublesome and dangerous manifestations of Irish treason with which England ever had to contend came from Ulstermen and from Protestants. It hardly requires very extensive observation of life, or a very energetic exercise of the reasoning faculties, to recognize the fact that there is no more dangerous enemy than a discontented friend. The Orange party in Ireland has had a by no means faultless past, and is doubtless not impeccable in the present. But, at any rate, it has recognized as no other party in Ireland has recognized the pernicious folly of the Irish National theory, and so far may be said to be sound on the central and all-important principle of Irish politics. It is this faith which Mr. GLADSTONE and his colleagues seem to have set themselves to destroy, and they are certainly going no ill way to do so.

COSAS DE CORSICA.

FRENCH politics are full of queer little surprises; but they have probably never had anything more remarkable to show than the "affaire SAINT-ELME," over which the Chamber of Deputies has spent a whole week, while the Army and the Revision Bills were kept waiting for attention. It all arose out of the desire of the Opposition to find a martyr. Since Prince KRAPOTKINE refused to change his prison, and figure as the victim of extreme oppression for the convenience of the Bonapartists and Extreme Republicans, these politicians have been in pressing need of an outward and visible sign of Opportunist villany. At last they found a sufferer who had the great advantage over Prince KRAPOTKINE that he was dead, and therefore completely at their disposal. This interesting martyr was a Corsican journalist, by name SAINT-ELME, who edited an extreme Radical paper called the Sampiero. With honourable consistency, SAINT-ELME held advanced opinions on the liberty of the press. He did not understand how it could be said to exist if he could not accuse the Prefect of keeping a disorderly house, and write articles to prove that his political opponents were guilty of many and complicated acts of vice. A journalist who acts on these principles is likely to get into trouble, and SAINT-ELME had his share. At last steps of a very Corsican character were taken. The editor of the Sampiero was "waited for" and cudgelled. Some time afterwards he died, whether of disease, or of the cudgelling, or of both, is doubtful. In any case, it was plain that he had quarrelled with an opportunist Prefect, had been beaten, and had died. To the Bonapartist Radical Opposition the connexion of cause and effect was obvious, and they resolved to see justice done.

Accordingly MM. LAGUERRE and PELLETAN made a motion in the Chamber of Deputies and called for inquiry into the conduct of the Prefect. It was soon found that the cause of SAINT-ELME would not do. It could not be shown that the Prefect had ordered the assault. The most law-abiding deputy was quickly persuaded that, though SAINT-ELME had been cudgelled, it only served him right. If Prefects had never done anything worse than be a little severe in using the law against his like, their record would be cleaner than it is. But there was more behind. On the motion of M. ANDRIEUX, the Chamber proceeded to make a general inquiry into the administration of Corsica, and at once made a discovery naturally painful to the more ingenuously-minded Republican deputies. They found out that the business of Government remains pretty much what it used to be in the corrupt days of the Empire. The only change is that, whereas one clique ruled then, another rules now. The "ins" of to-day use the power of Government to crush their private enemies, just as the other side did before them. It is the vendetta working with stamped paper and grants-in-aid. The Prefect looks after his elect, and his obedient Mayors help him. When the elections were held, one public spirited officer carried the urn containing the voting papers home with him, and announced the results next morning. It is needless to say which party appeared in the majority. Another and a bolder Mayor refused to hold any election at all, because he had been feasting the night before. When the "épuration" of the magistracy was in progress, it was found that the promotions and removals corresponded curiously to the political opinions and relationships of the judges. In a variety of ways the good people of Corsica find that it is an excellent thing to be on friendly terms with certain deputies. Farmers are compensated for losses by cattle-plagues which never raged, except on paper. One happy district was paid for more beasts than it had ever contained. By a pleasant little fiction, a flood was supposed to have desolated a district which has been dried up from the Creation, as far as can be discovered. Of course the sufferers of the right way of thinking were liberally helped out of the public purse to tide over the evil day. Meanwhile such as are not of the right way of thinking see the other side of the medal. The attempts of M. FERRY and his colleagues to soften down this picture were as successful as might be expected. What they had to say amounted in the long run to this—that the other side were just as bad, and to a confession that everything was not as it should be in the Island of Corsica, but that it would be put right. The deputies are perhaps not cynical enough to think, and are in any case too cautious to say, that this is sufficient. They may be of opinion that a Republic is bound to make things better if it is to justify its pretensions; but the majority does not feel constrained to carry virtue to the point of turning out the Ministry. It preferred, very naturally, to pass to the order of the day, and leave M. FERRY to keep his promises. The result might have been foreseen, and there is nothing in it to discourage the Opposition. They have had the best of the debate, and have struck M. FERRY hard for the first time. The success is to be followed up by a general inquiry into the behaviour of Prefects all over France, and the prospect is manifestly making the Ministerial journalists very uncomfortable.

DISESTABLISHMENT IN WALES.

IT appears that the Government has determined to leave the proposed disestablishment of the Church of England in Wales an open question. A statement to that effect, published some time ago, has not been contradicted; and the complicity of Mr. GLADSTONE in the agitation of the so-called Liberation Society has long been suspected. The encouragement which he offers to Mr. DILLWYN's motion is facilitated by the recent and vicious practice of fragmentary or provincial legislation. The comparatively trivial innovation of the Welsh Sunday Closing Act was probably intended by Mr. GLADSTONE to serve as a precedent for an insidious attack on the Church Establishment. In both cases a concession will have been made to the same active body of election agents which has for the present returned in the Principality an overwhelming majority of Ministerial members. The Welsh Nonconformist Ministers, having partially shut up the public-houses, are now bent on the more ambitious object of relieving themselves, as they hope, from the social superiority of the Established clergy. Their most zealous allies will find it difficult to suggest any other desirable result which can follow from the proposed revolution. The great majority of Welsh Dissenters entertain no unfriendly feelings to the class which is so obnoxious to their ministers. The love of ecclesiastical services, and especially of sermons, which is peculiar to the Welsh people, induces many of them to attend church and chapel in turn with almost indiscriminate satisfaction. With the tacit approval of their neighbours, the upper classes exclusively frequent the churches of the Establishment. A local magnate or a country gentleman who professed himself a Dissenter would be regarded with surprise, if not with suspicion, as a deserter and a possible spy. There is no corresponding or converse prejudice against Churchmen of a humbler rank. But for professional agitation, sectarian divisions in Wales would in no degree interfere with social harmony.

The religious revival which was effected during the last century by the disciples of WESLEY and WHITFIELD was undoubtedly justified or provoked by the stagnant condition of the Church, which again was mainly the result of scanty endowments. In many parts of Wales the greater number of benefices had been appropriated by monasteries; and at the Reformation the great tithes remained, with few exceptions, in the possession either of laymen or of distant ecclesiastical corporations. Within the memory of the present generation the poverty of the local establishment compelled bishops and patrons to content themselves with the appointment of ill-educated incumbents of humble condition, some of whom shared the excusable defects of the class from which they sprang. The livings have not become richer; but the zeal which has become general in England has overflowed into the Principality; and the great majority of the Welsh clergy are now cultivated, earnest in the discharge of their duties, and generally efficient. The wholly unmixed evil which will result from disestablishment in Wales is of exactly the same character with the inevitable consequence of a similar policy in England. The attack is first directed against a local section, only because it is believed to be isolated and weak. Mr. DILLWYN, though he may perhaps be urged on by special antipathies, will not conceal his entire sympathy with the more comprehensive measure proposed by the Liberationists. Mr. GLADSTONE hopes to promote in the whole country as well as in the Principality the incompatible objects of Democratic equality and increased sacerdotal influence.

It is indeed possible that he may withhold for the present his own active co-operation in the assault on the Church; but he can deal no heavier blow against a fundamental institution than to treat its continuance as an open question. Mr. GLADSTONE's real feeling on the subject of Church Establishments has been fully disclosed by his action in Ireland, and by the language which has been used by himself and his followers with reference to Scotland. It has been said that in that country the decision must rest with the majority of the people, and Lord HARTINGTON announced on a memorable occasion that he would not be deterred from concurring in Scotch disestablishment by apprehension of the bearing of such a measure on the English Church. Aristocratic Liberals are apt to forget that by the condition of their existence they are retained to defend other rights and privileges as well as their own. The Bishops of the Synod of Dort, who, according to SYDNEY SMITH's apologue, threw out to the mob the dinners of the Deans and Chapters, were not deemed to have added to the security of their own repast. Political and social levellers regard with natural satisfaction the blind readiness of their destined victims to desert any section of their own body which may be immediately threatened. Capitalists are sometimes ready to admit that property in land has some peculiar disability; and landowners support measures which are openly directed against shareholders in public undertakings. The hereditary Whigs are, of all others, the most obstinately shortsighted. Several of them lately voted for the expulsion of the Bishops from the House of Lords, in the obvious belief that they were protecting one Estate of the Realm by sacrificing another.

Fragmentary legislation for parts of the kingdom where it is thought that resistance may be weakest deprives established institutions of their most legitimate defence. If the Establishment were arbitrarily destroyed in the Principality of Wales, the agitators would, unless they felt themselves strong enough for the final struggle, repeat the experiment in some other part of the country; probably, as in another instance, in Cornwall. With each successive mutilation the Church and the vast interests which it includes would become doubly weakened for further resistance. The principle of spoliation would after the first experiment have been already recognized, and the natural defenders of the Establishment would find themselves scattered and divided. It is perhaps partly for this reason that the attack on the separate Establishment of Scotland has been postponed to the scheme of destroying an integral portion of the Church of England, but Mr. ANDERSON'S candid speech on the Ecclesiastical Assessments Bill proves that a reaction in favour of the Establishment has taken place since the time when Lord HARTINGTON was persuaded by Mr. ADAM to bid for the support of the voluntary agitators. Neither in Scotland nor in England will it be possible to show that the change would produce any advantage to compensate for the widespread mischief which must necessarily result. Of course the spoils of the Church might be employed for various purposes, though to none as useful as in their present application; but the argument that revolutionary measures are pecuniarily profitable is capable of wide and dangerous extension. The demagogues and dreamers who propose to expropriate landowners and capitalists are, like the Liberation Society, in the habit of enumerating the tempting forms of expenditure in which a predatory Government would indulge. It is generally thought to be a sufficient answer that the existence of property has not become an open question. It is obvious that theft, if it is secured against its proper penalties, is an extremely gainful industry; but, even on economical grounds, general confiscation would be ruinous to the community.

It may be readily admitted that corporate funds stand on a different foundation from private property. In extreme cases the Legislature may justly alter their disposition; but, when change is recommended as a lucrative operation, the proposal excites grave suspicion. The maintenance of a resident clergy, such as that which now exists in England and Wales, would be a highly beneficial investment of capital, if it were now for the first time disposable. The Nonconformists themselves, with creditable inconsistency, promote, as far as their resources extend, the endowment of their several sects. Half a century ago Sir ROBERT PEEL passed, at the instance of the English Presbyterians, an Act for securing to the actual congregations, though they had by that time changed their doctrines, large funds which had been given to their predecessors. The Wesleyans, the Congregationalists, and many other religious bodies are constantly increasing the large investments which to a certain extent now render them independent of voluntary contributions. The Church of England has, according to undisputed statements, within thirty years received contributions amounting to the enormous sum of twenty-five millions. Its enemies affect to infer, from the profuse liberality of its members, that it might subsist even if it were deprived of its actual possessions; but the builders and benefactors of churches have been largely influenced by their knowledge that they were increasing the efficiency, not of a sect, but of a national Church which is responsible for the use it makes of its revenues. In proportion to its wealth, the Principality of Wales has not been less active or less liberal than other parts of the kingdom. At this time the Welsh section of the Establishment is more efficient than at any former period. If it were suddenly abolished or excluded from the Principality, no Dissenting sect would either fill the vacancy or, as there is no question of concurrent endowment, in any way profit by the change. The ministers of the sects would retain the exact social position which seems at present in some cases to cause their discontent.

DROWNED TREASURES.

"THE sea hath its pearls"; and not only these, but a great many other pieces of portable property. A diver in the Bay of Gibraltar, who went down lately to discover the whereabouts of a recent wreck, found himself among the guns and timbers of some old sunken ship of war. Possibly human curiosity may lead to the recovery of this submerged barque, though the guns can scarcely have much value, even as old metal, and though there is no reason to think that the ship contained the naval chest with specie. The finding of this vessel is chiefly interesting because it reminds the adventurous of almost the last remaining vestige of romance. It is still not impossible for a bold, lucky, and ingenious man to become a MONTE CRISTO. All he needs is money enough. Now it is true that money enough for the character may be obtained on the Stock Exchange, and by an adroit use of "Rings" and "Corners." But it is found, as a matter of experience, that when a man has acquired the wealth of a MONTE CRISTO by the methods of a VANDERBILT, he does not spend his opulence like a MONTE CRISTO. Now spending, not getting, is the touchstone of this heroic type. People who have been money-grubbing all their lives do not know how to scatter their gains in a truly grand style. They remain swollen, prosperous, and deeply uninteresting citizens. They never dream of playing at Providence, unmasking villains, delivering damsels, picking up their enemies in company with Casks of Amontillado, and similar diversions. To do all this as it should be done, to live like a hero of DUMAS, and sin like a creation of EDGAR POE, a man must come into his money young, in the full flush of his invention and his powers, unstaled by the eternal use of the telephone, the air of City offices, and the dull study of the City articles.

A modern millionaire probably does not know what an enemy is, or what passion means. He may have commercial rivals, of course; but when he "corners" them it is not with lime and a trowel in the recess of a cellar. He may have two or three "establishments"; but what does he wot of passion as it burns in the veins of a genuine hero? What has he felt of the wild thrill with which you clasp the maiden whom you have rescued from the embrace of the Cardinal or the caresses of the Pontiff, while a devoted crew of Carbonari in red shirts cheer your valour and applaud your choice? Of all this ardent opulent existence, which can only be procured when bounding youth directs incalculable opulence, we may say that the VANDERBILTS and JAY GOULDS of this world have only the feeblest conception.

To make romance possible, a man still in his prime (say nineteen years of age) ought also to be at the head of millions, or milliards. Now this happy conjunction can only be effected by the discovery of buried treasure. The world, by land or sea, is full of buried treasure. Where is the gold of which ALEXANDER'S men looted the palaces of Persia? In dealing with this topic it is difficult quite to avoid the style of the Daily Telegraph. Where is the hidden hoard of Tonatiuh, the Mexican Sun-god, and where the endless wealth of his temple? Delphi was not so well looted, depend on it, as the barbarians believed. Priests of all faiths, like the persecuted Jesuits in England, have their "priests'-hole" to hide the property of the god. The hoard of ATTILA, like that of the Niblungs, is somewhere, if we only knew where. Unluckily we do not know. Earth is too jealous a guardian of treasure entrusted to her bosom. But we do know that the vessels of the Mede went down, with the crews cheering and the Persian bunting still flying (though riddled with shot) in the Straits of Salamis. The ancients had no diving-bells, and all the wealth of Orient—great cups of gold, bowls of Sidonian work, sceptres, pearls, the golden shoes of the Satrap—must be below the ooze, and bathybius, and so forth, in the Salaminian bay. A "concession" may, doubtless, be obtained from the Greek Government. The Spanish Government also might (and probably would) sell a concession to raise the plate ships sunk in Vigo Bay. Unluckily these were explored by a company (limited) eight or nine years ago, and there was no plate in them—only old cannon-balls. The new MONTE CRISTO must look elsewhere.

ROMAN POLITICS.

THE recent municipal elections in Rome, in which the Clerical party has won a signal victory, have a greater importance than usually belongs to contests of this kind. They illustrate alike the confusion into which all political parties in Italy but one have fallen, and the capital which this one—the Clerical—party is able to make out of the confusion. For fourteen years, as is well known, the Clericals, as a party, have taken no open share in Parliamentary elections. That they have repeatedly pulled the wires from behind the scenes on such occasions is notorious; but before the world they have been always able to allege that the good Catholic must be neither a candidate nor a voter till it might seem good to the POPE for the time being to withdraw the prohibition imposed by PIUS IX. But after a few years a distinction began to be drawn. To take part in the political life of Italy would be virtually to accept the new dynasty, and recognize its claims; but a Catholic unable and unwilling to do this might lawfully (it was argued) take part in the government of his native town. Hence the rule was relaxed. For some time past the Clericals have taken part and gained ground in municipal politics. An outward show of consistency was maintained; and the way was prepared either, in case Italy fell into difficulties, to use the influence thus acquired against her; or, in case the consolidation of Italy grew to be too stubborn a fact to be any longer called in question, to be able to treat on terms not too unequal between the Quirinal and the Vatican. The great amount of pressure which can be silently exercised by the latter upon the former is shown by the passing of the recent Law of Public Instruction, the effect of which will be greatly to strengthen Clerical influence throughout the country. This Bill was passed by a Ministry many of the members of which were not long ago ardent Radicals, and which repudiates the charge of being in any way in collusion with the Clerical party. No doubt the disclaimer is made in perfect good faith. The Ministry yielded to the superior address of the Clerical wire-pullers. Ten years ago the Clerical party was powerless simply because it was inactive. It refused to take any part in public affairs, and consequently its votes were of no account, and it cherished dreams of foreign intervention on behalf of the Papacy which made every patriotic Italian look on it as the worst of all enemies. But from the moment when it began, even in merely municipal business, to take an active share in public life, it became a force which had to be reckoned with. The disease of Italian politics was, and still to a great extent is, that there are no national distinctions among parties. They are formed, last a few months, are broken up, and replaced by other groups equally ephemeral. What gives the Clerical party its power under such circumstances is that it votes and acts in a solid, compact body. But this is the very reason why the party still resolutely declines to be avowedly represented in the Chamber. The fact of there being a considerable Clerical party there would have the immediate effect of putting an end to the ceaseless personal squabbles and intrigues in which Italian Parliamentary life chiefly consists, and in placing, for the first time since the unification of Italy, a plain issue before the country.

This plain issue the Clerical party has hitherto wished to evade or postpone. It is now recognized on all hands that the restoration of the Temporal Power is an impossibility; and the question then presents itself to the Papacy how to make good on one field what it has lost on another. Not to quote other instances, the recent elections in Belgium have shown that it is possible for the Clerical party, even in one of the most enlightened countries in Europe, to win a Parliamentary majority. But the tactics which have been successfully tried in Belgium would be premature in Italy. To obtain as firm a hold as possible, first on public instruction, and next on municipal politics, are the two chief steps to be taken before engaging in an open Parliamentary struggle. The former of these two ends has been in part achieved by the Education Act carried, not without the aid of Clerical pressure, by the present Liberal Cabinet. The latter has been attained, not only in Rome, but in many other parts of Italy. Genoa, the birthplace of Mazzini, and one of the strongholds of Italian Radicalism, has been in the same way carried by the Clericals. In the smaller municipalities the influence of the Church is a constant power, always working in one direction against the divided and often supine resistance of its opponents. It must also be remembered that the education of the country is largely in the hands of the municipalities, which fact in great part accounts for the strenuous endeavours of the Church to gain control of them. The Catholic Church, better than any other religious or political body, knows how to play a waiting game. Give it a few more years in which it can freely mould the education of the Italian people, and it can, even while freely recognizing the new order of things in Italy, enter into the Parliamentary life of the country with the chance of gaining such victories as the Clerical party has recently won in Belgium. Its position then would assuredly be far stronger than it is at present, and stronger than any one that it could acquire, in the conditions of modern political life, by any other means. The Temporal Power is gone for ever; but there are many signs to show that the spiritual and political influence of the Church, in Italy as in other countries, is by no means on the decline.

RAILWAY DEFICIENCIES.

THE whole duty of Railway Directors is not summed up in the formula that they should think of the dividends. It is a great thing, both directly and indirectly, to get a good percentage on their shares for the shareholders. In the first place, it is very nice for those among us who are happy enough to have shares in a paying line, and then the public at large makes its profit also; for if railways did not pay, who would build them? So much is obvious to everybody who is not a friend of humanity of the deepest dye. There is another side to the question however. Railways have not a few advantages which are refused to other business undertakings—the most important of them being protection against competition, at least to a very considerable extent. Now, in return for this immense assistance, they may reasonably be expected to show a certain magnanimity, and, moreover, it will be wise in them to do so. But, as a matter of fact, many lines show neither magnanimity nor wisdom. Those of us who have occasion to travel about London on our lawful occasions are compelled to make acquaintance with lines which seem to take an absolute pleasure in worrying the passengers. You have to travel in a carriage which is smaller and worse ventilated and more crowded than an average omnibus. You take an hour to crawl over fifteen miles and a half. The explanation of this inefficiency is forthcoming on inquiry and perfectly satisfactory after a fashion. There is no competition to fear, for there is no other line to one's destination, and so the Company can do as it pleases. In other and more important respects the Railway Companies show a tendency to drive a hard bargain. There is the question of the food supply, for instance, and particularly the question of the fish supply. It is on the face of it sufficiently absurd that, while millions of mackerel are catchable, and are caught, on the coast of Cornwall, they cannot be brought to London. The only reasonable explanation would be that they do not sell when they get there. That, however, is said not to be the case. They can be sold, but they cannot be brought; and the reason is that the Railway Companies refuse to go to the expense of providing proper vans, and that they insist upon prohibitive freights. Now it will not be pretended that London should be supplied with fish at the cost of the shareholders; but then neither is it to be hampered in supplying itself by a regard for their interests alone. From the moment that the State is called in to regulate the relations on which railway lines stand to one another and the public, it must have the right to control them in everything which touches the general interest. It is by no means desirable to extend the principle of Government interference in commercial affairs; but a business undertaking could hit upon no more infallible way of causing this extension than by aggressively advancing the claim to consider its own convenience before the public interest.

The Railway Companies are even more strictly bound to show care in saving their passengers from undue risks; but here, too, they fail to satisfy critics who have no particular reason to be unfriendly to them. Fatal accidents on a large scale have been rare for some time, though there are signs that another period is beginning. But, without going far enough to attain to a general massacre, a Railway Company may do a good deal of killing and maiming in a quiet way. Mr. Davy, surgeon to Westminster Hospital, has written to the Standard to call attention to one of the most effectual of railway methods for causing injury or death. This is the want of continuous and overlapping footboards. The absence of these adjuncts to a carriage is a perpetual source of accidents, sometimes of a fatal character. Railway directors, who are very Spartan in their ideas about the proper conduct of their passengers, will probably point out that by taking a little care it is possible to avoid any danger. They may decline to be held responsible for the weakness of people who cannot look after themselves. That is a very convenient line for the directors to take; but there are a variety of reasons why it should not commend itself to outsiders. It is not at all self-evident that we should stand the presence of even an easily avoidable danger out of tenderness for the repose of directors and the pockets of shareholders. Then, again, there are a certain number of passengers who have the misfortune to be old, or very shortsighted, or liable to nervousness in the midst of a hurrying crowd, and it is not to be taken for granted that these are crimes of so unpardonable a nature that they are to be punished by crushing to death between a carriage wheel and a platform. They are, however, commonly enough punished in this excessive way, and it is a form of erratic severity which calls for reform. We cheerfully acknowledge that railway directors are not indifferent to their duty towards the public in some respects. On the contrary, they are accustomed to insist on it with vehemence on what appear to them to be proper occasions. Whenever there is a chance of cutting across a park or spoiling a street by hideous ventilators belching out nasty smelling smoke, we hear loud and even clamorous assertions that it is all for the good of the nation, and in the interests of the British working-man. The pity is that these excellent sentiments never seem to lead to action, except when they can be expressed in terms of more contracts and more shares.

THE RUSSO-AFGHAN FRONTIER.

IT must always be painful to a good citizen to find in the attitude of his Government toward a foreign Power the suggestion of ignoble associations. Yet it is very difficult to follow the negotiations—or so-called negotiations—now going forward between Downing Street and St. Petersburg without being continually reminded of one of those transactions between "young men from the country" and certain members of a highly experienced class of Londoners which occasionally come up for investigation in our police-courts. It is not, of course, that Lord GRANVILLE is really in the mood of the "confiding yokel." Russian Ministers have too often disappeared with his watch and chain for that to be possible. It is merely the force of circumstances, not unconnected with the host of difficulties which the Government have contrived to strew in their own path in every quarter of the world, which compels our often-fleeced FOREIGN SECRETARY to submit once more to the old operation, and he naturally puts as good a face upon it as he can. To judge from all present appearances, he is coming up quite cheerfully to be shorn, with Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE trotting at his side. The fact that he is merely a victim and not a dupe detracts no doubt from the precision of the distressing parallel we have ventured to draw, but on the side of St. Petersburg it is complete. The recent proceedings of Russia with respect to Afghanistan are characterized by all that humorous conservatism of tactics which distinguishes our own humbler practitioners of a kindred art. There is no more variation in the Russian programme than there is in the plot of the "Confidence" drama. The parts respectively played by the "enterprising general," the "dashing geographer," and the "judicious official" at St. Petersburg appear to be stereotyped; and their "words" and "business" to be apportioned to each of them by an inviolable tradition. There is, however, a considerable reluctance on the part of our own Foreign Office to let us know how the performance is going on; and we believe, indeed, that the first complete account of the latest representation of this old and favourite comedy was that incidentally furnished the other night by Sir HENRY RAWLINSON during the discussion which followed General HAMLEY'S valuable lecture at the United Service Institution on "Russia's Approaches to India." It is much too good to be lost, and we propose, therefore, to add it to the meagre stock of information which has been vouchsafed to Parliament from the Treasury Bench.

It was understood that when Russia's advance to Merv became officially known in this country, Downing Street at once, or almost at once, approached St. Petersburg with a proposal for a joint delimitation of the northern frontier of Afghanistan. This step in itself was, under the circumstances, very like inviting the spoiler to say how much he will "take" to postpone the operation of binding the strong man; but let that pass. Russia, through her Foreign Office, most amiably acquiesced, and the Anglo-Russian Boundary Commission is to be duly appointed. But the military authorities at St. Petersburg have, in the meantime, improvised a frontier out of their own heads. Considerately desirous of saving trouble to our Indian officials, they promptly issued a map of Afghanistan, in which its northern frontier is traced with beautiful distinctness some two hundred miles south of the line verbally agreed to between the two Powers in Lord CLARENDON'S time, and by a consequence within fifty miles of Herat. It was not likely that this example of the "scientific use of the imagination" should escape the notice of so ardent a geographer as Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE; and HER MAJESTY'S Government, startled by this anticipation of the Commission's labours, "drew the attention" of the Russian Government to the map in question. The only answer, Sir HENRY RAWLINSON tells us, which they have at present received from St. Petersburg is that "the "Foreign Office does not acknowledge" the map. It is, it appears, "an official map" in so far that it has "emanated "from a public office in St. Petersburg," but it is not "the Government map"; it is not "the diplomatic map." It has not proceeded from the Russian Foreign Office, but has been issued by the War Office, "with which "the Diplomatic Department has no immediate relations." It is, at any rate, a publication for which the Foreign Office "disclaims all responsibility." The subject, Sir HENRY RAWLINSON adds, is "under discussion" between the two Governments; where for the present we may leave it, in order to follow up its history in the House of Commons. Here the mysterious map has been more than once made the subject of inquiry; and one of Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE'S answers on the subject deserves to be held in everlasting remembrance by all students of the formal laws of thought. In reply to Mr. STANHOPE, he admitted it to be "quite true that the map traces "the Afghan territory at about the distance mentioned "(under fifty miles) from Herat"; but, he added, "a "large extent of territory to the north of that line is left "uncoloured, and is not included within the Russian "boundary." Asked by Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT whether Merv was not also left uncoloured, he replied by denying that "this was a question which arose out of the answer he "gave." We know that nothing can come of nothing; but, if Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE'S position is to be accepted, nothing has ever arisen or can ever arise out of anything. His contention was that no places left uncoloured on a map of Afghanistan are to be regarded as claimed by Russia; and when he is asked whether a place not merely claimed but actually occupied by Russia is not left uncoloured on this map, he finds that his contention did not legitimately give rise to the inquiry. Such a position must be of great argumentative value to him, if he can only maintain it. If any attempt to demolish his syllogisms by rejecting their major premisses may be put aside as a mere irrelevance, his logic will obviously become impregnable.

The whole incident, however, is full of instruction, not only as regards the attitude of the Ministers towards the House of Commons, but as regards the existing and future negotiatory relations between the Governments of England and Russia. The "story of the map" is from this point of view full of "doctrine and reproof," though unfortunately not of consolation. We start from the fact that the negotiations between the two parties have been opened with the perpetration on the part of one of them of what is neither more nor less than an impudent "plant" upon the other; and that upon the latter protesting against this — we presume with the usual mildness—the only reply vouchsafed to him is one which constitutes an aggravation of the offence. If the Russian "Diplomatic Department" has really had the effrontery to reply to our representations that it has "no immediate relations" with the War Office from which the map proceeded, surely the natural rejoinder should have been that that is exactly the state of things which we complain of. It is presumably because Russian diplomacy has, and takes good care to have, no "im-"mediate relations" with Russian militarism that the language of the one is so singularly at variance with the doings of the other. Thus it comes about that Russian generals in Central Asia are continually annexing huge slices of territory at the very moment when Russian Ministers are assuring the English Foreign Office that the appropriated districts are altogether outside the sphere of their operations. Distance is pleaded as the excuse for the civil official's ignorance of these military adventures, and his imperfect control over their authors; but it is a little too much for him to wrest this pretext to the use which is now apparently being made of it. The "self-"willed commandor" in Turkestan is a figure which has at least a certain dramatic vraisemblance; but the uncontrolable geographer in the next street is simply a monstrous conception. To suppose that there is no department in St. Petersburg which could, if it were desired, prevent the Topographical Department of the War Office from issuing "bogus" maps of debatable territory would be as absurd as to imagine that there is nowhere in Russia any authority to prevent the Diplomatic Department from publishing forged despatches or manufacturing sham treaties. No doubt upon sufficient pressure we could get the Government of St. Petersburg to withdraw this "general "staff map" from circulation; but the fact that it has been issued is sufficient. It is the "Go it, NED!" of the Russian diplomatist addressed to the Russian general, and that is a sort of hint which cannot be "withdrawn." The more criminal, therefore, will be the supineness of our own Government if, after this, they trust to diplomatic engagements on the part of Russia in preference to defensive dispositions of their own.

LAST MONDAY IN BERLIN.

THE ceremony which was performed in Berlin last Monday was something more than a scenic display. The presence of the EMPEROR and of two of the three men by whose advice and assistance he was enabled to bring about the union of Germany lent the occasion historical interest, though not historical importance. The politics of the country will not be affected by the fact that the foundation-stone of the new house for the Imperial Parliament has at length been laid; but it was natural that patriotic Germans of all classes and parties should be reminded by the event of the disunion and powerlessness from which the nation was delivered, chiefly by the efforts of those who stood before them. It is true that the Reichstag did not create the Empire, and that the centre of power is not to be sought there as in our own House of Commons; but it is equally true that its influence on the past history of the country has been great, and that it possesses rights more considerable than Englishmen generally suppose. Though it cannot overthrow Ministries, no tax can be imposed and no law enacted without its assent. It is difficult to see how its prerogatives could be greatly increased without destroying the federal character of the Empire.

When, after the war of 1866, Prince BISMARCK, who was then supposed to be the most reactionary of living statesmen, summoned a Parliament elected by universal suffrage to consult with the Government as to the Constitution to be granted to the North German Confederation, he was making a great experiment, which was perhaps only justified by its success and the extreme difficulty of the situation. Among the allies of Prussia there were some who were jealous and mistrustful. The King of SAXONY had been compelled to enter the Confederation by force of arms, an influential part of the population in the annexed States was opposed to the changes that followed upon the war, and, in spite of the secret military conventions, the South Germans were both nominally and virtually independent. It was necessary to create a central power to resist the forces that tended to dissolve the Confederation. These, as the IMPERIAL CHANCELLOR has lately explained, were the considerations that induced him to advise the EMPEROR to summon the Reichstag and to grant it the powers that it possesses.

To some of the Liberal leaders of those days it seemed that the great statesman was moving too slowly. They were anxious to tighten the bonds that held the Confederation together, and to reduce the smaller members of it to complete subjection. It is unnecessary to point out how ungenerous it would have been to force from the Governments who had stood by Prussia in the hour of her bitter need, concessions which they had not freely made when they entered into an alliance with her. But such a policy would have been as unwise as dishonourable. If it had been pursued there would not have been even in the Northern States that hearty co-operation which astonished NAPOLEON III. at the beginning of the French war. The Southern Governments might have sent their contingents to the army, but they would never have entered the Confederation, and the Empire would still be, as it so long was, "a poet's vision, a schoolboy's dream." This danger was fortunately averted by the loyalty and the wisdom of the EMPEROR and his advisers. It has always been their policy to demand from the single States only such concessions as were absolutely necessary for the union and the safety of the Empire. But, if the Reichstag possessed anything approaching to the power of an English Parliament, it is obvious that the independence of the smaller Governments would be merely nominal; the Landtag of each would become a mere vestry, and its sovereign a puppet moved by wires worked at Berlin. That is what few Germans desire; and it was probably this consideration quite as much as the impatience every man of genius feels when his plans are criticized and thwarted by pedants, and his conceptions measured by the rule of thumb, that induced Prince BISMARCK to speak as strongly as he has lately done on the impossibility of Parliamentary government in Germany.

MR. WOODALL'S CLAUSE.

THE rejection of Mr. WOODALL'S Clause, even under the peculiar circumstances affecting last Thursday night's division, is, of course, an event to be welcomed with thankfulness. It would indeed be ungracious to receive it in any other spirit. These are pre-eminently days in which gratitude for the smallest of political mercies is becoming, and we ought to congratulate ourselves on having by any means whatever escaped the committal to the most portentous legislative experiment ever proposed to a community which has never expressed the slightest desire to try it. To have escaped, that is for the moment sufficient, and we may be content to regard the Parliamentary vote which saves us from it in its more mechanical aspect as a political force. It would be just as well, indeed, to content ourselves with that view of it, for, thanks to the PRIME MINISTER, it has been deprived of all other significance. A decision of the House of Commons ought to be not only a force, but a guide. It ought not only to tell us what the existing representative body thinks, but to supply us with some indication of what future representative bodies may for some time to come be expected to think. Nothing, however, is to be learnt in that direction from the discussion in which Mr. WOODALL'S Clause was rejected by a majority of two to one. All we know about it is that it does not represent the real balance of opinion in the House of Commons on the question of female suffrage. How many votes should be added to the minority to represent the Liberals coerced by the PRIME MINISTER into deserting Mr. WOODALL; and how many votes should be subtracted from the majority to represent those even more docile Liberals who went over at Mr. GLADSTONE'S bidding into the opposite camp, it is impossible to say. Not every abstentionist is as communicative as Mr. W. H. LEATHAM, and certainly not every deserter so manfully calls attention to his change of colours as did Mr. AGNEW. And when we bear in mind that there was doubtless an appreciable percentage of Conservatives as reckless as Lord FOLKESTONE and Mr. WARTON, but less candid, who were tempted to vote for the clause in the hope of wrecking the Bill, we see into what admired confusion Mr. GLADSTONE has contrived to throw the entire opinion-gauging machine.

As regards the motive and defence of his action in this respect, we may well leave him to the precious balms of Mr. STANSFELD and the other faithful adherents of the betrayed cause. It is impossible not to sympathize with these complaints. Mr. GLADSTONE has in fact contrived to repeat his often-exhibited feat of performing a disagreeable duty in the most irritating of ways. Ministers have at all times been compelled to temporize with questions which lie outside the beaten track of politics, and they can seldom in so doing avoid the infliction of more or less disappointment on a certain proportion of their followers. But, if Mr. GLADSTONE had desired to give the maximum of annoyance to the largest number of Liberals, and on the least satisfactory of grounds, he could not have gone a more effective way to work. He delayed his decision to the latest moment; he allowed the committed section of his party to commit themselves inextricably before he took action; he changed the ground of his decision between the date of his correspondence with the promoters of the movement and his announcement in the House of Commons; and, finally, he justified his course at the last moment by a plea so inadequate in appearance, and which he was at so little pains to explain and enforce, that the disappointed contingent of his party have the strongest reasons for suspecting that they have been put off with a mere pretended excuse. They would have little cause of complaint if Mr. GLADSTONE had from the first taken up the plain and unassailable ground that the enfranchisement of women is a step which, upon any endurable theory of a representative system, it would be utterly indefensible to take, except after express reference of the question to the electorate. They would have some, but still not such serious, cause of complaint if Mr. GLADSTONE could have convinced them, or even attempted to convince them, of the gravity or even the mere existence of the dangers with which he so solemnly warned them, that the Franchise Bill would be threatened in the event of the incorporation in it of Mr. WOODALL'S Clause. But this he did not for a moment vouchsafe to do. He simply told his followers that there the dangers were, and that he must, therefore, respectfully desire them to vote dead against those convictions (for they could hardly be certain that mere abstention would be enough), which they could not support without exposing the Bill to these unspecified perils. A command of that kind may be obeyed, and we see with what touching docility it was obeyed the other night. For the rank and file of the Liberal party there is nothing to be said; for those members of the Conservative party who voted for the measure there is in too many cases very little. It is true that by no means so large a proportion of the latter voted against their previously expressed opinions as was the case with the Ministerialists, and that the only two occupants of the front bench who supported Mr. WOODALL—Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE and Lord JOHN MANNERS—are convinced advocates of the proposal. Barely half the Opposition voted at all, and nearly a fourth of that half voted against the clause. The abstainers of the party might also plead that their vote could but increase a majority sufficient and certain already—an excuse which, whether good or bad, did not apply to Liberal supporters of Mr. WOODALL'S ideas. Altogether the debate and the division-list are not pleasant reading for those who hold the reputation of Parliament dear; and the only members of the House of Commons who can be congratulated on the result represent a very small minority of both Ayes and Noes.

MORA AND LOTTO.

ONE of the most amiable traits in the national character of the Italians is the ease with which they are amused. A tambourine will set a whole family dancing, and the gift of a few squibs or crackers on a saint's day will delight a grown-up man. If he is a Neapolitan the odds are that he will not have patience enough to wait till nightfall, but will let them off in the full glare of the noonday sun. No opportunity for pleasure is lost, and no other race feels so entirely that sufficient to the day is the evil and also the joy thereof. This is perhaps the reason why Italian games are so simple and unscientific. The light Southern temperament does not require the stimulus of those complicated forms of diversion which afford an opportunity for the exercise of strength or dexterity. The player is content with the excitement produced by chance but slightly tempered with skill, and his favourite games are therefore apt to appear somewhat childish to an Englishman.

Among the most universal of these is Mora, which closely resembles the schoolboy's odd or even, except that it is played with the fingers instead of marbles. Whoever has frequented the village inns and the smaller wine-rooms of Southern Italy must have seen groups of peasants and fishermen gesticulating violently, throwing out their half-closed hands, and at the same time shrieking out numbers in wild and discordant tones. In the flickering light of the unshaded oil-lamp that stands in their midst, a stranger might almost think they were wizards imprecating destruction on some enemy's head, so eager are the pale sallow faces and so wild and yet measured the movements. That is the picturesque, and by far the most interesting side of Mora, which is played in the North, too, though with less noise and fewer gestures.

When the match is only between two, they stand opposite each other. At the same moment each elevates his right hand with as many fingers as he wishes to be counted extended, and calls out a number. If he has guessed the sum correctly, he scores a point; if both players are either right or wrong, they begin again. A game may consist of any number of points; either ten or twelve are usually chosen. If four join in it, they generally form parties, A. and B. being opposed to C. and D. The first pair begins, while the second quietly looks on. If A. wins a point from C., he opposes himself to D., and so on. When the company is large, Mora may be played in two ways, but never by an odd number of persons. In the first case they divide into pairs, though standing side by side, and those who win play against each other until the victory is finally decided. In the second all play together, every right guess counts, and whoever first makes the ten or twelve points has won. There are local variations of both these systems, and custom differs greatly as to the way in which the losses are distributed. It may be added that old players generally prefer the first system, and that they believe that when playing with novices it is wisest to call out a single number—six, seven, or eight is thought to be the best—while varying the number of fingers extended, but that this plan is not advantageous when they are opposed to the more experienced.

It is obvious that so insipid a game cannot be played without a stake, which generally consists of a given quantity of wine. Over this the victor has, of course, absolute disposal; but it is an understood thing that he shares it with the losers, though if he bears any of them a grudge he has an acknowledged right to exclude him. If a respectable foreigner is seated in a village inn while play is going on, he will frequently be asked to join it; and the most remarkable thing about Mora is that, if he is entirely ignorant of the game, he is almost certain to win. Whether it is the natural politeness of the Italians which induces them thus to cheat themselves for a stranger's advantage, or a shrewd suspicion that in any case he is likely to pay for more wine than he drinks if once his acquaintance can be made, we shall not attempt to decide.

In bad times, when the soldi are scarce, the innkeeper often proposes Mora as a certain means of attracting them from the pockets of his neighbours; for many an Italian who hesitates to buy his customary half-litre will willingly run the risk of paying a somewhat higher price for the hope of being able to drink it for nothing. Indeed, the love for gambling is a national characteristic; and, as Mora is the most innocent, Lotto—that is, the official weekly lottery—is the most dangerous of the forms it takes, at least among the middle and lower classes. It is true that the Government derives a considerable revenue from the banks, and that play is so popular that no Administration would venture to close them; but it is also true that the injury they do to the country is incalculable. From the nobleman to the labourer who tills his fields, every one is anxious to stake all he can as soon as he has discovered what he thinks to be three lucky numbers; the very beggars hoard their halfpence for the purpose; and there are whole classes who hardly think of investing their savings in any other way. Nor is the game confined to authorized places, where the play is fair, though the odds are enormously in favour of the bank; in every large town there are private adventurers, who, in spite of the law, find it profitable to undersell the Government by accepting its risk at a lower price. They recognize the numbers officially drawn, and are strictly honest when small sums are gained; but, if a client of theirs were to happen to have one of those great strokes of luck which do occasionally occur even in Lotto, the probability is that he would never see a farthing of the money, nor ever again meet the obliging gentleman with whom he dealt so long. Nay, more than this, there are shops, at least in Naples, where a poor but speculative housewife may deposit a soldo on condition that if the numbers she has named are drawn, she is to be provided with a turkey, a ham, a pair of fowls, or whatever the object of her desire may be, for her Sunday dinner. It is strange that the very men who find this form of trade profitable should themselves be passionate and habitual players; but a man who gives his soul up to Lotto seems to gain such a confidence in his own luck or judgment as neither reason nor experience can shake.

The ignorant are at one with the philosophers in this, that they never believe that anything that happens is the result of pure chance, and the Italians, at least the Southern Italians, are firmly convinced that there must be some way of getting behind the mystery of Lotto and foreseeing the numbers that will be drawn. To this important task each addresses himself in his own way. The poverty-stricken old widow hears numerous masses before she stakes the few pence which are half of her weekly income, and after having done so returns to her church and entreats Santa Lucia to lend her good fortune. "You know no one needs it more than I do." Why should she not pray for a rather more plentiful supply of daily bread? It is often simply bread she wants. Then she goes home and starves herself for a week, and when her numbers do not come out she says to herself, "Well, well, perhaps it's all for the best. Santa Lucia knows, but then how pleasant it would be to be able to buy one big loaf, and a halfpenny water-melon, and a glass of wine!" Schopenhauer said jestingly when a friend ridiculed him for taking a lottery ticket, "Why shouldn't I leave a door open to Fate if it came into its head to do me a good turn?" The old lady wants to open a door for Providence, when she sinks the halfpence she can so ill spare in the Lotto bank. On the other hand, there are many who note all the numbers that have appeared for years, and base forecasts upon them which look very ingenious upon paper, but when they stake their money they are rarely more successful than the widow.

Most Italians, however, like most Englishmen, are neither religious nor scientific. They endeavour to get to fate by a backdoor and to outwit nature. Accordingly most Lotto-players rely on chance circumstances, omens, and dreams, for the numbers they desire to play. Thus, if a bull were to break loose from five men, to run thirty-eight paces, and to stop opposite a house, the number of which was ninety-six, the spectators would rush to the nearest bank and lay their money on 5, 38, 96. In the same way, if they were to dream of numbers, they would at once back them. The misfortune is that neither circumstances nor dreams are generally so clear as the examples above given. But the genius of the nation has been equal to the occasion. Various books have been published, several of a formidable size, which undertake to reduce everything one can possibly see, or more especially dream of, to a number for the purposes of the game. The present writer was once compelled to pass two days in a village inn where the only literature attainable was such a book, and he earnestly endeavoured to discover on what principles the numbers were arranged, but could find none. This may have been the fault of his own dulness, for when he came to look a little further he found abundant reason to admire the ingenuity of the author. He cannot guarantee the correctness of the details or the numbers; but, on the whole, the impression he gives is, he believes, correct. You have dreamed of a tree and turn to the infallible oracle; a tree is 9, but a dead tree is 37, and a green one 40; so far all is clear; but then a leafless tree is 96. Who but a botanist of the most inveterate kind can distinguish a dead from a leafless tree when he is dreaming? But this is not all. Every forest tree known in Italy has its own peculiar number, and so if you have dreamed of a winter landscape you are left to decide, not only the difficult question whether it was a simple, a dead, or a leafless tree, that appeared to you in the visions of the night, but also whether it was oak, beech, chestnut, or some species whose name you never heard. Your success depends upon your choice, and if you lose your money, your neighbours will soon discover that it is you, not the book, that is to blame. It is still more diverting, however, to discover that a single number represents your stepmother, a pancake, a giraffe, Napoleon I., and a frog croaking upon a stone. In a word, it is the very exactness of the book that renders it at once so mysterious and so infallible.

Such books are for those who can read; those who cannot have but little faith in them. Yet in Southern Italy they trust greatly to learning. The commonalty believe that the priests know all the Lotto numbers, but are bound by an oath not to reveal or play them, and if they suspect that one has done so in an underhand way, they at once set upon the same numbers. It is said that some of the monks who have been excluded from their monasteries by the present Government earn a living by foretelling the fortunate numbers; but party feeling among the ruling class runs so high, that it is well to examine twice before you believe the current reports as to a priest or a monk. It is certain, however, that a wanderer who makes his excursions on foot and is therefore not unapproachable, though he lingers long amid ancient ruins, will sometimes be accosted by a stranger, who, after a few words of introduction, entreats him to give a number. In such cases it is useless to insist on the folly of the request; the best thing to do is to disclaim all knowledge; but to add, "If you like, play so and so." Those who are known to read Greek, however, are thought to be the true masters of Lotto; why, we cannot say. They are not always the wealthiest of men. But, after all, it is best to part with the game, as with everything else, in a friendly way. We have said that we consider it one of the greatest curses of modern Italy, yet it has its uses. It amuses the imagination of its votaries. The Italian poor, except in Tuscany—a doubtful exception—are so miserable that they are not perhaps so unwise as they seem when they purchase with the poor soldi they can manage to scrape together a day or two of hope. The widow enjoys at least the vision of her great loaf, her melon, and her wine, and the housewife luxuriates for a day or two in expectation of the turkey which will amaze the family. They are disappointed; yes, but the Lotto banks are still open, and the day may come. It is perhaps foolish of them to cast the hardly-earned, the hardly-saved pennies they possess into the great gulf of the national treasury; but is it not, after all, better than that they should spend them in gin and whisky? Is it not incalculably better that they should be lost thus than expended upon dynamite?

POLITICAL TESTIMONIALS.

MR. JUSTIN HUNTLY McCARTHY, who is the son of Mr. Justin McCarthy, has been elected for an Irish constituency in the Nationalist interest. Some wicked people have been bruiting abroad among his constituents a report that Mr. McCarthy the son (we shall henceforward call him Mr. McCarthy tout court) is an Atheist. Thereupon Mr. Parnell has been applied to for a certificate of Mr. McCarthy's theism, or perhaps of his Christianity, for the newspaper report on which we found this notice, and without which we should certainly not have presumed to meddle with Mr. McCarthy's religious convictions, is a little vague. Mr. Parnell telegraphs to Athlone that the accusation is "quite unfounded and unjust," and the statement "an atrocious falsehood." Testimonials are always funny things, and it is perhaps not surprising, or more particularly un-Irish, that a Protestant—for Mr. Parnell is believed to be a Protestant—should give to a Roman Catholic constituency—for such Mr. McCarthy's electors at Athlone no doubt are in the main—a certificate of the religious orthodoxy of a person whose particular faith does not appear to be mentioned at all. What Mr. Parnell says is, that Mr. McCarthy is not an Atheist, and as Mr. Parnell on some of his famous Parisian tours has hobnobbed with many Atheists, he no doubt knows one when he sees him. How he became, as he says, "in a position to state" that Mr. McCarthy is not an Atheist we do not know. Perhaps he catechized him regularly, saying, "My good child, are you an Atheist?" Perhaps not. But, at any rate, Mr. McCarthy's orthodoxy, or at least his non-Atheism, is satisfactorily established by this singular billet de confession from a lay, not to say a heretical, confessor. The last thing of the kind that we remember was the still more celebrated, though somewhat less explicit, testimonial which, in "the heat of the moment" and of a general election, Mr. Samuel Morley gave to Mr. Bradlaugh—a testimonial which the giver has repented since bitterly and with tears. We do not know whether Mr. Parnell will also come to repent the facility with which, like the billiard-markers in novels of days now a little gone by, he has assumed a clerical or quasi-clerical character to gratify his young friends. With the unforgotten spectacle of Mr. Morley's tribulations before him, it was perhaps rash to do so; but Mr. Parnell always was an impulsive man. Meanwhile Mr. McCarthy has got his certificate, and is entitled to produce it against charges of Atheism in dark and market, which must be very satisfactory to him. It is no doubt amply deserved; and there is high authority for securing these testimonies. Voltaire, if we remember rightly, got, if not a regular billet de confession, something of the same kind more than once.

Mr. McCarthy's religious position, however, as we should not have touched it at all if it had not become public property in this odd fashion, so it need not detain us much longer. If it seems a little curious that Mr. McCarthy should have gone to Mr. Parnell for a testamur instead of to the local priest, who no doubt has his conscience in due and safe keeping, and who could have done the thing regularly, the practice is quite in keeping with a general tendency of political life nowadays. People used sometimes to talk about measures, not men; and sometimes to talk about men, not measures; but the latter principle seems at last to have won in a canter. And it follows, of course, that if the particular man, or men, gives a testimonial of fitness there's no more to be said. "Atheist? Not a bit of it," says Mr. Parnell; "Mr. McCarthy is a sound Christian and a good supporter of mine," and as Mr. Parnell no doubt knows his supporters even as the tribe of Flynns knew their own whisky skins, that part of the billet is undoubtedly correct. So the Bradford Caucus quarrels with Mr. Forster because he has not got a "bit paper," as they say in Scotland, countersigned by Mr. Gladstone, but, alas! something quite different. So did the Caucus of Brighton try to quarrel with Mr. Marriott because he hadn't a billet de confession stating that he was sound on the Chamberlain article of the Radical faith; but here, as all men know, events turned out unluckily for the quarrellers. In fact, if a public man nowadays is not well provided with billets of this kind, he "incurs the danger of a hysterical attack," as the admirable, the inimitable Paris Correspondent of the Times puts it, intimating that he, the correspondent, will tell the truth even if he incur that danger. By the way, this, we are told, should be understood to mean not that M. de Blowitz himself is after one of these exertions always in need of sal volatile and glasses of cold water, but that his brutal enemies attack him in a fashion suggesting hysteria on their part. An imperfect acquaintance with the English tongue, combined with a courageous indulgence in it, has rarely produced a pleasanter phrase. But this is by-the-bye.

To return to our billets. The importance of them nowadays is not likely to be questioned, but the very pleasing and humorous characteristic of their issue which the Parnell-McCarthy incident suggests, and which will be found confirmed in other cases, may be overlooked. You always get a man to give a certificate in something of which he has no professional knowledge. This is no new thing to the writers and readers of private testimonials. "Accident," says Dr. Smith, M.D., F.R.C.S., F.R.S., F.L.S., &c., "has prevented me from having express knowledge of my friend Mr. Brown's scientific acquirements, but as a whist-player I am in a position to say that he has few superiors." "As a change bowler," says the Rev. Mr. Birch, recommending his young friend Robinson to a school where the religious instruction of the pupils is mentioned in the circulars to parents as of first importance, "Mr. Robinson is invaluable." Thus, again, Mr. Gladstone, who has rarely been known to recommend a candidate for his skill as a woodcutter, will freely testify to his fitness to represent and defend the interests of England in Parliament; and Mr. Parnell, dimidium animæ of M. le Marquis de Rochefort-Luçay, is found favouring Mr. Justin Huntly McCarthy with a certificate of devout religious feeling. Very different from this unaccommodating conduct was the act of that editor of Elizabethan literature who was asked for a testimonial by a brother in the craft. "My dear Mr. ——," said the obliging scholar, "I have never read any of your editions, but I have been told by my friends that they are exceedingly bad." Political, and indeed social, life would become impossible if such conduct were largely imitated, and with party leaders it is clearly impossible. But Editor No. 2 made the glaring error of appealing to a man who knew, or who thought he knew, about the subject, and chose to have a conscience, or perhaps a spite. The proposed plan ably carried out by Messrs. Parnell and McCarthy excludes, as we see, this danger. When the system is better known and worked out there will no doubt be general testimonial-givers—official curés, to whom the political aspirant will go for his billet de confession. Leaders of parties, of course, have carte blanche to give it in everything; but a certain number of members of Parliament might be appointed by vote or ballot at the beginning of each Session to different departments of testimonial signing. Mr. Bradlaugh, whose qualifications for important branches of the business are obvious, is unfortunately disqualified by his anomalous status; but there are plenty of others. An intelligent candidate would of course be guided solely by the consideration of the persons to whom his testimonials were to be exposed. He would not take a billet signed by Sir Wilfrid Lawson to a place where the publican interest was all powerful. But into these minutiæ it is almost disrespectful to public good sense to enter.

With the aid of this system, combined with and grafted on the Implicit Confidence system and the Caucus, the path of the unintelligent elector who is about, it seems, to be multiplied to the extent of a million or two, becomes clear before him. If he is one of the lambs of the flock, he will of course vote for the candidate his Caucus sets before him, and ask no questions at all. "Only that, and nothing more," will suffice his sacred simplicity. But there are always people who want to know, and this troublesome vice—the malediction of our first mother—requires means to be taken to satisfy its cravings. The means are devised. "Now Hellier and Brook, A. mothed have took" (as a somewhat ungrammatical bard of Queen Anne's time sings of the good deeds of certain wine-merchants better known from the Spectator), to choke off the elector who shall be most set on heckling. Clearly he can only be curious about the past and the future conduct of the candidate; for, as has been well pointed out by philosophers, the present does not really count. For the future he has only got to ask, "Will you under all circumstances vote for Mr. Gladstone and for whatever he proposes?" At a distant—let us hope a far distant—time, it will be necessary to fill in some other name than Mr. Gladstone's; but that is evident. For the past (which includes the present) every candidate will be furnished with a neat livret of testimonials from the leaders of his party. The important constitutional ceremony of heckling will then go on after this fashion. First Elector: "What are your religious principles, sir?" (candidate turns up his livret and reads a certificate as above from Mr. Parnell). Second Elector: "Are you good across country?" (candidate turns up a certificate from, let us say, Mr. Richard). Third Elector: "Have you been vaccinated?" (candidate produces a medical certificate in due form, signed by Lord Hartington), and so on, and so on; all which cannot fail to satisfy the most inquisitive mind.

One thing, however, a controversy which went on some years ago may profitably impress on the mind. Old testimonials won't do. Suppose, for instance (it is of course the barest supposition), that Mr. Parnell, getting tired of the situation, should, as some Irish patriots have done before, take a peerage or the governorship of Coventry Island, or a chief justiceship from a base Saxon Government. Clearly his competence to testify to the state of soul of the Mr. McCarthys of the period would not really be affected; but it need hardly be said that the billet de confession would scarcely have the same effect on the enlightened constituency which Mr. McCarthy seeks to represent. Again, suppose that Mr. Gladstone, in or about the days of the famous Macaulay Essay, had given a testimonial to some youth of the time as to the general soundness of his opinions on Church and State, would that testimonial do now as a recommendation of the youth (now no longer such) to the Bradford Caucus? Alas! we trow not. So that it imports greatly, as Aristotle would say, not merely who signs the testimonial, but at what time it is signed, and in what circumstances and for what purpose. And, as false or lapsed testimonials have sometimes enabled persons of scant delicacy to obtain advantages in private life, the new system may have its disadvantages in public. For it would be extremely awkward, in some cases at least, to withdraw the testimony. Suppose (with apologies always for the supposition) that not Mr. Parnell, but Mr. McCarthy, were to fall from the purity of the Nationalist faith. That would not (at least technically) make him an Atheist; but how awkward for Mr. Parnell it would be! There are, however, difficulties in all things; and the great political principle of the time, that nobody is to think for himself on any account, being once established, political testimonials will, no doubt, play a large part in the politics of the future.

SCOTLAND YARD.

ALREADY the effect of the last experiment in the political uses of dynamite has become manifest. There is to be another overhauling of Scotland Yard, and once more the rude hand of reform is to be laid on the Criminal Investigation Department. It is announced that the office of Director, which Mr. Howard Vincent resigns, will not be filled up. The Chief Commissioner, acting under the Home Office, will, it is stated, in future have the whole control of the police; and it is proposed that he shall have a subordinate, an Assistant-Commissioner, appointed to keep an eye on the Detective Department. For this post there will be nominated one of the provincial Chief Constables—Colonel Dillon, doubtless a very meritorious officer though his name has not yet been associated with any very startling achievement in the tracing of crime. Mr. Jenkinson, whose importation from Ireland, where he had been highly successful in organizing the detective staff in Dublin, was expected to lead to great results, is to retain his position at the Home Office, where he will continue to direct the special detective staff charged with the investigation of "political crimes." An official explosion has therefore evidently followed the recent dynamite one in Scotland Yard, and the extinction of Mr. Vincent's meteoric career there has been taken as an opportunity for effecting another great change in the administration of the police.

We have never believed that the Detective Police could be made perfect by merely dismissing Mr. Vincent from his post. Though in one direction he was not successful, yet in others we have been always willing to admit that he did some excellent work. Shakspeare says, "Men shut their doors against the setting sun," and for some time past it has been the fashion for many people to close their eyes to much that ought in fairness to be set to Mr. Vincent's credit. There never was a greater mistake than to suppose that, because he had an exaggerated idea of the efficiency with which he protected life and property in London, he was an egregiously stupid person, though it may have suited some "interests" in Scotland Yard to spread abroad this erroneous belief. We should not forget that when Mr. Vincent entered this Department he found it a hot-bed of corruption. He cleansed it morally, as far as that could be done by mere human agency. He imparted to the service, of which he became the head, a higher and purer tone than had ever prevailed in it before. Not only did he stamp out that "blackmailing," the existence of which the famous Druscovitch trial revealed to us, but he positively humanized the system of criminal inspection and supervision, which previous to his time had been conducted with great harshness and sad want of tact. Mr. Vincent, in fact, during his term of administration, proved himself the possessor of many qualities which would have been invaluable in some other Department than that into which he was thrust. Indeed, if he enters Parliamentary life, his high capacity for certain kinds of official work will probably not be overlooked by the chiefs of his party; at least they will be blind to their interests and those of the country if they do overlook them. But with all his gifts Mr. Vincent, as we have before now regretfully complained, had not the gift of bringing criminals of more than average intelligence to justice; so we are not sorry that, like the "early, bright, and transient" being described by the poet Young, having for a brief time "sparkled" in his sphere, Mr. Vincent finally "was exhaled, and went to heaven"—the heaven, that is, of dignified retirement.

But what of those who are to take his place? What of the system which is again to make the "old soldier" element supreme in Scotland Yard? Why should it be supposed that the plan of vesting all supremacy in the Chief Commissioner will produce better results now, than in the days when the Detective Department had none of the autonomy it gained under Mr. Vincent, and when, under the very eyes of its military chiefs, clever rogues like Benson and Kurr boasted they had it in their pockets. In fact, ever since a humorous thief, with absolute impunity, stole the Order of the Bath from the manly bosom of one of the Commissioners of Police when assisting at a great public function, Londoners have rather lost faith in the native genius of these gorgeous officials for undertaking such prosaic work as criminal detection. The prevailing feeling, indeed, is that we want not a superannuated soldier, but a strong, shrewd, clear-headed, resolute, reticent civilian to act as a Minister of Police directly under Sir William Harcourt—that, in a word, we want a new stamp of man who can create a new system if need be—not the old stamp of retired military officer set to work a system which is neither exactly new or old, but which is most assuredly very far from being efficient. It seems to us, also, that the recent action of the Home Office justifies the existence of this feeling. When it became plain that the Criminal Investigation Department was unfit to deal with such crimes as those of the dynamitard, a new stamp of man was brought to supersede Mr. Vincent, and he, it appears, was permitted to organize quite a new system. However, Mr. Jenkinson and his system are to be confined, we are now told, to the investigation of "political crime," and we are to have thus organized a police within the police—a sort of inner circle of detectives, who take their orders not from the Colonels of Scotland Yard, but from Mr. Jenkinson in Whitehall. Mr. Vincent, in some of his writings on police administration, has assumed as a sort of administrative axiom that it is objectionable in England to form a State police. In fact, he shrewdly points out that the one strong argument against letting the Municipality of London have the control of the force is that, if they get it, we should have to raise a secret police for the special service of the Crown. But is that not just what is being done now by the Home Secretary—or rather by Mr. Jenkinson, acting under the Home Secretary's orders? If so, then we need hardly say that it will be very easy indeed for Mr. Firth and his friends to put Sir William Harcourt in a somewhat awkward position, when the question of police control comes up for discussion in the forthcoming debates on the Government of London Bill. Members in favour of the Bill will say, "You can no longer object to give the new London Municipality the right to manage the police, for you have already created your own State police under Mr. Jenkinson, and the only good argument against the municipal administration of the force was that, if it were conceded, a secret State police would have to be formed." For this reason, then, it would surely have been better if Mr. Jenkinson had been appointed to an office of general rather than special supervision, especially in view of the increasing difficulty of dealing with such crimes as those of the dynamitards, which demand skilfully combined action on the part of every branch of the detective service throughout the country. We say Mr. Jenkinson, because, from his having been already trusted with the business of tracing out the highest class of criminals, and partly because of what we have heard of his career in India and Ireland, we take his competence for granted. Indeed, it must strike every unprejudiced person as an utterly illogical thing to say that, because Mr. Jenkinson is exceptionally clever as a Director of Criminal Investigation, he must be limited to the investigation of one class of crimes, and that, by the way, one which is not common, and which we hope will not long continue to vex us.

But, whatever arrangements may be made, we can only repeat what we have frequently urged before—that none will satisfy the public so long as there is any reason to suppose that the system which has failed is to all intents and purposes retained and worked by the same sort of men as those who have broken down. The whole question of reorganizing the Detective Police force in Scotland Yard, and co-ordinating its functions and working with those of the provincial forces, is ripe for settlement. It can only be settled by somebody who will bring to it a mind absolutely fresh, daring, and original, and who is quite free from those curious insular prejudices and traditions, which insist on imposing purely physical tests on candidates for detective service, and according to which nobody but a promoted constable can be a competent detective. Crime is getting to be too common and too far-reaching in its results for us to let the authorities at Scotland Yard trifle with it as they have been doing. Some day the dynamitard will acquire a little more scientific knowledge. Then he will most likely succeed in his next experiment; and, when he has produced a passable imitation of a massacre, the work of police reorganization that might be done now by Mr. Jenkinson, quietly and coolly, will perhaps be taken in hand. But in that case it will be done in a panic, and therefore done badly. The increasing skill of the criminal, and the selfish apathy of the public, who do not band themselves with sufficient heartiness against him as hostis humani generis, is rendering detective investigation more and more difficult every day. Tentando ad Trojam venere Pelasgi, and Mr. Jenkinson is in some respects quite as tenacious of purpose and dogged in determination as the besiegers of Troy. He, too, may perhaps with patience and hard trying force the citadel of secresy, in which the hired assassins of American Fenianism entrench themselves. But, though we cherish this hope, we cannot but believe that his task is not facilitated by the fact that the whole Detective Department of Scotland Yard is in a state closely resembling disorganization, and that he has neither over it, nor over the local detective forces in the country, the same authority which a real Minister of Police ought to wield. If he had, doubtless the Harpocratean rose, which he has apparently hung up in his own office, would not be undiscoverable in the Department of Criminal Investigation in Scotland Yard, and the officials there might work not the less efficiently that they were compelled to toil in self-effacing silence, shut off from the admiring gaze of the public and the press. The matter may be summed up thus. The old system was one which organized a detective force out of promoted policemen and retired military officers. That broke down. Then it was supposed that if we "weeded" the force—in other words, put the few clever but undoubtedly corrupt men in it in prison, and set a bright young barrister, with no official experience, but with a charming manner, a great flow of animal spirits, and a remarkable command of foreign languages, at the head of the residual staff of dullards—the criminal classes would capitulate. That system has gone to pieces with the blowing up of Mr. Howard Vincent's office. Now we are to go back to something perilously like the old system—that of working with promoted policemen under a respectable military man—with this difference, that his force will be even feebler than the old one, because Baron Pollock and Mr. Vincent between them felt it necessary in the interests of morality to eliminate from it talent when dissociated from integrity. The new force will be respectable perhaps, but it will be dull. Her Majesty's Judges will probably not have to deprive the country of the services of its more brilliant members, for none of its members will be brilliant. In fact it needs no extraordinary gift of prophecy to foretell the result of this or any other "reform" in the police which does not proceed on the lines we have indicated—which does not set at the head of the whole department a strong civilian with official experience, and give him a free hand.

MME. SARAH BERNHARDT'S LADY MACBETH.

IT is a little late in the day to discuss the merits of Mme. Sarah Bernhardt's acting generally. In England and in America society and the daily press, which half leads and half follows it, have for some time accepted her at her own valuation, which has not erred upon the side of modesty. To quiet observers, the difference in the tone of French criticism upon her various histrionic performances, on the stage and off it, suggests amusing thoughts enough, with the delightful undercurrent of French irony which runs through it all. Her own people, indeed, have probably estimated the actress at very much her true value, which was not small. They remember her as in early days a distinguished member of the excellent Français company, of much talent, and with the promise of more. When Mmes. Croizette and Bernhardt played together in the Sphinx, and the terrible death-scene of the former was the talk of Paris, it was nevertheless generally felt that but for that scene the acting of Mme. Bernhardt carried the palm. Then she touched a higher point. Her performance in the Fille de Roland was very fine; so were her earlier performances of Phèdre, which distinctly degenerated afterwards. In other plays, especially where she had to stand comparison with earlier interpreters, in the best critical judgment she has not held her own. It is a mistake to say that comparison is an unfair test, for it is sometimes the best test of all. It is a comparatively easy thing to shine in an original character, especially in one written expresely for the artist (as was the case with Fedora), which, in the ludicrous assumptions of the theatrical dictionary, he or she is said to "create"—meaning, of course, that the artist is the first to have the advantage of interpreting the author's creation. It is harder by force of talent to efface or to rival the memories of others. When Mme. Bernhardt played Adrienne Lecouvreur she failed to make us forget Mme. Favart's more artistic work, to say nothing of the traditions of Rachel. When she essayed Frou-Frou, she left us nothing but newer and fresher regrets for the incomparable Desclée. Genius is a rare plant everywhere; rarest of all upon the stage, the art being merely mimetic; though nowhere more than on the stage is the fine word thrown about more recklessly. Not in our time has it been more applicable than to Desclée. Where others may have touches of genius, here was the thing itself. And Desclée and Frou-Frou are an inseparable memory. The comedy itself is one of the truest and most subtle of modern times, in its startling elaboration of the character of the woman of highly-wrought nerves, the true and striking product of the age. And in her various eccentricities Mme. Bernhardt has not distinguished herself more than in informing an "interviewer," as it is reported of her that she did, that she was not at her ease in Frou-Frou, because she felt the part to be so much "au dessous d'elle!" Desclée did not regard in that light the best work of MM. Meilhac and Halévy. It is true that she was not much interviewed.

Mme. Bernhardt has now broken Shakspearian ground, and appeared as the heroine of a very strange translation of a very noble play, now to be accepted under the singular designation of Muck-a-bet. At the risk of encountering all the stereotyped adulation which no doubt will greet—has indeed already begun to greet—the latest version of that terrible poet-sample of feminine undaunted mettle, we must venture to express, having seen the performance at the Porte St.-Martin on the fourth or fifth night, a frank and grave opinion. The surroundings of Mme. Bernhardt are in this case very much against her. Through some quarrel or difficulty which has been much written of in the French papers, she has not appeared, as originally intended, in a free poetical rendering of the play by M. Lacroix (by him transferred to the Odéon), but in a literal—very oddly literal—prose translation by her own poet, M. Richepin, the author-actor of Nana-Sahib. It would not be fair to call the translation bad, curiously as it sometimes reminds one of the gentleman who undertook to transfer Hamlet into French vernacular prose, and accordingly reproduced the Prince's greeting to his father's spirit, "Angels and ministers of grace defend us!" as "Tiens! qu'est que c'est que ça?" After all, that is very much what a modern French Hamlet, as according to Partridge, would say under the circumstances. M. Richepin has done his best to preserve the imagery; but a literal translation of a great poem, with all the poetry left out, is in itself a sin; and such a sentence as "Comme un rat sans queue, je ferai, et je ferai, et je ferai," is very unimpressive indeed. Ab uno disce omnia. The Witches' mixture for the cauldron, purposely but fiercely grotesque in Shakspeare's magic hands, becomes amazingly funny in M. Richepin's prose. "Sir," said an enthusiastic box-keeper during the run of M. Fechter's Hamlet at the Princess's (a very fine and thoughtful performance, be it said, which we have no wish to depreciate), "'Amlet used to be a tragedy with Mr. Kean and Mr. Macready. Mr. Fetcher, sir, has raised it to a mellerdram." M. Richepin has raised Muck-a-bet to another; and an odd one it is. It is arranged in nine "tableaux," with waits between, in order that the high treason of "changing the scenes in sight of the audience" may be avoided according to the modest Pineronian receipt. Muck-a-bet has obviously passed through the ubiquitous fingers of some Gallic Mr. Pinero; and in the further absence of all orchestral music of any kind, the effect becomes almost madly depressing. We had nightmares till the morning, much aggravated by the astounding aspect of the French ghosts and witches. They had but one trapdoor between them, wherewith to do all the necessary spiriting. The three Witches walked on and off in quite a mortal way; and when they desired to impress Muck-a-bet, they merely joined hands round him and put him in the middle, and danced "Round and round the mulberry-tree," about the great Cowdore. In that confined space, in the full costume of a modern Highlander outside a tobacconist's shop, the noble Thane looked exceedingly uncomfortable, and very little else. The Ghost of Banquo failed to redeem the spiritual situation. In this world a decidedly fat man, he had had no time to lose flesh in the next, before he rose through that trapdoor into the middle of the dinner-table, with nothing to distinguish him from the rest of the company but a profusion of disagreeable red lines about his face to represent wounds, which much moved us to address him in the language of Mr. Burnand's Stage-Dora, as "Sealing-Wax." The audience giggled at him a good deal, and the audience, on the night when we were present, was conspicuous by the absence of all social or literary distinction. Like the performance, it was unmitigated Surrey. When a Parisian actress secedes from the Français, French intelligence remains with the Français, and leaves the seceder. "Flean," as the bills called him, was visible only in the bills. The Second Murderer caused some laughter by lending a repentant hand to remove the furniture. Macbeth, when his wife left him, clenched his teeth and gnashed them, threw out his right arm, danced on his right foot, and settled himself on his left, rolled his eyes, and said, "Est-ce un poignard?" precisely as we knew he would. Macbeth might have been Macduff, or Macduff Banquo, or Lennox any of them, for any distinction whatever between their characters or styles of recitation. There was no single glimpse of acting from the beginning of the performance to the end. "I can get this sort of thing from the Britannia at any time, sir," said an angry manager to an expensive lover, "for forty shillings a week."

How far Mme. Bernhardt herself may be responsible for the general effect of such an exhibition as this, it would be idle to inquire. Neither reason nor experience, we suppose, will ever dispel the histrionic theory that a star shines the brighter for a surrounding of night-lights. Yet her early successes at the Français, with the Delaunays and Mounet-Sullys to act with, might have taught Mme. Bernhardt a better wisdom; and the power of evenness has never been more clearly shown than of late, in bringing into relief the merit of an individual performance.

Mme. Marie Roze's beautiful and poetic Carmen, for instance, at Drury Lane, a study clearly inspired by Mérimée rather than his librettists, was all the more significant for the equal merit of the whole representation of Bizet's opera.

The interest of the performance at the Porte St.-Martin, of course, lay in what Mme. Sarah Bernhardt might make of Lady Macbeth. This much justice may at least be done her, that she has in no way attempted to alter the balance of the characters. She is not ambitious to emulate the side-lights which another foreign player has been good enough to throw upon Shakspeare's tragedy. If Signor Salvini has naïvely announced that the sleep-walking scene ought to be taken out of Lady Macbeth's part and given to Macbeth, Mme. Bernhardt might have retaliated by transferring the scene over the Witches' cauldron from the Thane to herself. The psychological meanings which some critics love to look for might be argued either way, though we doubt if Shakspeare ever distressed himself much by speculations on psychology. But, for the rest, Shakspeare at his greatest being here in question, it must be plainly said, by us at least, that Mme. Bernhardt's acting is throughout but too well in keeping with the tone of her surroundings. It is becoming painfully clear to quiet and watchful observers and lovers of the drama, whom the blare of modern trumpetry fails to deafen or disturb, that the Nemesis of the new school is following hard on the actress's heels, and that in the hands of those who persistently give up to advertisement what was meant for art, the signs of art may degenerate very fast. We could wish that others might be warned in time. From the first moment of her appearance, reading Macbeth's letter, Mme. Bernhardt strikes at once her shrillest and highest key. From that moment forwards there is neither change, nor relief, nor light. With her husband there is no touch of love or tenderness; with her guests there is no sign of dignity or grace; in her own reflections there is neither reticence nor stay. She plays second murderer throughout to Macbeth's first; and the two together might figure as the centre of some police-court story of Whitechapel assassination. To colour their hands an obtrusive and unpleasant red, in emulation of poor Banquo's roomy visage, appears to be with them the main purpose of the scene. Even the repulsive and unsuitable dress which it pleases Mme. Bernhardt to wear is, we regret to say, an offence which in such a character an artist should have shunned. In the touchstone of the part, the sleep-walking scene, Mme. Bernhardt's failure seemed to us the most complete. The traditions of that scene are old and true, and to be remembered by ourselves not only in Mme. Ristori's stately power, but in the artistic self-restraint of our own Mrs. Crowe and Mrs. Vezin. Mme. Bernhardt seems to wish to play the scene anew, and plays it like a Mænad, or, to give a closer parallel, like an operatic star in the gambols of the Somnambula. She tears the passion all to pieces, and ends by rushing wildly off the stage, waving her hands about her head. Her gestures, indeed, throughout the whole play are more those of the amateur than the actress, wearisome and monotonous from their entire want of repose, as if she had unlearned the very rudiments of the art which she once promised to interpret both modestly and well. With her right hand she ceaselessly saws the air, and with the left she clutches the bosom of her peculiar tunic, in a fashion in which a pupil of Mrs. Stirling or Mr. Vezin would not long be allowed to indulge. Mme. Bernhardt has a great power of recuperation: and we sincerely hope that she will reconsider her Lady Macbeth carefully and thoroughly before she presents it to the countrymen of Shakspeare. If she does not, we should not be surprised to find that in this instance the usual puffs preliminary have missed their mark. For when things are at the worst they mend; and we believe that there are signs abroad that the advertising mania in matters of art is trying the patience of the world too far. The natural result of the desire of every aspirant to outstrip his predecessor is already visible on half the hoardings of London. Mme. Bernhardt, mercifully, still confines herself to the modest proportion of the photographer's window, and we are spared the fear of a life-sized Lady Macbeth to herald her upon her way among the attractions of soaps, mustards, electric belts, and Claudian. Mr. Barrett is so earnest in his artistic ambition, and himself so sound an actor of poetic drama (many remember his "Mercutio" as among the best of recent Shakspearian pictures), that it is the more to be regretted that he should treat poetical plays in this fashion. We sincerely believe that there must soon be an end of all this, and with what patience we may command we are content to look for it.

THE UNIVERSITIES AND THE LONDON POOR.

IN an article last week on "Underground London" we referred incidentally to the advantage which would accrue from young Oxford and Cambridge graduates going to live among the poor at the East End of London. But the matter is one which will bear further treatment, in view of the organized efforts which are now happily being made at both Universities to promote this object; and we propose to put before our readers some information about it. They may not improbably have observed the report some three weeks ago of a large meeting of graduates and undergraduates in the Guildhall at Cambridge, under the chairmanship of Mr. Seeley, Professor of Modern History, when Prince Albert Victor of Wales made his first public appearance as a speaker, amid general applause. But Oxford was earliest in the field in taking up the scheme, and we may therefore, before proceeding to notice the recent move at Cambridge, say something of what had previously been designed and achieved under the auspices of the sister University. A Committee of Oxford graduates and undergraduates was formed last year in order "to assist and concentrate the work of University men among the London poor," on which appear the names of two Heads of Houses—the Wardens of All Souls and Keble—and several Fellows and Tutors of different Colleges. The programme defines their aim to be to form a permanent connexion with some parish or mission district in one of the poorer parts of London, where a House might be founded as a centre of religious and social work among the labouring and artisan classes. This house would become the residence of University graduates willing to live there and give either their whole time, or such portion of it as they could spare from professional or business engagements, to this kind of work, while it would also afford a meeting-place for others who could come and help on certain evenings in the week, and would receive undergraduates for a similar purpose during vacations. As regards the ecclesiastical position of the new institute, it was suggested that it might at first be placed under the general direction of the Vicar, but in the hope of its ultimately having a head of its own, whether lay or clerical. And as to the sort of work contemplated, we cannot do better than quote the words of the Prospectus:—

> The methods open to such a band of workers would include the management of boys' and men's clubs and institutes; teaching in day and Sunday schools; classes, lectures, temperance work, and conducting or assisting in services in mission-rooms, and elsewhere. Besides this, much might be done by friendly and social intercourse with labourers and artisans, and by promoting and managing entertainments. The work would not necessarily be confined to the parish, but would include the serving on Committees of Sanitary Aid, Charity Organization Society, Kyrle Society, &c.

It was added that, while the parish, as its religious centre, would give it that definitely Christian character in which the workers would find their strongest bond of union, "its independence of the ordinary parochial organization would give them easier access to certain kinds of work, and admit the co-operation of any University men feeling a desire to make themselves more closely acquainted with the condition of the poor, and to give personal service in making their lives happier and better." A later manifesto of the Executive Committee states that they have selected for starting their plan the parish of St. Andrew's, Bethnal Green, containing some 13,000 inhabitants, chiefly well-to-do and intelligent artisans living in large blocks of model dwelling-houses. To the charge of this parish the Bishop of Bedford, after consulting the Committee, has appointed the Rev. G. W. Knight Bruce, of Merton College, who has let to them a disused National School, large enough to hold five residents, besides ample room for entertainments, classes, &c.; and three men have already arranged to commence residence there next September, while twelve more have promised occasional assistance in various branches of the work. There is however much further need both of personal service and of funds, for which subscriptions and donations are asked. We learn also from one of the Secretaries, the Rev. W. J. Campion, of Keble, that Magdalen College intends to start a branch house in connexion with the central one at Bethnal Green, which will be in Burdett Road, Stepney, and will carry on its work in co-operation with Mr. Dolling—a hard-working and energetic young clergyman, of Trinity College, Cambridge—who has lately started a mission there. There is also an Oxford settlement of the kind, under the headship of Mr. Barnett, in Whitechapel. As regards particular details of the work to be done, a list of suggestions has been put forward by the Oxford Committee, who appeal for the aid of those willing to offer it in any of the following ways:—

(1) taking lodgings in the House in Bethnal Green;
(2) working in Clubs or Schools on Sundays or on certain evenings in the week;
(3) giving occasional help at concerts, entertainments, &c., or on Bank holidays;
(4) giving lectures or addresses or conducting classes, either on secular or religious subjects;
(5) assisting in Mission Services;
(6) promoting Co-operative Stores;
(7) serving on local committees of School Management, Sanitary Aid, Charity Organization Society, &c.;
(8) conducting parties over museums, picture-galleries, &c.;
(9) contributions.

We have here, it will be allowed, the outlines of a sensible and practical scheme, the actual operation of which must of course necessarily depend very largely on the character and capacities of those engaged in carrying it out, but which—like the Public Schools Missions, to which we called attention not long ago, and partly on the same lines—can hardly fail to be productive of very beneficial results. If it merely served to bridge over in some measure the chasm which too often divides class from class, as by the impassable barriers of an Indian caste, that would alone be no inconsiderable gain. But, while that must be the essential preliminary and condition of successful work, it will be the beginning and not the end of the good likely to be accomplished. Many of our readers are no doubt familiar with a significant passage in Stanley's Life of Arnold, describing how, on going to Rugby, he began to win the sympathy and confidence of his boys. "'He calls us fellows,' was the astonished expression of the boys, when, soon after his first coming, they heard him speak of them by the familiar name in use among themselves; and in his later years they observed with pleasure the unaffected interest with which, on the long autumn afternoons, he would often stand in the school-field and watch the issue of their favourite games of football." The same principle applies mutatis mutandis to the case before us. It is by a manifestation of "unaffected interest" and sympathy on the part of those who are their social and intellectual superiors —not by the sort of condescension which, as we have seen it expressed somewhere, treats their children as "the young of the poor"—that the hearts of the artisan or lower classes will be won and influenced for good. And how greatly such influence is needed, to do what it would be worse than folly to look for as the result of mere school teaching, is sufficiently illustrated in the case mentioned by an East End clergyman, whose testimony we cited last week, of "one of the most hopeless gamins" he had ever come across, who had passed the Fifth Standard, and, like hundreds of other boys, could find no better use for his newly-acquired art of reading than to devour a literature as vile in its moral tone as it is in its political aspect subversive of the elementary principles which hold society together. It may be feared that such juvenile editions of "the Artful Dodger" are to be counted not by hundreds but by thousands among the street arabs of our great cities. This view of the exigencies of the case was evidently present to the minds of those who took part in the representative meeting held the other day at Cambridge, to organize for that University a share in the same great enterprise which had been already taken up at Oxford. It found more or less articulate expression, so far as we can judge from the report, in all the speeches delivered, but was especially accentuated by the Chairman and by Prince Albert Victor.

Professor Seeley began by insisting on "how little they"—Cambridge men—"knew of the lives and wants of the labouring class and the class just above them," and the great "gulf" which separated the rich and comfortable from the poor. He referred to the Working Men's College in Red Lion Square, established thirty years ago by the late F. D. Maurice—whom an ingenious instructor of public opinion calls "Mr. Morris"—where Cambridge graduates often used to work; and he pointed out how "Mr. Maurice used to insist on the incalculable importance of personal sympathy, of helping the poor not only by teaching them, but by living with and among them." He considered that "the present schemes had substantially the same object, and were successive waves in the old tide, which was always impelling the Universities to throw themselves into the gulf between the rich and poor." Mr. Gell remarked that the whole system of self-government in England was based on the assumption of the existence of a leisurely class, who would undertake the responsibilities their busier brethren could not enter upon; but in East London there was no such resident class, and hence the importance on social grounds of providing it from without. Professor Stuart, who followed him, urged the members of his own University to co-operate with Oxford in this most beneficial work for improving the moral and physical condition of the inhabitants of East London, and explained that "what they had to do for the poor, the unhappy, the destitute, the powerless, among whom they might be placed, was to endeavour to make them capable and make them feel capable," for it was on the capability of the masses that the security of the country in the future and the safeguard against revolution depended. Prince Albert Victor, who made the closing speech, once more emphasized the point that all such help should be "given in a brotherly spirit," and that help so given "not only blesses him who receives, but also him who gives," and he went on to notice the necessity "for building up a healthy commonwealth, that all classes or parties, whether political or religious, should join and unite together in the attempt to better not only each other, but the whole." On these grounds, and because the proposed movement would serve to make our fellow-countrymen in the East of London "worthier citizens, not only of the great metropolis, but also of our wider England," it had his heartiest sympathy. That such an expression of hearty sympathy should be uttered by Prince Albert Victor is in itself both of hopeful augury and of present significance as a moral fact. The late Duke of Albany is well known to have taken a warm personal interest in all philanthropic movements of this kind, and it is on every ground matter of sincere satisfaction that a similar feeling should be exhibited by the younger generation of the Royal family. Noblesse oblige, is a good old proverb, which can least of all be safely ignored in an aristocratic country like England, and by none can its teaching be more fitly and persuasively enforced than by the heir or the occupant of a throne.

THE PICTURE GALLERIES.—V.

THE multiplication of small galleries is a feature of the day not to be lightly condemned. True, to the critic who feels it incumbent on him, if possible, to visit everything, good or bad, great or small, it is an evil. He is driven, the sport of chance, from east to west, and from north to south, and never finds his toil at an end until the end of all things comes with August. There is an interesting but fleeting show at Christie's, and if he misses it for one week, he is sure to miss the thing of all others he wanted to see. There are constant additions and re-arrangements at the National Gallery, and also miles away at South Kensington; there is the National Portrait Gallery, always receiving some new head; and, in addition to such comparatively permanent institutions, there are pitfalls for his feet in almost every second shop in Bond Street, and all about Piccadilly and Pall Mall; while during the last few weeks two exhibitions, both of which must be noticed now, have broken out in the City. There is also an "International" picture gallery at the Crystal Palace, which we must leave, with several others, to a future occasion.

The modern style of wood engraving has been assisted in a way it could have little expected by photography. It used to be said when the collodion process came first into vogue that art, especially the art of illustrating books, was going to die. Yet the result has falsified all anticipations. Photography has given a stimulus as refreshing as it was unexpected to wood engraving. The artist is no longer compelled to make a troublesome drawing backwards on a block of boxwood. He can draw straightforwardly, as he pleases himself, on white or toned paper, in lines or in tints. His liberty, in short, is doubled, and with it his ease and correctness. The beautiful woodcuts with which the Magazine of Art and some other publications of Messrs. Cassell are illustrated are photographed from the artists' drawings on the wood, and so engraved without risk or injury to the drawing. Moreover, if it should be a convenience to the artist, he can make his drawing of any size he pleases. Some drawings in the "Black and White Exhibition" at La Belle Sauvage Yard are perhaps 20 inches by 18. But the illustrations from them are 10 by 9, or even in some cases 5 by 4½. Occasionally something is lost by this process, but its convenience is indubitable. Mr. Seymour's beautiful sketches of Thames scenery are well worth a journey to Ludgate. The amount of tint this accomplished artist can get out of black and white is marvellous. The exquisite depth of shadowy trees against a well-lighted sky cannot, of course, be rendered by any wood engraving, however subtle, and had we not seen the original drawings, we should have wholly missed it. A little view of Ely, by Mr. Barraud, is also very pleasing, and seems to come nearest to Mr. Seymour's work. Mr. A. W. Henley exhibits a group of young trees, such as we see in a French forest, a fir behind throwing up the silvery branches of a birch which leaves nothing to be desired. Mr. Nash's "Yachting" is enough to cure ladies who wish to tempt the dangers of the deep on a wet deck without any perceptible bulwark. This is a spirited drawing. Mr. Barclay's sketches in Algiers will not disappoint any one who knows them already by the woodcuts. Miss Mary Gow contributes some delicate and refined female heads, of a stronger character in point of modelling than we usually expect from the hands of lady artists. We have only noticed what we could praise. There are, no doubt, some poor and weak drawings among the nearly three hundred exhibited; but where so much is good there is no object to be gained by finding fault. It is not possible to imagine an exhibition more likely to be useful and instructive to the young artist or amateur who wishes to see how woodcuts are produced; and it should be mentioned both that admission is free, and also that all the drawings are for sale. Another year we hope Messrs. Cassell will see their way to printing a catalogue. The critic is somewhat impeded in his work when he has to make his own.

Another exhibition in the City does not, strictly speaking, come under the head of "Picture Galleries," but must be noticed here. The Company of Carpenters have a fine hall in London Wall, and have assembled there a most interesting gathering of "Works in Wood." The term is comprehensive enough to include furniture, architectural models and drawings, with wood-carving and joinery. We need only notice the carvings, which show a surprising amount of technical skill, with a certain indefinable want of artistic knowledge. The first prize in this department goes, we think rightly, to Mr. James Osmond, who has not been content with skill only in his treatment of decorative panels, but has also studied style to a fair extent. His carved oak is very beautiful. It required professional knowledge to see the difference between the work of Mr. Anthony Smith and that of Mr. W. G. James. The silver medal goes to the former for his "Ornamental Carved Panel." Some of the inlay work is very fine, but more attention appears to be attracted to imitations of nature which cannot be considered good art. There is a dead bird, hung from a nail by a string, all, bird, nail, and string, wonderfully cut, but the result is simply curious. This example, which looks very fresh and new, was carved by Dremontrieul, who is believed to have been employed by Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette. Among his modern imitators is Mr. W. F. Jenkins, who contributes a marvellous group of sparrows, "The First Flight," and a dead robin, "The Minstrel's Last Lay," lying in a mossy recess surrounded by peeping flowers. These works are absolutely natural as a bird-stuffer's work is natural, and we may wonder at them if we cannot quite praise them. Perhaps the most extraordinary of them all is the representation of a spray of beech-leaves, by Mr. D. Maver, who has obtained a silver medal in this department. Not only are the leaves undercut so as to look exactly like nature, but they are crumpled and lined so as to show that they are not living but withered. There is some excellent work by the veteran Mr. Rogers, and the visitor should not miss the old furniture, some of it the property of the Company.

Returning westward, we may notice three exhibitions more for this week. At the Dudley Gallery may be seen some fine "pictures and sculpture by a group of artists of the French school." Among them perhaps some large pastel drawings by M. de Nittis will attract the most attention. The artist is best known for very minute and small work, and these three pictures, representing respectively scenes "During the Race," "Around the Stove," and "In the Tribune," will surprise his old admirers by their force and boldness, as well as by their life-sized proportions. Mr. Henry Gervex's "First Communion" has been bought by the State, but to the English critic the subject wants the devotional spirit, and is a mere fashion-picture—finely and boldly painted, of course, and with the knowledge and skill that have in too many cases to do duty for taste in French contemporary art. The central picture in the room is M. Bonnat's "Victor Hugo," which is beyond or above criticism, and will be visited by all who wish to see that happiest and rarest conjunction—a great sitter worthily matched by a great portrait-painter. There are also works by MM. Flameng, Montenard, Roll, Tavernier, Ribot, and other well-known and popular artists. Another small exhibition is at the rooms of the Fine Art Society, 148 New Bond Street. This is described as "One Hundred Paintings and Drawings by One Hundred Artists." The idea is an excellent one, as there is no repetition, and most of the works are small. Too many, however, have a look of being mere studies or sketches; and we need only notice those which appear to deserve the name of pictures. The most conspicuous, perhaps, is a half-length nude study, "Psyche Bound in the House of Venus," by Mr. John Collier, which is a first-rate example of his powers, bright, soft, and pretty, as well as powerful and learned in the modelling. "Fairlie Roads and the Little Cumbrae," on the Clyde, by Mr. Brett, will be much admired. It is less laboured than some of the artist's older pictures, but none the less true in effect. "The Last Mill at Pont Aven," by Mr. Adrian Stokes, will be thought by most people very superior to his disappointing Academy picture of this year. Mrs. Alma-Tadema shows a charming little work, "A Naughty Child." The culprit stands with her face in the corner, so that we can judge at leisure of the delicate harmonies of her elaborate old-fashioned dress. Miss Dorothy Tennant comes out in a vein unknown to us before. "A Weight of Care" shows a child with a baby in her little arms, endeavouring to hold an umbrella over her sleeping charge. There are comedy and pathos in the picture in a high degree, though it is only a few inches square. Miss Tennant should be encouraged to try some higher flight. "In Doubt," by Mr. F. Morgan, would do for the illustration of a popular ballad. The gentleman "over the garden wall" has proposed, and the lady on this side has not made up her mind to have him. Mr. H. Moore's "Off Dodman's Head—Coast of Cornwall" is a typical example of his style. The running water is full of motion. Mr. Calderon sends "A Rose of Provence," which might for a moment be mistaken for the work of De Blaas. The face is lovely. Mr. MacWhirter's "Coast of Arran" is very superior to his Academy picture. One of the prettiest of the water-colours is Mr. Phené Spiers's "Canterbury Cathedral from the Dean's Garden." The modern Deanery is on the site of the Prior's House, and it might almost be imagined that the successive priors grouped the vast crowd of buildings so as to look best from their own windows. Mrs. Cecil Lawson's "Purple Iris" is a finely coloured and bold study. Mr. C. Gregory's "Water Lane," a causeway on which two pretty girls pass while an old woman in a cart is fording the brook which crosses the lane, forms a very pleasing combination of landscape and figure. Mrs. Allingham's "Eleanor" is very pleasing, but is not very much the kind of work which we know and like as here. A small, fine, sunny, and, artistically speaking, large drawing is Mr. Albert Goodwin's "Assisi." The last drawing we can notice in the Fine Art Society's "century" is one of the highly finished, careful, and uncompromisingly truthful pictures of Portuguese life and scenery which Mr. Tristram Ellis has brought home from Cintra. The clear bright air of the sunny south, the brown-faced peasant folk, and the gorgeous wealth of vegetation are admirably rendered in "Going to Work."

One very small exhibition must have a paragraph to itself. Mr. Lefevre shows at his Gallery in King Street, St. James's, Mlle. Rosa Bonheur's latest bull's head, the "Lord of the Herd," a splendidly lifelike study; Mr. Alma-Tadema's "Parting Kiss," a Pompeian lady bidding farewell to her boy as he goes forth to school, a chariot waiting at the door, and a grand street view beyond; and Mr. John Collier's portrait of Mr. Alma-Tadema himself, who is represented standing before the half-finished canvas of "Hadrian in Britain," now one of the chief ornaments of the exhibition of the Royal Academy. The combination of three such artists and three such pictures makes this little gallery more attractive than many a larger one.

MUSIC IN CHANCERY.

LET the Philistine rejoice and be glad. Already happy in the assurance that Baron Huddleston, a British jury, the Court of Appeal, Sir Robert Peel, and the House of Lords think very little of the opinion in matters of sculpture of the Royal Academy in general, and Sir Frederick Leighton in particular, he is now still further gratified by the knowledge that the Chancery Division of the High Court shares some of his views. For Mr. Justice Pearson has formally announced his opinion that "some of the best music we have at this moment is Mendelssohn's 'Lieder ohne Worte.'" And while this sentiment will be heartily echoed by the lovers of old-fashioned music, the disciples of the advanced school may congratulate themselves on a legal victory gained by one of their foremost champions. The trial in the course of which the obiter dictum in question was pronounced was, in many respects, a curious one. The plaintiffs were Messrs. Boosey & Co., the well-known firm of musical publishers, and the defendant was practically Dr. Stanford, the equally well-known English composer, though the nominal defendant was Herr Franke, under whose direction the present series of German operas is being produced at Covent Garden. The story of the litigation, briefly told, is as follows. In 1881 Mr. Boosey, having already published the music of an opera by Dr. Stanford, was naturally anxious not to let any opportunity of doing similar business escape. Hearing that Dr. Stanford was composing another opera, he therefore wrote to him and requested that he should be allowed to publish it when it was finished. A brief negotiation terminated in the following arrangement. Mr. Boosey bought from Dr. Stanford the English copyright in the music of the opera Savonarola for 1,000*l.* If the opera was first produced in London the price was to be paid upon its production. If, on the other hand, it was first produced abroad, half the price was to be paid "on production," and the other half upon its first performance in London. But while the copyright of the music was sold to Mr. Boosey, the right of representing it was expressly reserved to Dr. Stanford in the letters which constituted the contract. If the matter had stood there, no question could ever have arisen, and Dr. Stanford would have been spared the annoyance of litigation. But, unfortunately for himself, he recommended Mr. Gilbert A'Beckett, who had undertaken the duty of furnishing the libretto of the opera, to make his own terms with Mr. Boosey. Accordingly Mr. A'Beckett sold to Mr. Boosey the copyright of the libretto, reserving to himself "the right of translation" and "Continental rights." In process of time score and book of the opera were both complete; and Dr. Stanford thought fit, as his agreement with Mr. Boosey had contemplated that he might, to produce Savonarola for the first time in Germany. Accordingly, having procured a German translation of Mr. A'Beckett's libretto, he went in the spring of this year to Hamburg, where the opera was produced with the greatest possible success, and Mr. Boosey thereupon paid his first instalment of 500*l.* in pursuance of his agreement. Dr. Stanford then arranged with Herr Franke that the opera should be performed at Covent Garden on the 18th of June, the German version of the libretto being used. Mr. Boosey asserted that this was an interference with his rights, and brought his action for an injunction to restrain Herr Franke from giving his performance next week as advertised. Now it was clear that, as between Dr. Stanford and Mr. Boosey, the publisher had nothing to complain of. Mr. Boosey had bought the copyright, apart from the right of representation, for 1,000*l.*, of which he had paid only half. He had expressly agreed to pay the other half as soon as the opera should be performed in London. If Dr. Stanford had chosen to bring it out in London originally, Mr. Boosey would have had to pay his 1,000*l.* all at once; therefore it would seem that he ought to have been grateful for the delay which enabled him to keep half the price for a time in his own pocket. But it seems rather to have occurred to Mr. Boosey that an opera cannot be performed without a libretto, and that the libretto of this particular opera was his, and that he would object to its publication. Accordingly he applied to Mr. Justice Pearson for an injunction to restrain Herr Franke from producing the opera. In the first place, he had to contend that his purchase of Mr. A'Beckett's libretto had given him copyright in the German translation of it. This raised rather a nice point of law, but one which it did not turn out to be necessary for the Judge to decide. Thus, he argued, the libretto being his, the opera was his in so far as it was a drama, and the right of representing it as a drama with speech, characters, and action was his, though he conceded that the right of performing the music belonged to no one but Dr. Stanford. In fact, Mr. Boosey seems to have thought that, by virtue of his agreement with Mr. A'Beckett, he could prevent Dr. Stanford from performing Savonarola, and earning the second half of his purchase-money, as long as he chose. Considering this, it was hardly graceful in Mr. Boosey to instruct his counsel to say that "the sole object of this performance on the part of Dr. Stanford is unfairly to get 500*l.* out of the pocket of Mr. Boosey." As Mr. Justice Pearson pointed out, Mr. Boosey had stated his own object pretty clearly in one of his letters, where he said that he hoped, by means of having the copyright of the libretto "in our hands, to recoup ourselves for some part of the expense to which we have been put in acquiring" the right to publish the music. Mr. Napier Higgins, Q.C., who appeared for Mr. Boosey, was finally reduced to arguing that Dr. Stanford had no right to perform his opera to any libretto but Mr. Boosey's, and to offering to allow him to perform the complete score of Savonarola without any dramatic accessories. "But then," said Mr. Justice Pearson, with judicial perspicacity, "you would say that that was not a performance within the meaning of the agreement, and refuse to pay the rest of the purchase-money." So he gave judgment for the defendant without calling upon his counsel.

THE SUGAR BOUNTY QUESTION.

THE meeting held in Mile End on Wednesday evening to denounce the foreign sugar bounty system recalls attention to a matter which has given more occupation during the past quarter of a century to the Foreign Offices of Europe than any other single economic question. When discussing the crisis in the sugar trade some few weeks ago, we pointed out that it had been brought about by the great increase of production during recent years, and we showed that that increase was mainly in beetroot sugar. The growth of the beetroot industry during the present century is perhaps the most striking instance on record of the influence of political motives in producing a great industrial revolution. The first Napoleon encouraged beetroot cultivation in France in the hope of undermining British commercial supremacy. The hope has not been realized; but the policy he initiated has had results greater than the most sanguine could have expected. The policy has been pursued by the successive Governments that have since ruled France, and it has been imitated by almost all other Continental nations. The consequence is that beetroot-sugar is competing on more than equal terms with cane-sugar in the English market; indeed, the proportion of beetroot-sugar consumed here has been growing at a most astonishingly rapid rate of late years, and now amounts to about one-half. It seems not improbable, therefore, to those interested that in the long run beetroot will drive out cane-sugar from the English market altogether. In doing so it would, of course, seriously injure British capital invested in the sugar plantations of the West Indies and elsewhere, and it would throw out of employment much British labour engaged in those plantations. If the success of beetroot cultivation were due to natural causes alone there would be nothing to complain of. In the struggle for existence the fittest always must survive. But in this case legislation has triumphed over the natural advantage possessed by the sugar-cane. The Continental Governments, while protecting beetroot growers and sugar manufacturers, yet levy a duty upon the sugar. But as they, of course, desire to avoid taxing capital, they grant a drawback on sugar when exported. The drawback professes only to equal the duty paid; but in practice it is found very greatly to exceed it. The duty is imposed upon the raw material; and it is said to be impossible to calculate exactly the quantity of sugar that any given amount of beetroot will yield. The drawback, therefore, is made so liberal that it amounts to a very considerable bounty. It is said, for example, that French loaf-sugar is sold at 51 francs per hundred kilogrammes for export to England; while the price in France itself, when the duty is subtracted, is as high as 62 francs. Thus the sugar for England is sold 11 francs per hundred kilogrammes, or over 21½ per cent. cheaper than the sugar is sold in France itself, irrespective of the duty! The difference is a bounty in favour of export to England. And it is alleged that the bounty in Germany is considerably larger than that in France. It will be seen, therefore, that the sugar manufacturer can afford to sell his sugar in England much below cost price, since the difference is made up to him by the Government. In other words, Continental taxpayers tax themselves to supply the English consumer with cheap sugar; but, unfortunately, the result to the cane-sugar grower is disastrous.

The sugar refiners and the sugar-cane growers argue that the ultimate result of this state of things must be that the Continental nations will obtain a monopoly of the English sugar market. Having driven cane-sugar out of the market, and thrown a large number of the plantations out of cultivation, they will be able to charge what prices they like; and thus they are making sugar artificially cheap now in order to make it artificially dear by-and-bye. The trade, therefore, contend that it is the duty of the Government to prevent this consummation. It is evident that the bounties could be abolished, if the duty on beetroot-sugar was imposed upon the sugar itself when fully manufactured, and was collected only when being delivered for consumption. Our Government took this view of the matter many years ago, and opened negotiations with the Continental Governments, in the hope of inducing them to adopt the system. But as the system could be carried out only by insisting that all sugar should be manufactured in bond, the Continental nations refused to subject their municipal law to international arrangement. Sugar refiners and cane-sugar growers, therefore, have now come to demand that the Government should impose a countervailing duty—a duty, that is, equivalent to the bounty granted by the Continental nations upon all sugar obtaining the bounty. It is argued that this would not be in contravention of Free-trade. Free-trade requires that Governments should not interfere with the free action of natural causes; but the Continental Governments by their bounties do interfere; and therefore, it is urged, our Government may interfere in its turn to replace the balance. The answer of those who oppose the proposal is obvious. Foreign Governments interfere with the free play of natural causes in many other matters besides sugar production, and therefore, if we impose a countervailing duty upon bounty-fed sugar, we shall also, if we are to be consistent, impose a countervailing duty on many other articles of import. We need not, however, discuss this purely theoretical aspect of the question. For it is clear to any one who will think out the matter that no Government in England dare propose a duty upon sugar. Sugar has now become a necessary of life, and if it were to be taxed for the sake of making it dear, there would be an outcry that the widow and orphan, the starving needlewoman, and struggling fathers of families were taxed for the benefit of a few capitalists in a small trade. Nor is it only the consumers who would oppose a countervailing duty. Sugar is employed as a raw material in many manufactures—in brewing for example—and all who so employ it would oppose the duty as bitterly as the consumers. Even in the sugar trade itself there would be a very powerful opposition to the proposal. The retail dealer, who buys his sugar at present prices, can put on an extortionate profit and yet sell at a price that to the poor housewife appears wonderfully low. But, if the price were to be raised to what it used to be in former days, either the shopkeeper would have to content himself with a much smaller profit, or he would see a great falling off in his custom. The shopkeepers know this full well, and nowhere, perhaps, would there be a stronger opposition to the proposal than in the sugar trade itself. Indeed, the history of the agitation against the bounties clearly proves the impracticability of imposing countervailing duties. The question has been before the country since 1862, and every Ministry since then, to whatever party it belonged, has had it under consideration. Each has endeavoured by negotiation to bring about a change in the Continental system, but all have decided without a moment's hesitation that to impose a countervailing duty was out of the question.

We are afraid that the West Indian planters and the sugar-refiners must base their hopes of an improvement upon the necessities of the Continental Governments. We are inclined to think, however, that these hopes will not be disappointed. The Continental Governments are engaged in maintaining such vast armaments, and in constructing such great public works, that their financial difficulties are very great. However much, therefore, they may wish to foster native industry and to encourage exports of native produce, they, after a while, find that the game is too expensive to be pursued. France, which initiated the system, and against whose policy the sugar-refiners first protested, has had to reduce the bounty so considerably that French imports of sugar into England have immensely decreased, and, indeed, the competition of France is now regarded almost with equanimity. Holland, likewise, has decreased its bounties; and Austria, which a few years ago outstripped France, and even was flooding France itself with its sugar, has also had to cut down the bounties. Germany is the only country which now gives bounties large enough to derange the trade. But it is by no means improbable that the German Government will by-and-bye tire of taxing German subjects for the benefit of British consumers. Already, indeed, the German Government has endeavoured to reduce the bounties, and it has failed only because the ingenuity of the German manufacturers has extracted more and more sugar from the beetroot. We are afraid that in this matter of skill and ingenuity the planters of the West Indies and our own refiners are not quite equal to their foreign competitors. The charge is repudiated with something like indignation; but the organ of the sugar interest itself practically admits it. The German Government levies the tax on the weight of roots worked. "Every effort," we are told, "has consequently been made to grow the richest roots, and to bring the manufacture to such perfection as to extract from them the largest possible quantity of sugar. Under this stimulus the national energy and skill have been fully developed, and the result is that the growth and manufacture of beetroot-sugar in Germany has become one of the most perfect industries in the world. The French can get from five to six per cent. of sugar from their roots, while their German rivals have succeeded in extracting ten to twelve." It is commonly said, indeed, that improvements are introduced so rapidly in Germany that every five years the quantity of sugar extracted is increased, and thereby the amount of the bounty is raised. The question, then, it will be seen, is more complicated than at first sight it appears to be. Not only does the bounty interfere with the free action of natural laws, but the skill and ingenuity brought to bear upon the manufacture in Germany are so great as considerably to enhance the bounties given. Another point to be borne in mind is that the preparation of the soil for the growth of beetroot is such that it is said the land grows all crops for five or six years afterwards better than land in which beetroot has not been planted. It is to be desired, therefore, that the sugar-planters of the West Indies should seriously set themselves to the study of the processes adopted in Germany. Crying for countervailing duties will help them little. Invention and improvement may enable them to reconquer their old place in the English market. And they will do so the more readily because it is hardly probable, as we said above, that the German taxpayer will long go on giving subventions to sugar manufacturers to supply cheap sugar to British consumers. The consumption of sugar in Germany is only about one-third per head of the population of the consumption in England, although, as we have just seen, Germany is now the greatest producer of sugar in the world, and is increasing her production so rapidly that she threatens before long to drive all rivals out of the English market. Yet at home the price of sugar is so dear that the consumption is kept down to a mere fraction of what it is in England. Of course it is to be borne in mind that Germany is a much poorer country than England, and that the standard of living is much lower. Still, making allowance for all the differences between the two countries and between the modes of life of the two peoples, it is unquestionable that the German system does prevent the growth of consumption at home and does stimulate an artificial export abroad. If the sugar-refiners and the West Indian planters would help to bring these matters clearly to the knowledge of the German people, they would more effectually strike a blow at the bounty system than by agitation here at home. In saying this, however, we do not in the least wish to deny that the bounties act most injuriously to the sugar trade; that they are indefensible in principle, and that in practice they are unjust to the countries which pay them and mischievous to the rest of the world.

GERMAN OPERA AT COVENT GARDEN.

WHEN posterity gives its verdict on Herr Wagner's music it will probably be to the effect that through his mind there ran a current of pure melody and harmonious fancy which was constantly broken, interrupted, and diverted from its course by rocks of prejudice and shallows of mistaken logic. Music of the highest nature appeals to the ears and to the understanding alike. It has been the fault and weakness of many Italian masters that they considered the ears alone; that they cared only to gratify the love of sweet sounds that is common to most hearers, without any thought of gratifying also the sense of appropriateness. They did not, in other words, make their music dramatic. In the best operatic composition "The sound must seem an echo to the sense," to put a line of Pope to a use for which he never intended it. The component parts of such music are not to be analysed, but the result can be felt. One feels, for instance, that the quartet in Rigoletto, the trio in Lucrezia Borgia, the simple song, "Ah! non credea," in Sonnambula, are dramatic in their way; and so is the arrival of the Swan in Lohengrin. But these, and a score of other examples that will at once occur to the reader, are also eminently melodious, and melody was in a great measure disregarded by Herr Wagner in his later days. His disciples assert that it exists for them; but they hear it with the ears of faith, and those who do not possess faith cannot hear. As Herr Wagner had a later manner, so also he had, fortunately, an earlier manner. As that current of melody to which reference has been made advanced, the obstacles became larger and more numerous. Die Meistersinger, though not completed till 1867, is almost exclusively an example of the earlier period; and, except that it has a somewhat sad tendency as showing what Herr Wagner might have done for music had he been content to give his imagination full scope, the work is replete with beauty and rich in humour, humour of a somewhat severe and Teutonic cast when it is not, on the other hand, actually farcical—as in the belabouring of Beckmesser by the 'prentices—but nevertheless fresh and genuine. It is just two years since the story of Walther von Stolzing who desires to be a master-singer that he may win the hand of Eva, a prize for the best singer, and so defeat her pedantic suitor Beckmesser, was told in England at Drury Lane, and there for the first time Hans Sachs, the cobbler, a master-singer of larger mind and more liberal views than his brethren, aided the young knight to gain his bride. Here is a summary of the whole plot which, however, derives interest from the glimpse it affords into the life of mediæval Germany in connexion with the quaint custom of the master-singers of Nürnberg; for the prototypes of Hans Sachs, Pogner, Beckmesser, David, and the rest lived and sang, if they did not sing the music Herr Wagner puts into their mouths, and if they were not accompanied by such an orchestra as he provides. When the Meistersinger was begun, the composer had not recognized the desirability of making his music as unvocal as possible, though the orchestra was then, as afterwards, the first consideration. Neither had he developed what are regarded by some as the tricks, and by others as the magnificences of the later style—much tremolo of violins with no obvious significance, and rushes of crescendo leading to no goal.

The music of the Meistersinger is often beautiful, very beautiful indeed; though that it is somewhat fatiguing to keep attention on the stretch is not to be denied. In some degree this is a tribute to the composer. He commands attention; we are unwilling to lose his meaning, and so listen with strained ears. We are often bountifully repaid. Few things in music are finer than the utterances of Hans Sachs as he leans over the half-door of his shoemaker's shop, and soliloquizes about the song which Walther has sung at the trial in St. Katherine's Church that morning.

> Kein' Regel wollte da passen,
> Und war doch kein Fehler drin, he sings, and puzzles over it while a phrase of exceeding beauty is expanded in the orchestra into what may be called a symphony, every bar of which incontestably reveals the master's hand. Comparatively new as the opera is in England, it will be safe to assume that it is familiar to musicians. We need not dwell again on the recognized facts that much of Walther's music has fresh and earnest melody, or describe the humour of the scene between Hans Sachs and Beckmesser, where the former (according to a parody of the custom of the master-singers) marks by taps upon the boot he is mending the errors in the serenade which Beckmesser is singing to Eva. The Meistersinger has been accepted by audiences. It ranks with Lohengrin as a work by which Herr Wagner will be estimated in this country—and here estimation means cordial approval—when little more will remain of the Nibelungen than part of the second act of Siegfried, which will be heard at orchestral concerts, and when the dreadful name of Wotan, in his association with music other than that of the thunderclouds, is forgotten.

The head and front of the German Opera at Covent Garden is Herr Richter, and how much this signifies readers know well. Great conductors are rare, but Herr Richter is admitted to be great on all hands; how great he is perhaps only those who heard the Nibelungen, first at Bayreuth under his guidance, and subsequently at Her Majesty's under the guidance of some one else, who was esteemed good and had a testimonial from Herr Wagner to that effect, can thoroughly realize. The German Opera orchestra includes many instrumentalists who play also for the Italian Opera Company. It is not to be denied that Signor Bevignani is an accomplished musician and a conductor much above the average; yet it is certain that Herr Richter obtains effects from his band which are unobtainable under other guidance. Care does much, no doubt; but then Signor Bevignani is also careful. What, then, is the electric sympathy which teaches an orchestra to respond to a conductor? It is not knowledge of the music alone. Herr Richter notoriously made an impression when he conducted Herr Wagner's works which the composer himself could not secure. The problem is an interesting one, which fortunately amateurs can study for themselves. What under inferior guidance is blurred and meaningless becomes vivid, perfectly balanced, and eloquently clear when Herr Richter is in command. This is the more important—if too much importance can be attached to the orchestra in such a work as this—because the company at Covent Garden is not a remarkably strong one. The general representation was more effective two years ago at Drury Lane; and as the orchestra was of equal merit and led by the same skilled hand, the difference must have been in the impersonation. The Eva of Frl. Schuch-Proska is colourless and quite lacks the sensibility with which both the Drury Lane Evas, Frl. Sucher in particular, were able to invest the part. Herr Fischer is a sound vocalist and an intelligent actor. At times he rises to the spirit of his theme; his performance in the second act, the interview with Eva and the wielding of the critical hammer to mark Beckmesser's serenade, were excellent. There is no want of dignity about this Sachs, and if there seems to be a lack of lightness and ease, it must not be forgotten that the shoemaker is a mediæval Teuton. Herren Wiegand and Moedlinger as Pogner and Beckmesser deserve no specially adverse criticism. Herr Gudehus, the Stolzing, has a resonant tenor voice, which he is only just beginning to spoil by an adherence to the wearing and tearing German method. A couple of years as Siegmund and Siegfried would reduce him to the level of the average Wagnerian tenor. The part of the 'prentice David was filled with ease and judgment by Herr Schroedter. He was never out of the picture, and is much to be commended for his artistic care.

Der Freischütz was the work chosen for the second performance. It was, of course, given with spoken dialogue, as Weber designed it. The bursts of song have, no doubt, a formal and conventional ring when they occur; but the beauty of the music appears in all its richness when Herr Richter is at the head of affairs. The overture to this opera gave Weber his place among the immortals; but, besides the famous scena, with its exquisite adagio, "Leise, leise, fromme Weise," there are sufficient beauties in the opera to justify its inclusion in the list of works to be given, which is open to criticism, inasmuch as it does not include a single opera of Mozart. A selection of German operas with Mozart excluded has something mysterious about it; but this is by the way. In Der Freischütz the unsatisfactory Eva of the Meistersinger, Frl. Schuch-Proska, gave proof of the direction wherein her capacity lies. She sang Ann's music brightly and pleasantly enough. As the more sedate of the two heroines, Agathe, Mme. Biro de Marion displayed true dramatic instinct. That portion of the tenor's equipment which comes by nature Herr Gudehus possesses. He was the Max. Herr Wiegand's Caspar was a capable piece of work. He acted with vigour and intensity; except that there was a want of power in the low notes, which Caspar should use very effectively, and an inability to reach with ease the F sharp which the Drinking Song demands, the music was well sung. The best Caspar the stage of our time has produced was, somewhat oddly, not a German, but a Frenchman—M. Faure. The grim resolution with which he undertook his dread task is not to be forgotten by those who have watched the greatest of French dramatic singers—the nationality might well be excluded, for of lyric artists of all countries the world has known no greater than the French baritone. Herr Wiegand is not a Faure, but he is a very careful and competent artist. The choruses of Der Freischütz—the Huntsmen's Chorus particularly—might have been better sung.

To speak frankly—and the critic should always speak thus, though it is not his invariable habit—a slight feeling of disappointment was created by the performance of Lohengrin. The representation was good; only it might have been better. Some day, perhaps, an Elsa will be found who will confide her griefs to her monarch and to her maidens. Mme. Albani cannot forget her audience, and the result is that the audience remembers her at the expense of Elsa. The passages beginning "In lichter Waffen Scheine," sung after Elsa has first arrived, are altogether beautiful. The violins in the higher octaves, swelled by wood-wind, are broken in upon by the harp, till what may be described as a warmth and glow seems to be diffused around; but here the Elsa sought an undue prominence, which was destructive to the simplicity of the character. It has been suggested that the conjunction of heavy German voices caused Mme. Albani to exaggerate, and this may well be the case. The delivery of the part in German, which she has often given in Italian, presented no linguistic difficulties to the prima donna. Her study has much merit, but the ideal Elsa has still to be sought, especially in the absence of Mme. Nilsson. Herr Stritt attempted, with surprisingly good results, to sing a tenor part with a baritone voice. Except that Lohengrin should be a tenor, and Herr Stritt is not so, the part was effectively realized. The actor's presence is commanding, and in the music his robust style overcomes difficulties which Nature has planted. No singing could make Ortrud's music, written for a wrought-iron voice, anything but tedious and unpleasant. Our cordial admiration of the first act, not to mention the third, with its beautiful love music, cannot disguise the fact that this second act is very wearisome; and the intensity with which Frau Luger realised the character of Ortrud was very striking. She sang earnestly and conscientiously, and was well supported by Herr Reichmann as Telramund. Herren Wiegand and Scheidemantel completed the cast. The prelude to the third act was played with immense spirit.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

AT the Vaudeville the continued popularity of Confusion well illustrates the prevailing fancy for farcical comedy. Without being a notable work of art, Mr. Derrick's play is constructed with considerable ingenuity and consistency. The tangled web which, according to the poet, arises from experimental attempts at deception, is productive in Confusion of an elaborate intricacy, a maze of perplexities without any apparent clue. A little candour on the part of those concerned is, of course, all that is required to shed the light of common day on a dark and devious scene, were it desirable to scatter the fantastic illusions that Mr. Henry Neville and Miss Sophy Larkin so forcibly present. The ball of farce has, however, to be kept rolling, attaching to itself all manner of incongruities, until its disintegration is effected by excessive aggregation. The second act of Confusion affords a striking instance of the limitations of farcical comedy and of the perils of the narrow line that separates the pathos from the farce of comedy. Mortimer Mumploford and Miss Lucretia Trickleby are the victims of illusions that appear to the audience irrational and even ludicrous, and yet are based on evidence which, in stageland or the world around us, cannot be considered baseless. The former becomes jealous of his wife, and is represented in the second act with such nature and truth, such admirable force and finish, by Mr. Henry Neville, that the actor, unconsciously perhaps, for a while abandons the breadth and extravagance of farce and assumes a more serious rôle. The latter, through a stray telegram, imagines herself ensnared by an unprincipled adventurer; whereas Christopher Blizzard, the person in question, is quite the reverse. Miss Sophy Larkin, in her clever impersonation of the maiden lady, realizes the situation with such dramatic intensity and unqualified truth that her acting is almost painful. It would be hypercritical to designate such acting as alien to the spirit of farce; it is interesting certainly as illustrating the exceeding subtlety of the actor's art. When, however, we hear of Confusion being provocative of continuous laughter, the hilarity can only proceed from those who are more susceptible to humorous extravagance than sensitive to the delicate and infinite gradations of accomplished acting.

The chief merit of Confusion lies in the skill displayed in evolving the action; with all the drollery and humour that distinguish it, the most laughable situations are produced in a natural sequence undisfigured by exaggeration. The farcical element is of the legitimate kind, and the fun never degenerates into mere romping or coarseness. The representation is good in all respects; Mr. Henry Neville and Miss Larkin, Mr. Thorne, as the butler James, Mr. Groves, as Christopher Blizzard, and Miss Kate Phillips, as Maria, are all admirable. Mr. Thorne's James is a happy conception, original and distinctly quaint. Confusion is preceded by a comedietta entitled The Man Opposite, written by Mr. Howard Paul, and strangely described as a vaudeville. It is of the slightest description and merely an adaptation of an old idea; but it enables Miss Kate Phillips and Mr. Howard Paul to set forth with spirit and vivacity the strange flirtation and ultimate engagement of Fresco, a struggling artist, and his opposite neighbour, Fleurette.

Mme. Viard-Louis's fourth recital of Beethoven's works was given at Prince's Hall on Thursday. The brief programme included three instrumental works only; the Sonata in D major (Op. 10, No. 3), the Trio in B flat major for piano, clarionet, and violoncello (Op. 11), and the Sonata in C minor (Op. 13) familiarly known as the pathétique. Mr. H. Lazarus and M. Libotton assisted in the interpretation of the trio, the exquisite phrasing of the former being a notable feature in the variations of the final movement; the general effect was marred, however, by the pianist's persistent use of the pedal, and an uneven execution, combined with an open pianoforte—an unnecessary, and even objectionable, practice. In rendering the sonatas Mme. Viard-Louis was far more satisfactory than in her execution of the trio; her playing of the C minor sonata was distinguished by true feeling and insight, and her execution was characterized by the refinement and expression that were wanting in the trio. An agreeable item in the concert was provided by the vocalist, Mme. Waldmann Leiderits, who sang Leonora's great scene from Fidelio, the invocation to Hope, with genuine passion and dramatic power. In her rendering of the beautiful Liederkreis, the interesting circle of songs "An die ferne Geliebte," Mme. Leiderits displayed fine artistic sensibility and excellent capacity of expression.

At the Beethoven Rooms, Harley Street, an interesting concert, chiefly of Italian vocal music, was lately given by Signor Rizzelli, the programme including among many pieces of enduring popularity several items not less attractive and of greater novelty. The accomplished style of Signor Rizzelli's vocalization, the distinguished finish of his phrasing, the admirable art with which he produces the voice, his refinement and delicacy of expression, were finely exemplified in the rendering of Ponchielli's beautiful romance, "Tenda natal," from Il Figliuol prodigo. The rare artistic qualities of the singer were also displayed in Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Once Again," given in Italian, in the duet "Voglio dire," from D'Elisir d'Amore, with Signor Zoboli, and in Gordigiani's pretty trio, "Vieni al mar." Mme. Carlotta Patti, who is in excellent voice this season, was enthusiastically recalled for her brilliant execution of the aria "Caro nome," from Rigoletto, and her vivacious rendering of a Spanish song by Gradier; her delivery of shakes and florid embellishments was marvellous for facility, precision, and unerring intonation. Mme. Thea Sanderini gave, with good effect, "Robert, toi que j'aime," and Gumbert's "O bitt' euch liebe, Vögelein," and made an impression by her charming rendering of Signor Denza's romance "Tu manchi, O fiore," a song that should attain popularity. Ponchielli's "Voce di donna," from La Gioconda, was sung with taste and feeling by Miss Gertrude Roberts, who also assisted in the several concerted pieces, and, with Signor Rizzelli, in M. Faure's duet "Crucifix," a composition decidedly more effective in its choral form as an anthem. Signor Zoboli's comic verve and drollery were fully displayed in the duet "Voglio dire," and in a humorous version of Tito Mattei's buffa song, "Il Farfallone"; and Mr. Joseph Lynde's fine voice was advantageously heard in Tosti's "Ask me no more," and Watson's "Unlinked." Mme. Gayrard-Pacini gave several pianoforte solos, including Rubinstein's "Valse caprice"; and M. de Munch, the violoncellist, an excellent interpretation of a solo by Piatti. The notable efficiency of the accompanists, Signor Romili and Mr. W. W. Hedgcock, contributed much to the success of the concert.

THE EARLY YACHT RACES.

IN the first great match of the season the new yacht Genesta was successful, as we predicted that she probably would be, and her success showed, as has so often been shown before, that the principal requisite for the fast ship of the present day is a huge amount of lead—i.e. of outside lead, to use the common expression. It is, however, only fair to say that the latest contrivance for carrying this metal under water is an extremely creditable specimen of her peculiar class. As to her beauty, opinions may differ, but there can be no difference of opinion as to her handiness and her extraordinary power of beating to windward, while, from what was seen of her behaviour during one short struggle with trying combers, it seems probable that she will prove a very fair seaboat. It would be out of place to enter into details respecting her, but we may observe that her comparatively moderate mast, an ingenious improvement in part of her topmast rigging, and other things show how much advantage is gained when the designer of a yacht has a thorough practical knowledge of fore-and-aft seamanship. The extraordinary rake of sternpost to which her remarkable quickness in going round must be partly due is worthy of the attention of others than yachtsmen, as there are problems connected with the results obtained from inclined stern-posts which are as yet far from being solved. The attention of yachtsmen the Genesta is sure to receive; as, although she has not had by any means uninterrupted success, and was handsomely defeated by the Lorna at Dover, she is now the lion, or rather lioness, of the yacht-racing season, and will probably remain so until the two other great lead-carriers which have been built come forth to compete with her.

The match just mentioned, in which this yacht was victorious, was uninteresting except in so far as it served to show her weatherly qualities, but was not uneventful, as the start was marked by a serious collision, and as the Genesta and the Marjorie got aground. The former was afloat again very soon; but the latter, albeit she had three steamers to help her, remained on the Gunfleet for some time, and bumped in a manner which would have seriously strained some yachts, but which has apparently produced no effect whatever on this exceptionally strong vessel. At the end of the long and tedious heat through the narrow channels the Genesta was first, and she finally came in first and took a well-gained prize. Owing partly to a bad start and to a slight mistake, she was less successful in the Harwich match, which was a somewhat dull one, although the finish in the harbour was a sight of rare beauty, the yachts, under a cloud of canvas, tearing past the Committee-boat in rapid succession. On the day succeeding that of this rather tame match, the race back from Harwich was sailed, and it proved, as matches up and down the Swin often have, a very fine one, although it was, save one little bit, but a run and a reach, and, according to all accepted tenets, mere running and reaching is poor work. In this case the sail had the merit of being the exact opposite of that down to Harwich, and of giving an instance therefore of that variety which, all things considered, is perhaps the greatest charm of yacht-racing. With a strong breeze from the eastward, and with tide against wind, there was outside Harwich harbour a nasty sea such as is only too well known to all who sail on the East Coast, and to fetch the Cork lightship the yachts had to beat against this. With lower canvas for running all were severely tried; and certainly the Genesta, despite her huge mainsail and boom, seemed to be taking the seas in a very gentle and pleasing fashion, the other vessels, except the Miranda, being slightly in difficulties. After the trying time was over, the race presently resolved itself into a struggle between the Genesta and the vessel just named, which even now, after seven years' racing, so rarely finds one of her own rig to contend with her, and is driven to the very trying work of fighting the cutters and yawls. On this occasion, with alternate running and reaching, there was a chance for the schooner; and, had not bad luck at the start put her a long way astern of the Genesta, she would in all probability have added one to her long list of first prizes. As it was, the cutter won with but very little to spare, showing nevertheless considerable speed off the wind. With regard, however, to the relative powers of cutters and schooners when going free, considerable misapprehension appears to exist, and it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the traditions of former days, when proportions were very different from what they are now, have too much weight given them. When cutters were short vessels they had, of course, no chance against schooners reaching, but now that yachts of "the national rig" have a length of five times their beam, or more along the load water-line, they may be able to reach nearly as well as the two-masted craft. Any one who has seen the Samœna sail, must have realized the fact that she had something very like a schooner's pace going free. In running a cutter has, so far as sails go, a very obvious advantage over the two-masted vessel, as she utilizes proportionately more canvas. The wonder which is sometimes expressed at a schooner's being unable to catch a cutter is perhaps a little exaggerated, and it was not, in this race, at all surprising that the Miranda, although sailing extremely well, and somewhat faster than the Genesta, was nevertheless unable to make up for lost ground and to save her time.

Of the two Thames matches sailed on the days succeeding that of the Harwich to Southend race, the first was uninteresting owing to an uncertain wind; but the second served to show the Genesta's power of beating to windward. In a dead beat up river she drew away from the other great cutters in wonderful fashion, considering what vessels they are, until the breeze failed her, when of course her antagonists came up. Two days afterwards, in the Nore to Dover match, the performance of the new vessel was equally remarkable. With a moderate southerly breeze the Miranda, sailing in grand style, went away from the fleet, and at the Tongue lightship was well ahead. Hence there was a beat, and the schooner, admirably piloted, held the lead for a time, while the cutter was thrown some distance to leeward by a slight shift of the wind. Despite this misfortune, however, the Genesta came up rapidly, and between the North and East Goodwin lightships passed the schooner, as was inevitable, and also passed the Lorna with no more difficulty than if she had been a fishing-smack. In the Cinque Ports match she was less fortunate, the yawl, which she had beaten easily on a wind, holding her own with her reaching, and taking the prize by time; and in the race to Boulogne and back, sailed on Tuesday last, when a north-easterly breeze gave the yachts a run and a reach, the Lorna, which seemed to be going better than she had previously, was again victorious, defeating, in a light wind, the vessel which, in the strong breeze that prevailed during the Harwich to Southend match, had run away from her without difficulty.

With this contest the first part of the yacht-racing season came to an end. Without being dull, it has not been specially eventful, and its main features have been the sailing of the Genesta, and latterly of the Lorna. Though the former has not been uniformly a victor, she has done extremely well, as every one expected she would; but, despite her brilliant sailing, she cannot be viewed with the hearty admiration which in other days was accorded to a successful racing yacht. Indeed, in one respect she must be viewed with regret. So much ingenuity and knowledge of his craft have been shown by her designer that it is difficult not to feel sorry that he was perforce obliged to resort to such a monstrosity as a lead keel of more than sixty tons. For the continuance of a state of things which obliges owners and designers to bring out mere lead-carriers the authorities who now hold despotic sway over the yacht-racing world are responsible; and it is to be hoped that they will see their way to making some radical alteration in their laws which will cause a return to a wholesome type, and thus prevent yacht-racing from becoming ridiculous, and give competent men work more suited to their abilities than devising fastenings for lead.

MME. JUDIC AT THE GAIETY.

"JE te baptise comédienne. Tu feras courir tout Paris," Lesueur said to the child Anna Damiens one evening when she was some ten years old, and by Anna Judic the old musician's prognostication has been amply verified. Rachel was derided on her first appearance in La Vendéenne, and the youthful Judic, who is really hardly less admirable in her humbler way than Rachel was in the higher sphere of art which she adorned, was likewise hissed as a débutante. But Mme. Judic has been so much applauded since that the early failure must be quite an agreeable reminiscence. Another famous man besides Lesueur has expressed his opinion on Mme. Judic. The critic of the Times went to see Niniche on Monday evening, and next day he delivered himself of the following comments:—"Such delicate touches of comedy as the part lends itself to are admirably heightened by the simplicity, or, so to speak, the studied artlessness of the actress's manner and the music of her voice, which, despite a growing embonpoint on her part that bids defiance to the skill of the dressmaker, remains as sweetly modulated as ever." There is a depth of meaning in this—if there be any meaning at all that is to say—which is not easily fathomed. Are we to understand that if the skill of the lady's dressmaker had been less successfully defied her voice would have been less sweetly modulated? The conjunction of music, modulation, and dressmaking is certainly remarkable; and it is new to find that all celebrated singers are thin. It is rather for the purpose of announcing the arrival of the admirable French actress, and the beginning of the French season at the Gaiety, than of describing so familiar a performance as Mme. Judic's Niniche, that these lines are written; and we are glad at the same time to be able to afford the readers of this elegant extract from the leading journal matter for meditation. A week or two since a Times' critic was puzzling over the success of Mefistofele, and now a Times' critic has found a new mental exercise in the bearing of a vocalist's modulations upon her milliner. We are pleased to note—whether it have anything to do with the dress or not is a consideration beyond us—that Mme. Judic sings the pretty music of her part with freshness of voice and with all her former artistic feeling. Nothing of the kind could possibly be better. M. Cooper, who succeeds Dupuis as Grégoire, baigneur des dames, has not the natural humour of the famous Fritz, but nevertheless manages to be amusing. MM. Lassouche and E. Georges, as Anatole and Korniski, are inimitably good.

THE BENEDICT JUBILEE.

IT seldom happens to artists that the public recognition of their achievements increases with the flight of time through half a century, and is marked by a progressive measure of appreciation unqualified by the fickle moods of fashion. Too frequently it is only through death that genius inherits renown, as M. Gounod said of Berlioz—a poor inheritance for genius notwithstanding the permanent enrichment of humanity. Sir Julius Benedict is in the fortunate position of the well-known person who survived his own wake, and overheard the judgment of posterity ratify the oft-repeated favourable verdict of a long lifetime; he has received the assurance for which so many men yearn, and it has been pronounced with rare unanimity and emphasis. The celebration of his fiftieth annual concert at the Albert Hall, last Saturday, was attended by an enthusiasm that befitted so memorable an event. The extraordinary nature of the programme, its unusual proportions and peculiar attractions, combined with the reputation of the artists engaged, would alone have sufficed to collect a large audience. The mere celebration of a musician's fiftieth annual concert is a notable occasion, and deserving record; in the present instance it was but a factor in the great sum of interest. It was not alone the eminent conductor who was honoured, or the accomplished pianist; the pupil of Weber was recognized, the friend of Mendelssohn, the composer of one of the most poetical and inspired of English operas, the musician who more than any now among us represents the musical progress of the century. All these varied presentments of the versatile composer occupied the public mind; and, beyond all doubt, the remarkable reception accorded him was not more expressive of professional esteem than of the most cordial and universal public regard. When, with a few simple and eloquent words, Sir Julius Benedict acknowledged the applause that greeted him, there must have been few among the vast concourse who remained untouched by the pathos or unstimulated by the suggestion of the situation. He is something more than a visible link between the present and that past to which he so gracefully referred. He had been connected by the most intimate ties with some of the greatest masters of music, with one of whom—the illustrious Weber—his name is indissolubly associated. From the roll of his friendship scarcely a great name in music of the past fifty years is absent; his youth is enriched with memories of his great master, the poet of composers, and of Schubert and Beethoven; his career corresponds with the most brilliant and fecund era in the history of music.

Beyond all these claims to consideration, weighty though they be, there remains the composer's own art-work, so excellent in artistry, so fresh in conception, so admirably free from affectation or pretence. This was in some respects more appropriately recognized on Friday evening, when the oratorio St. Peter was performed, than by the miscellaneous concert of Saturday. This fine work, written for the Birmingham Festival and produced in 1870, is little familiar to amateurs, and the new edition is not entirely free from obstacles to its frequent hearing, some of the choral numbers being excessively prolonged. It contains, however, some of the most masterly examples of the composer's work, and was interpreted with perfect finish and expression by the soloists—Mme. Albani, Mme. Patey, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Winch, and Mr. Santley. Among the more notable numbers are the chorus, "The Lord be a lamp"; the contralto solo and chorus, "The deep uttereth His voice"; the soprano solo, "The Lord hath His way in the whirlwind," sang with fine dramatic feeling by Mme. Albani; the richly harmonized quartet, "O come let us sing," rendered with faultless expression, and encored. In the second part Mme. Patey sang the beautiful air, "O thou afflicted," with impressive fervour; Mr. Winch gave "The Lord is very pitiful" with exquisite delicacy and sentiment; Mme. Albani, in the tender and pathetic lament "I mourn as a dove," displayed the highest artistic qualities, the most perfect vocalisation, and the utmost depth and significance of feeling; and Mr. Santley, who represented St. Peter, sang the expressive air, "O that my head were waters," with the intense dramatic force that resolves the singer into the personification of the mood he interprets. Dr. Stainer presided at the organ, and the oratorio was produced under the conduct of the composer. Mr. Sims Reeves was unfortunately obliged to retire through indisposition after singing the first tenor air, the remaining air allotted to him being rendered by Mr. Winch.

More than forty artists were concerned in the concert of Saturday, and the programme comprised thirty items, including several instrumental arrangements and a recitation by Mr. Wilson Barrett. It is only necessary to note such details as are of special importance, or of personal interest as illustrating the varied scope and extensive range of Sir Julius Benedict's works. Chief among these were a fine performance of the overture "The Octoroon" by the band of the Second Life Guards, conducted by Mr. Winterbottom; Mr. Frederic King's admirable singing of the popular air, "Rage, thou angry storm"; a new song, "Fairer than all," by Lady Benedict, very attractive in style, and excellently rendered by Miss Beata Francis; the beautiful ballad "Eily Mavourneen," given with tenderest feeling by Mr. Edward Lloyd; a bolero composed for the occasion by Sir Julius Benedict, very piquant and graceful, and brilliantly sung by Miss Griswold; the same composer's song "Die Aeolsharfe," admirably accordant with the sentimental poem, sung by Mme. Pauline Lucca; the spirited and martial air "Comrades," irreproachably sung by Signor Foli; and the ballad "Scenes of my youth," from The Gipsy's Warning, sung by Mme Rose Hersée. Mme. Sembrich created immense enthusiasm by her brilliant delivery of Proch's vocal exercise, "Deh! torna mio bene," and her facile rendering of the andante and rondo from De Beriot's violin concerto in D. The excellence of her tone, her expression and phrasing, her execution of the rondo, were admirable features in this unique performance. Sir Julius Benedict himself effected the culmination of the popular enthusiasm by his finished performance of his fantasia on Irish airs, which resulted in the presentation, by Mr. Lindsay Sloper, of a handsome floral wreath, the gift of Mme. Arabella Goddard. Another interesting feature of the programme was the singing of a new quartet, composed by Ferdinand Hiller, and dedicated to his friend, Sir Julius Benedict. It is unnecessary to add that every one concerned in the success of the concert rendered important aid; the remaining artists and conductors who shared in the observance of this memorable festival were all alike animated with the same enthusiasm that characterized the audience, were all possessed by the honourable zeal which the occasion naturally evoked.

REVIEWS.

MODERN LANGUAGES OF AFRICA.*

OF the present utility of such a work as Mr. Cust's there can be little doubt. To quote the author's own words: "Here is something in the place of nothing. This book may be thrown into the abyss and form a platform on which a better edifice may be raised." The author also refers to himself, and with justice, as a compiler, not a linguist. This and many other self-depreciatory expressions, although sometimes imbued with almost "proud humility," make one loth to look for shortcomings in a work that is confessedly imperfect and yet which strives to clear the way for future perfection of research. Mr. Cust's book is no brilliant philosophical generalization such as we might expect from the pen of Friedrich Müller or Ernest Renan, no weighty and exhaustive study of minutest facts such as Lepsius and Bleek have furnished. He throws no new light on the grouping of African languages, he has no original solution of their linguistic puzzles to offer to philologists. In fact, he admits that in the long list of languages which he had collected, he had not the slightest knowledge of any one except of Arabic. "A librarian is said to be lost if he opens one book of his library, as he has to do with the outsides and not the insides; so it was with me," writes the author of the Modern Languages of Africa; and he further adds, "My self-imposed task was not to learn, read, speak, or teach the languages of Africa, but to collect, classify, and set out the works of others, and thus place future scholars on a platform of a genuine and solid character, so that they could advance with security on the onward path of discovery from the point which I had helped them to reach." And it is from this point of view that Mr. Cust's book must be regarded, and gratefully regarded, by all interested in African philology, and especially by those just entering upon the subject, for by his assiduous researches and indefatigable probings of every source of information he has spared his contemporaries and successors in the field an infinitude of vexatious toil. Now, a student of any one of the languages grouped as African will only have to turn to his object of research in the work we are reviewing, and he will there find studiously catalogued under its heading every known source of information on the subject.

It is surprising, when the author's admitted want of acquaintance with his theme is taken into consideration, that there should be so few technical errors in the compilation of his work; perhaps it is also to be regretted that those errors do occur when even a superficial study of the subject in hand would have obviated them. But they are not of such a character as to seriously affect the value of the book, and they will be merely noted as we pass the different sections of this treatise on the Modern Languages of Africa in detailed review. Before doing so, however, we must pause to point out certain incidental blemishes in style and manner of a kind that a writer of Mr. Cust's calibre ought to discard, and which are calculated to distract the eyes and the attention of his readers. One is the excessive use of capitals; the pages blaze with them. A hasty glance at the book gives one the impression at first sight that it is a harrowing novel of Miss Rhoda Broughton's and not a sober treatise on linguistic knowledge. Mr. Cust professes great admiration for Teutonic thought and method, would he also adopt the High-Dutch practice of ennobling every substantive with a capital? Some of his pages resemble posters. Also, though in all questions of philology the author, with commendable taste, represses his own personality, and gives us oftentimes a valuably neutral view of a complex question, yet he repays himself for this abnegation by occasionally uttering an individual opinion on ideas scarcely in harmony with the subject in hand. His laudations of martyr-missionaries and heroic teachers of the Gospel may or may not be exaggerated in tone; it is a question we need not pause now to discuss. That Mr. Cust may be excused for speaking out his admiration for Christian evangelists in somewhat too poetic diction most will be prepared to admit when we come to consider how greatly these ministers of religion have increased our knowledge of African tongues. But what grates upon us in turning over these pages is to come upon expressions of Christian fervour amid incongruous surroundings; to meet with phrases like "The great White Throne," "The Language of the Angels," "The Kingdom of Christ," and other quotations from the Book of the Revelation, in juxtaposition with Bantu prefixes and Hottentot clicks. From whatever point of view they are regarded, they must seem to most eyes a little out of place. For the rest, we might add that the author's style is graphic and racy, and even at times pleasantly quaint, where quaintness cannot be considered incompatible with gravity.

Mr. Cust divides his subject into six sections, that are intended to coincide with the six groups or families into which the African languages are provisionally separated. In the first, or Semitic, group we find the author evidently more in harmony with his theme than when we advance into more typically African fields. His little sketch of Arabic and its influence and history in the Dark Continent is all too short. Here we have Mr. Cust really speaking for himself and not reflecting the opinions of others, and consequently his little essay is capitally conceived and carried out. Following him through Section 2, the Hamitic group of languages, there is little fault to be found. The writer clearly knows what he is writing about, and has sufficient discrimination, in spite of his profession of neutrality, to criticize ably the views of his predecessors. When he reaches Section 3, however, where he deals with the Nuba-Fulah tongues, he seems to lose the grasp of his subject. He fails to satisfy us with sufficient reasons for deserting Lepsius and following blindly Friedrich Müller in his arbitrary collating of two dissimilar forms of speech. Perhaps we may express ourselves more clearly by saying that the scanty reasons that Mr. Cust, following Müller, adduces for the conjunction of Nuba and Fulah—namely, the absence of sexual and presence of human and non-human genders or classes of nouns, verbal infixes between the stem and the root of verbs modifying their meaning, and so on—are just as sufficient for supposing a relationship between the Fulah and the Bantu family, in which forms of these peculiarities may also be detected.

Mr. Cust's treatment of the Negro group (Section 4) is unequal in merit. His definition of the term "negro," especially as socially applied, is good, but his reasons for adopting a Negro family of languages are insufficient. He fails to show us, for instance, what the Ashanti tongue has in common with the Wolof or the Kanuri, to admit of their being placed in one group or separate division, when they resemble each other as much or as little as they do members of the Nuba-Fulah or Bantu families. We think he would have done better to make his sub-groups groups, until at any rate some reason be found to indicate a community of origin between the Negro languages of the Niger and the Nile, of the Gold Coast and Senegambia. The names he selects for his different sub-groups are:—A. Atlantic; B. Niger; C. Central (the regions round Lake Chad); and D. Nile. In the Atlantic division he includes the tongues of Senegambia and the Gold Coast, together with the Mande and other languages bordering on the Upper Niger. It seems to us that two separate groups—the Senegambian and the Gold Coast—would have been better; for to put together in the same class such utterly dissimilar languages as Ewé and Wolof must lead to misapprehension. The Niger group is a well-chosen one, and seems to offer some shadow of homogeneity, although several of the languages included in its scope appear to be northern forms of Bantu speech (vide Eastern section, Niger group, languages Ekatamfulu, Nki, Mbofong); and others which ought by their phonology to belong to it are classed among the Atlantic divisions, as, for instance, the Yariba, the Ewé, and the Kambari. The Central group (C.) is not very lucidly described, and more might have been said about the very widespread and influential Kanuri language, which extends the furthest north of any so-called Negro tongue. The Nilotic-Negro languages are necessarily imperfect as regards classification, owing to the slight knowledge we as yet have on this subject. Altogether, this résumé of our present linguistic knowledge where the negro races are concerned supplies a want, and, with all its faults, cannot be accused of dogmatic assertion. Then we pass, in Vol. II., to the study of the Bantu family, one of the most wonderful instances of homogeneity of linguistic structure to be found over a wide area. The part of Africa inhabited by the Bantu race equals one-half of Europe in size, and the languages of this group differ no more among themselves—differ less perhaps—than one Aryan tongue differs from another. In discussing this most interesting subject, Mr. Cust decidedly fails in interest and clearness. He might have cited to his readers some of the wonderful instances of Bantu unity which would have strengthened his assertion of the fact. He might, for instance, having had the grammars and vocabularies under his hand, have pointed out the really extraordinary similarity between the Lu-Ganda, spoken on the northern shores of Victoria Nyanza, and the O-Chi-Herrero of Damaraland, languages separated by twenty degrees of latitude, but hardly differing more from each other than Latin differs from Greek. He might have quoted such instances as the words for leopard, ox, grey parrot, island, snake, hippopotamus, bird, &c., which are almost unvarying in form whether we call them from the Lu-Ganda vocabularies, or from the languages of the West and East coasts and from Zululand. He gives us no short comparison of prefixes such as he might easily have borrowed from Bleek, and indeed he seems in certain remarks to have quite overlooked the study of this important feature in the Bantu forms of speech. Various errors also require pointing out, which seem to indicate want of acquaintance with the subject. Mr. Cust states that the Xosa Kaffirs have four clicks in their pronunciation. They have only three. The Bushmen languages can show eight clicks, the Hottentot four, and the Zulu-Kaffir three. But the very fact of having clicks at all renders another statement of Mr. Cust's very incorrect—namely, that the Xosa tongue "is deemed to represent the oldest form of Bantu speech." The Zulu-Kaffir languages have been greatly influenced by the Hottentot and Bushman family into which they are intruded, and they have borrowed not only phonetically but linguistically from their neighbours, though of course they still remain Bantu in all important grammatical features. The Sanskrit of the Bantu, or, in other words, the modern tongue which diverges least from the mother speech, has yet to be discovered, and will probably be found in the north-east or north central portion of the language-field. At present the Lu-Ganda of the Victoria Nyanza approaches somewhat to this position, and retains not only all the prefix-classes, but retains them in a fairly archaic form. There are also various mistakes in spelling Bantu tribal names, which are not of a sufficiently serious nature to require pointing out, and would not have arisen had the author studied more carefully Bleek's Comparative Grammar.

Mr. Cust's remaining section of the "Languages of Africa" is the sixth or Hottentot-Bushman group. In this are placed provisionally the as yet unstudied languages of the many Dwarf or Helot races scattered in little enclaves all over tropical Africa. Mr. Cust, we think, is disposed to exaggerate the difference between the tongues of the Khoi-Khoi, or Hottentots, and those of the San, or Bushmen; and again, in quoting Bleek's opinion that they are as far apart as English and Latin, he unintentionally shows that they are near akin, for English and Latin looked at from a high standpoint will seem undoubtedly of close relationship, and both remount through Gothic and Celto-Italic ancestors to a common parent. Indeed, if the relationship between two African languages be compared with that of one Aryan tongue with another, it is equivalent to saying that they are very closely connected from an African point of view.

Among his general remarks Mr. Cust makes a sensible protest against the many and absurd methods of transliteration at present in use. One Missionary Society employs such and such a series of letters and arbitrary signs to express unwritten tongues; another will make use of an entirely different mode; so that when the languages thus reduced to writing come to be examined, it is hard to reconcile one version with another. Explorers are quite as bad. Each spells the names of mountains, lakes, and rivers after his own heart and his own pet style of orthography. It must be admitted that in spelling all foreign names which are not fixed by a literature, or in which corruptions of old date are unsanctioned by long use, we English err the least. We have almost universally adopted a modified form of Lepsius's well-known method. We might, perhaps, go further and follow Lepsius altogether; but at any rate we can assume somewhat of the spirit of the Pharisee, and be devoutly thankful that we are not so bad as the French or Germans. It is, however, quite time that some universally recognized form of orthography existed, by means of which English, French, Germans, Dutch, and Portuguese might render by the same conventional means the sounds of all languages reduced to Roman writing. As it is, look at such a place as Ujiji in mid-Africa. First we have it as spelt by the English, not a letter too much, "Ujiji." But on a French map it is "Oudjidji," and in a German atlas "Udschidschi"! The kingdom of Shoa, which, according to Lepsius's plan, is spelt "Šoa," in French becomes "Choa," in German "Schoa," in Italian "Scioa." and in Portuguese "Xoa." The Dutch in the South of Africa, having one of the most cranky national alphabets for expressing foreign sounds, are obliged to render Sh and Ch (which, according to Lepsius, would be 'Ti' and 'S') by Sj and Tj, which produces much confusion. Both the Germans and the Portuguese, however, seem disposed to unite with the English in adopting one uniform method; while the French cling with peevish pertinacity to their own "national" mode of misspelling foreign words. The same spirit which makes a Frenchman persist in calling Cordova "Cordoue," and Genova "Gênes," induces him still to perpetrate such absurdities as "Ogououé" and "Zoulou."

In conclusion, we might advise Mr. Cust, when next he prefaces his books with polyglot quotations, to see he has them correctly spelt, or to take care that they pass the printer's hands unaltered. In his prefatory extract from Tasso there are three gross mistakes in spelling, and in the Portuguese excerpt from Camoens—a very backneyed one, by the by—there are four most palpable errors, which give one the idea that either the printer or Mr. Cust has thought it advisable to modify the rough Lusitanian tongue into a ladylike kind of Italian. All these little eccentricities, however, must not turn us from the fact that Mr. Cust has written a very valuable book, which no philologist, or even student of ethnology, can afford to be without.

The Modern Languages of Africa is further supplemented by an admirable map, for which the highest praise is due both to Mr. Cust, who "imagined" it, and to Herr Ravenstein, who carried it out geographically.

TWO NOVELS.*

THERE is nothing that an author dislikes, and consequently, the author will say, there is nothing that a critic likes better, than quarrelling with titles. Our quarrel with Mrs. Lang's title is not very bitter. As apparently intended to signify that her story has no elaborate plot, and is not intended to have any, it is a modest and appropriate title enough. But, on the other hand, it is too modest, for the views do not dissolve but abide very pleasantly in the memory. When the literary explorer of the thirty-ninth century finds a unique copy of Mrs. Lang's book with the title-page wanting, he will call it (editing it with much care and joy) "Some Passages in the Life of Eleanor Winton and Those About Her," and he will be cumbrously correct. How Eleanor Winton got engaged out of pure good nature to a young man who had plenty of good qualities but was not quite the young man; how she got disengaged by the beneficent agency of fortune and the Turf; and how she and the young man both found their fates (Eleanor's was decided in the unexpected locality of the Diploma Gallery of Burlington House), that is in brief the argument of the book. But no brief argument can possibly describe it, because it is in reality a succession of scenes connected by scarcely any other thread than the fact that the same personages are actors in them for the most part. The character studies, which are always true if not very deeply fouillés: the pictures of this or that locality; the social satire which is distinguished from most social satire in novels by the fact that it is not at all pretentious and is quite exact, are all subordinated to the "dissolving view" design—the design, that is to say, of presenting a series of tableaux of actual life of the present day. The society at Knightston, with its complement of "old Indian generals who, when they were not almost ferociously religious, were usually somewhat profane," passes Eleanor on (through Brittany, where she is nearly engulfed in a blow-hole and hears agreeable local legends) to a Devonshire country-house, the abode of her friends the Russells, where Ivan, the son and heir, at once falls in love with her. She does not fall in love with Ivan; but not disliking him, and having read poetry with him by several waterfalls, and seen him catch a trout, &c., she is persuaded (chiefly by his sister) to save him from the amiable vice of betting, which is almost his only serious drawback. But it is understood that wife and "book" are incompatible, and that if Mr. Ivan stands to win Eleanor, he must neither take nor lay money about any other event. Devonshire changes to Paris, where Ivan, who is, as Mr. Dolls would say, "man talent," though abominably lazy, takes to studio work in order to "do something" and deserve his lady love. The cheerful "hazing" (to speak American) of the studio, leads to a sword duel between Ivan and an Italian bully, which is very knowledgably described, except that Mrs. Lang should not say "disengaged on his disengagement," but "counter-disengaged on his change." Eleanor, who by a chance word has rather encouraged the fight, is horribly frightened, but does not become much more enamoured of her amiable but not very sympathique lover. Nor is one hopelessly sorry when he breaks his vow in respect of betting, and so voids the engagement. Number One disposed of, we shall not say (for this anatomizing of a novel by scenes and tableaux is rather hard on the author) who Number Two is, or how he comes upon the scene. Let us only remark, however, that upon our critical honour (which is unspotted) we have rarely read so good a cricket-match in fiction as that which appears early in the second volume. The Ragglesiad in Tom Brown, which Mr. Hughes wrote in his happiest vein, is hardly better. From Lords we go to Invernessshire (by the way, you must drive very far and fast to get to the west coast of Invernessshire by the limited mail at five o'clock: prière pour Argyllshire, if Mrs. Lang likes), and here the intrigue, such as it is, knots itself. Number One is provided on the comfortable plan of chacun à sa chacune; but Eleanor has to wait a little longer while Number Two is disenchanting himself with an Austro-

Russian princess. Meanwhile there is an Oban gathering and some agreeable Highland stories, without too many "ferries" and "whatsoffers" (as to which sacramental phrases Eleanor or Mrs. Lang is a little irreverent), and a famous all-but-accident and rescue, and everything handsome that a novel-reader can possibly expect to have about him, while the dénouement is not allowed to come till we have had a Greek play on Campden Hill and other nice things. This bald enumeration, however, gives no real idea of the attraction of the book, which is most unusual. With very rare exceptions the fiction of the day falls into three classes, each admitting of every variety of badness, if not of goodness. The first is the mere hack-novel, written because it is the writer's business to write novels, or because he would like it to be his business; the second is the novel of purpose; the third is the novel which the writer perhaps thinks, and certainly would like to have thought, the novel of inspiration, and of great passions. Mrs. Lang's book declines enrolment in any of these ragged regiments. It is neither a satire, nor a sermon, nor a prose poem, nor a convenient way of libelling private friends or enemies without fear of gaol or fine, nor a sampler of task-work. Why it should please people who live a certain life to see that life reflected in fiction, Heaven only knows. No writer on æsthetics or apolaustics has ever got near the solution of that mystery. But it does please them, and therefore Mrs. Lang's book ought to have a certainty of pleasure-giving. The only drawback to its universal circulation that we can perceive is that there is apparently another pleasure (though we ourselves cannot pretend to share it), which seems to consist in seeing how people in fiction live in a manner which is neither the reader's manner nor that of any human beings who ever breathed the vital air. If this latter delight does chiefly move any man or woman, let him or her by no means read Mrs. Lang. Neither let him read her if he wants bad taste or bad manners or bad French (by the way, her quotations from English are sometimes apparently derived from unprinted, at least unpublished, texts of well-known works) or bad morals. Neither let him read her if he cannot see a joke, for here be many jokes; neither if he wants passions "grand, epic, homicidal," for here, though the feeling shown is quite natural and human, it is by no means always or often in altitudes. This is, we admit, warning off a very considerable clientèle, and it is possible that Mrs. Lang may be the reverse of grateful to us. But ruat cælum. We have not in the least exaggerated the pleasure and pastime which the book is pretty certain to give to people of good breeding, reasonably wide interests, good taste, and a slight inclination to the humorous view of life. It is a pity, perhaps, that some of the things here are not enshrined in a more durable setting; for the book is deliberately, and almost provokingly, ephemeral in design. But this design is so closely connected with what is best in it, with its pleasant fashion of daffing the world aside and bidding it pass, that it is almost illogical to grumble. In fact, a very determined moralist with a sense of humour (supposing there to be such a person) might detect a moral in the slightness with which the book is put together. Into these regions, however, it is not necessary to enter; and all that is necessary is once more to express thanks to Mrs. Lang for this agreeable entertainment, in which she has chosen to make the figures come like shadows and so depart. There is something remarkably lifelike in your shadow; and, save in quite exceptional circumstances, he is one of the most agreeable of companions.

More than one sentence in Mr. Anstey's new book shows that he is quite alive to the dangers and difficulties of a second appearance. Probably no one ever altered the venerable joke about the "second hour" into an expression of desire to write the second book. Whatever some critics may do, we make it a point of honour to lower, not to raise, expectations in such a case, having regard to the facts of this mortal life. But we must confess, even after this allowance, to a certain feeling of disappointment in The Giant's Robe, and that although we by no means share the somewhat extravagant estimate which was made in some quarters of Vice Versâ. The main idea of the present book has been made familiar to those who have not as well as to those who have read it as it came out in magazine form by a rather unpleasant discussion which we shall notice presently. It is the passing off as his own by a plausible and ambitious but vain and worthless man of a book which has been confided to him by a friend; of his winning by this means not merely fame but love; of the self-sacrifice of his victim, and of the conflict in the mind of his wife when she discovers the rascality of her husband. Such details and embroilments as the story contains form the only excuse for its length, and we shall not dwell on them further than to observe that the thoroughgoing scoundrel of the piece, Harold Caffyn (Mark Ashburn, the wearer of borrowed plumes, is only a parcel-scoundrel, though he is a very complete cad), appears to us an improbable and an uninteresting scoundrel, and that his machinations are unintelligibly devised, and not too reasonably discovered. The occasional touches of broad farce, such as the alcoholising of an intrusive gander, and the blunder of a father who, having the same initial as his son, opens a letter addressed to the latter, and mistakes the rejection of a novel called "Sweet Bells Jangled" for some remarks about the bells of his own house, might not be out of place in a consistent extravaganza, but fall of their effect somewhat in a novel of ordinary life, and, at least in parts, of more than ordinary passion. Lastly, Mr. Anstey's sketches of the more repulsive side of English middle-class life, though not unfaithful, seem to us to lack the redeeming touches which save such things not merely in the work of a great genius like Miss Austen, but in at least the earlier work of a respectable talent like Mrs. Oliphant. The heroine, Mabel Langton, is not bad, and her little sister Dolly is excellent; but these characters, and a few flashes elsewhere, can hardly justify the book. Nor can we entirely pass over the unpleasant subject alluded to above. We need not discuss the general justice of charges of plagiarism of ideas (plagiarism of actual expression is, of course, another thing). But if an author meets such a charge at all, he can only meet it satisfactorily by recognizing the facts fully. Mr. Anstey, in a preface dealing with the subject, says that he has read nothing with such a donnés as his book except a certain Christmas story. He must have seen that other sources, especially Mr. Follett Synge's Tom Singleton, were alleged; and it would have been better, we think, if, at any rate after the finishing of his own book, he had read Tom Singleton, and made a frank acknowledgment of the similarity. Every one is, of course, bound to accept his implied statement that he had and has not read this book; and it is quite unnecessary to inquire whether, in talking over the plan of his own novel with any friend who had read Tom Singleton, he may have unconsciously received suggestions and guilelessly adopted them, or whether any other solution of the difficulty may be discoverable. But in such cases there are, we think, only two courses—complete silence, which in case of innocence, as of guilt, is sometimes best, and a very much more frank and complete dealing with the matter than Mr. Anstey has permitted himself in his preface to The Giant's Robe. For, as it happens, it is not the mere borrowed plumes which this book has in common with Mr. Synge's, but other matters. No man ever loses by frank acknowledgment of even apparent obligations; and, though a different preface would not have made The Giant's Robe a better book, it could certainly have done it no harm.

THE COURT OF THE TUILERIES.*

THERE is a great deal more sound than sense in this history of the Court of the Tuileries. Yet we should not be surprised were we to hear it described as a brilliant piece of writing. The author's style is so pretentious that the ignorant and unsuspicious reader may easily be deceived. In fact, even the wary reviewer may for a few pages remain in some hesitation. But before long he finds that behind the clatter of words there is nothing that follows, and that the further he reads the less capable is he of thinking. As he closes the book he feels that he has been pelted by a pitiless shower of words, but that of fresh ideas he has not received a single one. Neither indeed does he feel the satisfaction of carrying off a new fact or two; for the author is so violent a partisan that he can place no trust in either her statements or her judgment. For her authority she often quotes "private letters." Yet for some of her statements surely to quote any authority at all is ridiculous. Every one knows that Blücher was thrown to the ground at Ligny, that the French cavalry passed over him, that he was remounted, and rejoined his troops. For all this there is no need to give as an authority in the footnote "Private letters of 1814 and 1815." She might almost as well tell her readers that from the best private sources she had learnt that on June 18, 1815, a great battle was fought somewhere in the neighbourhood of Brussels. It were to be wished that she had taken the trouble to study the later writers on the great campaign of 1815, and had not brought up once more all the stale Napoleonic lies about treachery. "These acts of treachery," she adds, "at the very outset of the campaign would not of course have sufficed to give victory to the Allies; but it was because of them the Duke was designated by the French, 'Le héros par hasard,' and that Napoleon's project of surprising the two armies, and placing himself in the space that Wellington and Blücher had left between them, was altogether frustrated." To Lady Jackson, when she makes such a statement as this, we can only make the same reply that Mr. Burchell made to Lady Blarney, "Fudge." She does not openly accuse Grouchy of treachery; he might only have been guilty of indecision. But, owing to his absence from the battlefield and "other contretemps resulting from indecision or treachery," the battle, she says, was lost. But there are traitors still unknown. "If ever," she writes, "the memoirs of M. de Talleyrand reveal the truth, and nothing but the truth, concerning his intriguing and eventful career, they may tell who raised the fatal cry of 'Sauve qui peut!' at Waterloo, and throw a new light on the battle of the 18th of June." What pitiable childishness is this, and how insulting to the general and soldiers of the defeated army! The credulity of the French, and, it would seem, of foreign advocates of the French, is almost immeasurable. Yet it nearly passes belief that any one should seriously maintain that an old statesman was able beforehand to hire traitors, who, in the midst of the roar of a great battle that spread over miles of ground, by raising the cry of "Sauve qui peut!" should break the line of a whole army. Murat's absence from Waterloo was, it seems, as fatal as the presence of these traitors. Lady Jackson says—and if Lady Jackson were Bellona herself she could not speak on military matters with greater confidence—that "there were moments on the fatal 18th when the dauntless intrepidity of that brave officer charging at the head of his cavalry would have broken the English squares and won the battle." Then she goes on to say, and to say as if she accepted the statement, that "it has been asserted that the true victors at Waterloo were the Prince de Benevento and the Duc d'Otranto—otherwise the arch-intriguers Talleyrand and Fouché." When our army entered France, Lady Jackson says, "their extortion of sums of money and their wholesale plundering were shameful; and they received no check from their commanders." On another page she writes that the Anglo-Prussian army in Paris "began to conduct themselves most infamously." That Blücher and his army were guilty of great harshness is unfortunately beyond question. But has Lady Jackson never heard of the infamous treatment that year after year the Prussians had suffered in their own country from their cruel conquerors? But as for the English, has she not read of the strict discipline kept by our Duke? Whatever hidden records leap to light, whatever "Private letters of 1814 and 1815" may be found by Lady Jackson, he never will be shamed. How little she can enter into the English spirit is shown by her statement that "the opening of the campaign of 1815 was announced to the French troops in language very similar to Nelson's address to his men at Trafalgar." What great similarity can be found between Nelson's battle-signal, sublime in its modesty, and Napoleon's, fine though it too was? Nelson's, even had our fleet been conquered, would have sounded just as nobly. But when we read that "For every Frenchman who has heart and courage, the moment is arrived to conquer or perish," and think of their Emperor himself heading the long rout of Frenchmen through the summer night, we detect at once the touch of extravagance. He who had bound himself to conquer or to perish lived to slander brave men who had done their best to win for him the victory.

In all that Napoleon did Lady Jackson can find nothing but what is worthy of praise, and in all that was done by his enemies nothing but what was wicked, or at least ridiculous. When he had pillaged the picture-galleries of Italy he had done a great service to art. If he stole pictures, at all events he cleaned them. In Italy they had been "fast going to destruction from extreme neglect. It was necessary, either carefully to restore, to clean, or, in some cases, as the only means of saving them, to transfer these chefs-d'œuvre to new canvas before they could be publicly exhibited." When the ungrateful Italians insisted on having their pictures returned, she calls the removal of these stolen goods "scenes of lamentation and despair on the one part, and of ruffianly insolence on the other." "Paris," we read in another passage, stood "aghast at the spoliation of the museums and national libraries." Bardolph, after he had stolen a pax, we have no doubt stood aghast when he found that he had to give it up; but for all that "hanged must a' be." She can find no reproaches too severe for the traitors who abandoned Napoleon; but for those who, like Ney and De la Bédoyère, were punished for betraying Louis XVIII., she has nothing but pity. "They were judicially assassinated," she writes in one passage; in another she speaks of their executions as "these hideous assassinations" over which, she says, "let me throw a veil." The veil, we venture to think, should be kept for the murder of the Duke of Enghien. That it would have been an act of politic clemency in the King to extend mercy to Ney and his comrades might well be maintained. That by the laws and the practice of every civilized Government they had forfeited their lives is no less certain. When we pity Ney, let us not forget the thousands of young peasants and town labourers who, but for him and his companions in treachery, might have returned to their homes, whence they had been dragged but to fall in the bloody campaign of 1815.

We are far removed from being admirers of the Bourbons; but of the abuse of the Bourbons, of Lady Jackson's abuse of them at all events, we soon grow weary. Louis XVIII. was fat and Louis XVIII. was gouty. Fat men are often gouty, and gouty men are often fat. But when once she has told us that the King was both one and the other, we are satisfied. That we should be told it again and again is a very poor compliment to our understanding. She mocks at the King's gluttony. He must have been a glutton, indeed, if he ate all that she says he did. Fifteen mutton cutlets, according to this veracious historian, he daily despatched at breakfast, and fifteen mutton cutlets he daily despatched at dinner. Thirty mutton cutlets a day, two hundred and ten mutton cutlets a week, and ten thousand nine hundred and fifty mutton cutlets a year for one elderly gentleman in very infirm health! Of one thing we feel certain. Now and then the meals would have been varied. The royal glutton would by way of variety have taken either thirty sausages or thirty pork chops or thirty beefsteaks. His royal appetite came, we learn, from his forefathers. "Louis XIV. required for his sustenance as much food as five strong men of hearty appetite could consume." Such legends as these we remember in the pages of Goldsmith, but they were told of Roman emperors, not of French kings. She tells us moreover that Louis XIV. always took these vast meals alone, and never ate in the presence of an admiring multitude. St.-Simon, who happened to have lived at the time, must then have lied like a trooper, for in his Memoirs we find Louis taking his meals in the presence of his courtiers. Another new fact we learn of that King. He was, our author tells us, tall, erect, and robust. It was, we suppose, to hide his height that he invented the towering periwig and wore high-heeled shoes.

Still more ridiculous than these statements is one that she makes about "the fête of the 1st of June, 1815." "Considering," she says, "the wholesale slaughter of the people which had occurred in France since 1790, probably few, if any, among the vast crowd assembled on the present occasion took part in the fête of the Federation. Generals de la Fayette and Carnot, Cambacérès and Fouché, with one or two others, and perhaps the Emperor himself, would be almost the only persons who had witnessed it." Can she believe that such a clean sweep had been made of the people of Paris that there were only left among them about half a dozen people old enough to have witnessed a scene that had happened but a quarter of a century before? Her jealousy of the Bourbons in one passage takes a comical form. She is describing the marriage of the Duke of Berry:—

> Royalist accounts speak of the splendour with which, in all its details, this marriage was celebrated as surpassing all preceding ones. Probably the marriage of Napoleon and Maria Louisa would not be included by a Bourbonite in the category of royal marriages; but there is no doubt that it far exceeded the Duc de Berry's in magnificence.

The style in which this book is written is not unworthy of the statements and reflections which it contains. The English language is treated by the author even worse than the English nation. French words are constantly dragged in either through ostentation or laziness. Napoleon, it seems, died in a thunderstorm, though thunder, we are told, is rarely or never heard at St. Helena. If, by the way, it is never heard, how was it heard at his death? Be that as it may, "it rolled with startling fracas over the great man's humble dwelling." Is our language so beggarly a one that to describe a thunderstorm we must borrow a word from the French? Old Lear managed it somehow, mad though he was. St. Helena is in this book Ste. Helène, and Lyons is Lyon, a Prefect is Préfet, the Duke of Orleans is the Duc d'Orléans, and the great Henry is the great Henri. The Senate concludes its séance, a riot is an émeute, and a body is carried to the grave in a funeral cortège. There are not wanting some fine English words to accompany these foreign invaders. The inns of Vienna become Viennese hostelries, bottles of champagne are broached, a change in fashion predicates a revival of plumes, and Louis XVIII. dies as the dial was striking four. As he was only a Bourbon, he might surely have been allowed to die to the sound of a clock. Perhaps, however, we ought to be thankful that the hour was not sounded by either a pendule or an horloge.

WAKE-ROBIN.*

WE are glad to see that the success of Winter Sunshine has encouraged the publication in this country of reprints of two more of Mr. Burroughs's volumes. "John of Birds," as some of his American friends call the author of these charming books about nature, is the latest of those naturalist poets who form so fascinating a class in modern literature. He is of the same breed as Gilbert White of Selborne, as Audubon, as Thoreau, and he combines their exactitude of observation, their scientific sympathy, with more careful study of style than they chose to give in jotting down their impressions. But, although he has the studied charm that care in writing and a familiarity with the English classics gives, Mr. Burroughs's main peculiarity is his indifference to book-learning and the tradition of naturalists, and in this he is like Mr. Richard Jefferies before the latter was persuaded by a too facile success to overwrite himself. "John of Birds" troubles us very little with theories that are not based on his personal observation, or with facts that he has not himself collected in the woods and fields. He is a New England farmer, who has been accustomed to take his holidays, not in towns or watering-places, but among the Maine Woods, or at the Adirondacks, or in the wilds of Canada, and whose eyes have always been open to nature, whether he has been at work or at play.

In the second of the volumes before us, in Locusts and Wild Honey, there is a chapter called "Sharp Eyes" which we especially commend to our readers. It is an education in itself to read these pages, and we can think of no companion more salutary for a young man in the country. The examples of new things at our very doors are described with humorous and picturesque effect, and to an English reader all sense of shame at not having hitherto seen them is removed by the fact that most of them could not be seen on this side of the Atlantic, if we were ever so watchful. To those who have noted the habits of our British woodpeckers the following account of the nest of a species unknown to Europe, the golden-shafted woodpecker or high-hole, will be welcome. It opens with an excellent observation:—

> The woodpeckers are not nest-builders, but rather nest-carvers. The time seemed very short before the voices of the young were heard in the heart of the old tree—at first feebly, but waxing stronger day by day until they could be heard many rods distant. When I put my hand upon the trunk of the tree, they would set up an eager, expectant chattering; but if I climbed up it towards the opening, they soon detected the unusual sound, and would hush quickly, only now and then uttering a warning note. Long before they were fully fledged they clambered up to the orifice to receive their food. As but one could stand in the opening at a time, there was a good deal of elbowing and struggling for this position. . . . The fresh air must have been a consideration, for the interior of a high-hole's nest is not sweet. When the parent birds came with food, the young one in the opening did not get it all; but after he had received a portion, either on his own motion or on a hint from the old one, he would give place to the one behind him. Still, one bird evidently outstripped his followers, and in the race of life was two or three days in advance of them. His voice was loudest and his head oftenest at the window. But I noticed that when he had kept the position too long, the others evidently made it uncomfortable in his rear, and after fidgetting about awhile, he would be compelled to back down. But retaliation was then easy, and I fear his mates spent few agreeable moments at that look-out. They would close their eyes and slide back into the cavity, as if the world had suddenly lost its charm for them.

It is not easy to review these volumes except by quotation. We find ourselves, in reading them both, moving in the conduct of a most genial and delightful companion, whose enterprise and humour and whose strong humanity temper the earnestness of his purpose and the breadth of his knowledge. Wake-Robin deals with birds almost entirely; the author calls it "an invitation to the study of ornithology," and he certainly woos the dubious student in extremely dulcet tones. He tells us about the mysterious coming and going of the migratory species, and something of the impulse which directs their movements. He tells us of the feathered population that make the old hemlock woods hilarious when nobody is by to rudely disturb their sequestered mirth. He shows us what birds the spring brings to the environs of Washington, to the Adirondacs, to the Pine Mountains in the south of New York State, and everywhere he is the same lively and refreshing companion. As a writer Mr. Burroughs strikes us as singularly free from any sort of affectation, and it is the manly simplicity of his style which gives it so great a charm. He loves to watch the creatures at peace in their homes, but he does not pretend to be a humanitarian. He is a sportsman all through; and the poet—was it not Emerson?—who asked "Hast thou named all the birds without a gun?" would receive from him a frank confession in the negative.

The book of Locusts and Wild Honey is not less delightful, but more miscellaneous in its contents. It deals with the habits of bees, the growth of strawberries, the question "Is it going to rain?" the habit of using one's eyes in the woods, and a dozen such bewitching subjects of natural gossip. We have very seldom the pleasure of meeting with two little volumes which we can recommend to our readers so entirely without reserve as these.

LIFE OF LUTHER.*

THE translation of Dr. Köstlin's book is perhaps the only solid thing left behind it by the English celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of Luther's birthday. The author has the repute in his own fatherland of being the most completely furnished "Lutherkenner" of our generation. Scholars who differ most widely from him in his view of his hero, whether from the anti-Lutheran or ultra-Lutheran side, agree in conceding that no other modern biographer of the Reformer has made so encyclopædic and conscientious a study of all the accessible materials, at least of all which were accessible prior to the recent publication of the Vatican documents. When we speak of this book as "solid," however, we use the quality comparatively, for we cannot but bear in mind the very paltry character of the whole of the Luther literature which was contributed last year by English pens in honour of the German Reformer. The work promised by Dr. Wace was not ready in time for the November festival, and no other Englishman who could pretend to be a scholar, historian, and theologian felt inspired to stand forward as the colleague of Mr. Tupper and Dr. Stoughton. But it must not be forgotten that this book, which so brilliantly outshines all its English competitors of the same date, is not a translation of Dr. Köstlin's really important contributions to Luther literature, of the two volumes on the Reformer's life and writings, or of the two volumes on his theology and its historical development. These were works for scholars and inquirers, whereas the present book is nothing more than a translation of the abridged "Life," prepared by Dr. Köstlin, as he tells us in his short preface, for the service of "the wide circle of what are called educated German readers." Everybody in Germany a few months ago was talking about Luther, and it was necessary that the talkers should know something about him. The book answered to the occasion. It contains nine parts of hagiography to only a tenth part of criticism. It may be fairly described as a long festival sermon to Germans on the feast-day of the greatest and most popular of the national heroes. The reviewer who complains that such a book is not sufficiently critical might as reasonably complain that the sermon of a Roman Catholic preacher on the festival of St. Francis de Sales dwells too much upon his virtues and too little upon his faults. The book does not contain a single verifying reference, and its author expressly cautions his critics that if they want to see the grounds on which his statements are based they must turn from this sketch to his larger picture, Luther, sein Leben und seine Schriften. The failings of the Reformer as a man and a theologian are not indeed wholly ignored; but it quite belongs to the book's "occasional" character, in an old sense of that adjective, that the failings of the ideal hero of the Germans should be touched with an exceedingly tender and sparing hand. The pressure is remarkably light in Dr. Köstlin's handling of the Peasants' War, as it also is in his treatment of the ugliest sore of all—the bigamy of Philip of Hesse, which nearly killed Melancthon, and which was opposed so vehemently by the courageous but headstrong Nicholas von Amsdorf, the "Bishop" of the Lutherans, whom Luther reverenced as his superior, and whom he declared to be a "theologian by nature." It is curious that the most elaborate and powerful apology for the part of Luther in this terrible scandal should have been composed by an Englishman, Archdeacon Hare, and not by a German. In his handling of the conflict with the Swiss, Dr. Köstlin does not fail to do justice to Zwingli. Throughout the book its "occasional" character is evident in the stress which the author lays upon the national character of his hero. The German reverence for Luther is a tradition too deeply ingrained to be affected by criticism. For the great mass of every people the reverence for the national heroes must of course always rest mainly upon tradition. The German reverence for Luther differs from that of other nations for their heroes in the fact that Luther the Hausvater is as completely the hero of the German family as the public Luther is the hero of the German nation. A picture of the heroic Luther at Worms, or of the militant Luther affixing the theses to the door of the Schlosskirche at Wittenberg, is invariably paired with a picture of the domestic Luther in the midst of his family. The happy German parsonage, from which so great a host of eminent men have proceeded, "the sons of the clergy," is the creation of Luther. Dr. Köstlin, the one German who knows most about Luther, has found this tradition existing and powerful, and in his abridged Life of the national hero has aimed chiefly at showing how fully the national tradition is justified by the facts. That the hold of Luther upon the German mind is to be sought in his objective national and family character, as the German of the Germans, and not in his subjective doctrine, has been keenly perceived by French critics of all schools. It was pointed out during the celebrations of last November by journals so opposed as the République Française and the Univers. Indeed, the latter went so far as to propose something like a ground of union, or rather of truce, betwixt Atheistic French Republicans and Clericalist French Ultramontanes in their common and necessary hatred to Luther as the Germanissimus Germanorum. "Every Frenchman," the Univers said, "must curse Luther." The war with Bismarck was a war with Luther. The "great revenge" of France against Germany will not only be a triumph of the anti-clerical Republic over Bismarck, but a triumph of the Pope over Protestantism. Gambetta and Pius IX. will rejoice together over it. "The first French army which crosses the Rhine," though it may be full of fanatical anti-clericalists, will discern that it is its first duty "to cast down all the statues of Luther. The fall of the Protestant Empire and the destruction of the heresy of the monk of Wittenberg will be celebrated in the 'Te Deum' sung by the French victors in Berlin." Dr. Döllinger, even when he could still be called a Roman Catholic, could not quite free himself from a German's natural pride in Luther. It is not hard to detect this in the biography of the Reformer which he contributed a quarter of a century ago to the Freiburg Kirchenlexikon, which he afterwards republished separately under the title of Luther, eine Skizze. It was surely a patriotic admiration which moved him to call the Reformer "a German man, and that man the greatest man of his age." It seems to have escaped the French critics that Luther, at one crisis of his life, seriously thought of seeking a refuge in France. After his escape from Augsburg, when Cajetan urged the Elector Frederick to send his troublesome subject to Rome, Luther imagined that France would be the safest country into which he could flee, because in his appeal from the Pope to the Council he had been asking upon the famous precedent of the University of Paris. It would have been a singular anticipation of the "great revenge" if the French had gallicized the German of the Germans.

Dr. Köstlin's abridgement can only be of secondary use to scholars; indeed, it is far less useful than the articles which he contributed two years ago to the new edition of the Leipzig Realencyclopädie. We should have thought that "the wide circle of educated German readers" for whom it was compiled ought at least to have been supplied with an index, and with dates at the head of each page. The author frequently departs from the strict pursuit of the order of time, so that he may pursue more conveniently the order of subject. This is always confusing in a biography, and it is especially confusing in a biography of Luther, because it is important to know at what point in his development of his theological and ecclesiastical position, and under what pressure of outward circumstances, he made this or that utterance. The translation is unusually good, and we rarely detect that we are not reading an original English work. There is a touch of affectation in the rendering of Cajetan and Bucer into forms so utterly novel among us as "Caietan" and "Butzer." Bucer had so much to do with England, not wholly to the profit of the English Church, that he might at least have been allowed to keep the name which has been acclimatized in English history and controversy for more than three hundred years. Besides, Luther himself called him Bucer. We recollect one of his uncomplimentary references to "the Bucer" in a letter to Chancellor Brück in 1543 on the Articles of the reforming Archbishop and Elector of Köln, Hermann von Wied—"Ich das Klappermaul, den Bucer, hier wol spüre" (Walch, xxi. 486, 487). One of the most useful and interesting features of the present volume is its rich supply of really good woodcuts, especially its faithful reproductions of portraits by Dürer and Cranach, and from other contemporary originals. There are seventeen by Cranach alone.

A translation of Dr. Köstlin's abridgment would have been a more appropriate contribution to the English celebration of the Luther festival, if it had been put under the editorship of a competent English historian and theologian. The committee which organised and directed the English celebration was composed chiefly of men who knew very little indeed about Luther. Let it be granted that England, like all the rest of the world, owes a great deal to Luther. If this be the case, it was surely to be wished that a Life of Luther for the use of the English people should have been something more than a lazy translation of a Life of Luther written expressly for the German people. It should have laid some stress upon the relations between Luther and the English during his life and after his death. It might have indicated the remarkable debts of Luther, during his best period, to the writings of the great Englishman, William Occam. A hot English anti-Lutheran, indignant at what he thought the undue fuss being made about Luther in England, gravely proposed the publication of the controversial book of King Henry VIII. against the German monk as a profitable antidote. Mr. Spurgeon had the wit to discover that most of our own countrymen who took any eager part in celebrating the Luther festival would have been condemned by Luther as heretics; while Luther would have sympathized most, as he "symbolized" most, with those amongst us who took no eager part in keeping the November feast. A collection of Luther's own sayings about our ancestors, and his criticisms upon our national character, which were certainly not founded upon a very exact knowledge, would at least have had the merit of being amusing; while a catena of English Nonconformists and Separatist condemnations of all that was distinctively Lutheran in theology and the doctrine of the Sacraments as distinctly "Popish," would have been instructive and profitable. The one point which distinguishes the Lutheran separation from the English Reformation—the relation between the reformers and the bishops—is touched upon in Dr. Köstlin's abridgment; but it is not developed. He is bound by the necessities of his position, as well as by the traditions of German Protestantism, to under-estimate its significance. In Luther's extraordinary consecration of his friend and disciple, Nicholas von Amsdorf, as "Bishop" of Naumburg, we may perhaps detect the precedent for John Wesley's equally extraordinary consecration of one of his disciples as a "Bishop." Luther held that the bishops possessed a jus divinum only in the sense in which kings, electoral princes, and the emperor, possessed it—the office had been evolved by the providence of God in His government of the human kind. Apostolical succession, other than that which is directly communicated to every Christian through the Sacrament of Baptism, did not belong to the episcopate. Luther's doctrine, it must be noted, was totally unlike the ordinary Protestant doctrine, which declares every "Christian" to be a priest by virtue of "conversion." It is impossible in this world to be quite sure who is and who is not properly "converted," as the history of Protestant sectarianism, with its ceaseless generation of new sects, has sufficiently proved. It may be certain that every Christian is a priest; but what irrefragable proof is there that this man or that woman is a Christian? Luther's reply is held by all Protestant sectaries to be fundamentally anti-Protestant. He declares baptism to be the sufficient proof of Christianity, the ordination to the Christian priesthood. If he had logically developed his theory he must have conceded the priesthood to women. The clergy, in his view, were simply those among the priests who had been elected and set apart for the special ministry of the word and sacraments. When the Bishop of Naumburg died, the Chapter of the Cathedral elected their scholarly provost, Johann von Pflug, as his successor. It was the custom of the canons to apply for the congé d'élire of the Elector, their sovereign, who virtually nominated the new bishop. They omitted the application in this case, on the ground that the Elector, Johann Friedrich, had ceased to be a Catholic. The Elector rejected their choice, and nominated Nicholas von Amsdorf as Bishop of Naumburg and Zeiz, giving as his four reasons for the fitness of the appointment that Nicholas von Amsdorf was unmarried, gifted, learned, and of noble birth. The Evangelical prelate received the "Huldigung" of the municipal council of Naumburg on the 20th of January, 1542, and two days later took possession of Zeiz. Luther himself "consecrated" Amsdorf in the Cathedral with the laying on of hands; and the people of the diocese were informed that a true and genuine bishop had been chosen for them by the sovereign and the estates, in union with the clergy, and they were called upon to give their consentient "Amen," after the example of the Christian people in the age of St. Cyprian. The canons of the Cathedral were ordered to take the oath of obedience to their new "Bishop." The Elector prohibited Amsdorf from signing himself, after the manner of the Catholic bishops, gratia Dei or "von Gottes Gnaden." If any one will take the pains, as we have taken, to go through all the subsequent letters of Luther to Amsdorf during the few years of his "episcopate," he will be surprised at the pertinacity with which the Reformer insisted upon treating the "Bishop" whom he had himself consecrated as his own ecclesiastical superior. He regularly gave the title of "Bishop" to any preacher who ministered to a group of congregations; but at the same time he invariably called each of these unconsecrated bishops his "brother." Thus he addressed Bucer in 1540 as "Bishop of the Churches of Strassburg" and his "beloved brother in Christ"; and Lauterbach as "Priest and Bishop of Pirna and the neighbouring Churches" and his "dearest brother in the Lord." Spalatin, Rymäus, Pfeffinger, and others, were each addressed as "Bishop and brother." But there is a gradual accession in dignity and reverence of address in Luther's letters to Amsdorf between the date of the consecration of Amsdorf as Bishop of Naumburg and the death of the Reformer. In his letters to Amsdorf prior to his consecration Luther always addressed him as his "brother," but after that event he at once began to write to the Evangelical prelate as "the reverend in Christ, Lord Nicholas von Amsdorf, Bishop in Naumburg, his venerated superior in the Lord." In 1544 and 1545 Luther dropped the surname, addressed Amsdorf simply by his Christian name, and began to call him his "father in Christ." During the three last years of his life Luther never failed to address Amsdorf in the customary forms used in writing to Catholic bishops. A letter on "the day of St. Vitus, 1545," in which Luther thanks his "reverend father" for a present of wine, and informs him that "Satan had kept him awake all night with the agonies of the stone," is subscribed, "To the reverend father in God, Nicholas, Bishop of Naumburg, our most gracious lord." The same formula is used by Luther in all his later letters to Amsdorf. The masterful Wesley differed widely from Luther in this respect, for Wesley never allowed his Methodist "Bishop" to suppose that he had elevated him into his own superior by ordaining him to the episcopate.

DIARY AND LETTERS OF THOMAS HUTCHINSON.*

GOVERNOR HUTCHINSON played a conspicuous and important part in some of the events which preceded the War of American Independence. He was most honestly attached to the principle of maintaining the connexion between the colonies now forming part of the United States and the mother-country, and he lost much by his devotion to an unsuccessful cause. In all the relations of life his character appears to have been estimable and blameless. He is further well known by his own History of the Colony of Massachusetts. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that his great-grandson should entertain a high respect for his memory, and should think it incumbent upon him to edit the diary and letters of his ancestor, with a view to the vindication of his public conduct—a conduct which is amply recorded in history, and which would appear to all impartial readers to stand in no want of vindication, and upon the explanation of which little or no additional light is now thrown by his zealous descendant, although he claims to fill an important blank in the history of the American Revolution, and a bulky volume has been produced by him in his attempt to do so.

It is indeed sometimes unfortunate when papers and letters have been preserved to an inordinate extent in a preceding generation, and when the piety of ancestor-worship is displayed in similar excess in a succeeding one. It is also to be regretted when the laudable desire to do justice to a reputation which is supposed to be in need of defence, and to do honour to a worthy progenitor, is not accompanied by the literary skill and experience required to make the best use of materials, especially when they are themselves generally deficient in points of novel and salient interest.

The general facts of the life of Governor Hutchinson are well known. He was a native of Boston, a circumstance which tended to aggravate his unpopularity when he took part against his fellow-colonists. He first came to London as agent for Boston in 1738. He was for many years a member of the Colonial Chamber in Massachusetts, of which he was for three years Speaker. After having been for some time on the Colonial Council, he became Lieutenant-Governor, and was finally appointed Governor in 1770, having also for some time filled the place of Chief Justice, although not a regularly trained lawyer. Hutchinson's name, however, is probably most familiar in connection with the once-famous correspondence which by some means came into the hands of Franklin, which was afterwards published, and which led to the proceedings which, more than any others, determined Franklin to a course of implacable hostility against England, and completely put an end to any hopes of a peaceful solution of the existing difficulties between Great Britain and her North American possessions.

The story is well told by the late Earl Stanhope in his history of the period. So far back as in 1765 Hutchinson's unpopularity in Boston was so great that his house was then sacked by a mob, a circumstance not likely to improve the friendly nature of his relations with his colonial fellow-subjects, and his lack of favour in America was shared by his brothers-in-law Andrew, Lieutenant-Governor, and Peter Oliver, Chief Justice, as well as by his sons, to whom some of the unfortunate tea cargoes were consigned. The letters in question were written by the Governor and by Andrew Oliver to Mr. Thomas Whateley, who had been at one time Secretary under Mr. Grenville, and was afterwards Under-Secretary of State to Lord Suffolk, and who died in 1772. After Whateley's death these letters passed into the possession of Franklin, at that time resident in London as agent for the House of Assembly of Massachusetts, and they were transmitted by him to the Speaker of that House. They were letters which had not been written in a public capacity, although relating to public affairs and tending to influence public measures, but which contained nothing which was unworthy of the writers as public officials and opponents of colonial independence. But they did contain strong and unguarded expressions against the opposition party in Boston, and certainly were never intended for publication. The American view of them is, that they were as untrue in their statements as they were insidious in their intentions in describing the prevailing discontent as due to a factious spirit and intrigues, and in suggesting coercion and recourse to military force.

They were sent by Franklin without disclosing the person from whom he had received them, accompanied by his statement that he had got them under the promise that they should not be generally made known or printed, and that they were to be returned to him after having been seen only for their private satisfaction by a few men of important position, and with the wish that a good understanding should prevail between the mother-country and the Colonies.

* Diary and Letters of Thomas Hutchinson, Governor of Massachusetts. Compiled by P. O. Hutchinson. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1883.

It is not surprising that the letters got into wider circulation than may have been intended, and that they were ultimately printed and published, with the result that a petition was sent to England for the dismissal of the writers from the public offices held by them. Mr. William Whateley, a surviving brother of the recipient of the letters, took the matter up; and suspicion fell upon Mr. John Temple, who had been a Commissioner of Customs at Boston, and who was a friend of Franklin's, as the person who had communicated the letters to him. A very savage duel took place between these gentlemen, of which full particulars are given in the present volume; and, as he alleged, to prevent further bloodshed and complications, Franklin then avowed himself as the person responsible for the publication of the letters; and this brought upon him an application made by the brother in the Court of Chancery in respect of his share in the transaction.

The public and more important part of the matter proceeded to the hearing of the Massachusetts petition before the Privy Council, which took place on the eventful 29th January, 1774. Franklin was present, and the arguments for the petitioners were feebly supported by Dunning and Lee; while, on the other hand, Wedderburn, who appeared as Solicitor-General for the Crown, made an effective speech, full of strong remarks and taunts against Franklin, such as it was impossible for him to forget or forgive. The petition was dismissed. All remaining hopes of reconciliation were destroyed by the removal of Franklin from his office of Deputy Postmaster-General in America, and the resort to arms which had for so long a time been looming in the distance now became inevitable.

In the month of July 1774 Governor Hutchinson came to England, and the diary begins, which, although not without interest, cannot be said to add anything of value to what was already known of the matters of historical moment to which it relates. He was naturally much with Lord Dartmouth, the Secretary of State, at that time attending to American affairs, and on his arrival was almost immediately introduced by him to the King. The conversation which passed in a long interview is given without abridgment, and exhibits George III. to some advantage. The King approved of the Governor's administration, and said that nothing could be more cruel than the treatment he had met with in the betraying of his private letters. The Governor then named the six persons to whom, as he understood, the communication of the letter had been limited by Franklin, and the King asked many questions showing his minute knowledge of persons and events and his desire to get all the information he could from his visitor.

Hutchinson appears to have had access to some of the best society in London, and some illustrations of the life and manners of the period may be gleaned from his journal. He officially attended Lord Dartmouth's levées, and was frequently at the King's Court, then habitually held on Sundays. On Sunday evenings, too, there were receptions at the houses of the Lord Chancellor and of Lord Mansfield, as well as by Dr. Heberden, the eminent physician, at whose receptions were present bishops and other dignitaries of the Church. But the Governor seems to have been a plain New Englander, with few tastes and of unadorned mind, and without that power of graphically describing what is heard and seen which is so necessary to give any charm to a regular record of the events of daily life. He paid visits in the country, and mentions the hours of meals at Lord Townsend's, in Norfolk, as breakfast at eleven, dinner at half-past four, and supper at eleven. At another country house, where cards were played in the evening, it is said that the mean custom was kept up of making the guests pay for the cards used by them. This is followed by the very intelligible remark that veils are generally laid aside, which occasions the wonderful inquiry by the editor in a note of "What does this mean?" A still more remarkable note is added in another place, in which the excellent Governor says that he preferred Terence's Andria, as seen by him at Westminster School, to some recent performances at which he had assisted at Drury Lane and Covent Garden, to which the following information is appended:—"Terence, originally a manumitted slave, was the author of the words—'homo sum, humani nil a me alienum puto.' His Andria is said to have been adapted from Menander." After attending an evening party, the Governor descants on the name of "rout" as having given an unfavourable idea of such meetings in New England; for that nothing can be more moderate, decent, and respectable than such assemblies.

The opinions expressed in the diary and letters amply confirm the fact that in England a very inadequate notion was entertained of the powers of resistance possessed by the colonies, and of their determination to exert them. The preparations for a Southern Congress in 1774 are ridiculed, and the strongest belief is stated in the impotence of the colonies to withstand the unanimous will of the mother-country to retain them in subjection. Towards the end of this year Hutchinson seems to have thought that some reconciliation could be effected by a modified exercise of the superintendence of Parliament. But it was then too late for any compromise to be accepted. The colonies knew their own adult strength, although it was not yet appreciated in England, and were resolved upon securing complete independence; and it is a curious coincidence that on the very day when Hutchinson was committing to paper his views of a possible mode of arrangement (4th Nov., 1774) the Declaration of Rights was issued at Philadelphia.

The diary is now published down to the end of 1775. It is said to have been continued by Governor Hutchinson as far as May 1780, and that what remains to be printed, together with the further letters of concurrent date, exceeds in bulk all that has been given in the present volume. If more should be published, the editor proposes adopting a judicious selection, instead of the full transcript of the diary and letters which now appears. Such a course may be recommended as a very desirable one, for the editor's own lamentation over a certain letter which he has printed, that it is a very disappointing one, will probably be extended by most of his readers to the greater part of what he has thought it his pious and pitiless duty to communicate at full length to the public.

ARCTIC TRAVEL.*

THERE is some cause for regret that Mr. McCormick has not exercised more discretion in preparing the diaries of his Arctic and Antarctic voyages for the press. In their present shape, we must confess, there is too apparent a need of a thorough winnowing and rearrangement of these bulky volumes, whose want of sequence and method promises fair to baffle the patience and enterprise of the average reader of works of travel. If, in the interests of the general public, Mr. McCormick could have enlisted the services of some such mysterious agency as is now familiar in artistic circles under the name of "a ghost," we feel he would have given his book that chance of success it fairly merits: as it is, only enthusiasts in the matter of Polar voyages will, we fear, take the pains to study the printed evidence of his travelled career. Whatever may be the shortcomings of his literary method, the author has deserved well at our hands for the numerous reproductions of his original sketches of places very rarely illustrated by careful and accurate observers: his very interesting panorama of the great volcanic range on the Antarctic coast, of which Mounts Erebus and Terror are the loftiest peaks, being for that reason of peculiar interest and value. Indeed, when we take into account the great variety of Arctic experience which has fallen to the lot of the writer of this book, we cannot but regret that its narrative is not characterized by picturesque description and local information, as well as by frequent and elaborate illustration. Mr. McCormick is a member of the medical service of the English navy, and in his official capacity and as a scientific collector and investigator has served on no less than three Polar expeditions. In 1827 he was of the party who, with Parry as their leader, sought the North Pole from the western side of Greenland. Twelve years later he sailed in the Erebus, which with its famous consort the Terror was under the command of Captain Ross, to explore the Southern seas; visiting in three successive years that extraordinary barrier of ice and mountain which cuts off the Antarctic Ocean from a hitherto unexplored continent. On the first visit of Ross to this region he found, and named after his vessels, the splendid peaks of Erebus and Terror, of whose grand outlines the panoramic sketch before alluded to gives an excellent idea. Few sights on our globe can be more impressive than Mount Erebus as it towers twelve thousand feet above the frozen edge of that desolate coast, pouring forth night and day a pillar of smoke and flame into the chill gloom.

On one of these voyages a collision in the night nearly sent the Erebus and Terror to the bottom, and the former only escaped the one peril to find herself under the lee of an iceberg, whose hard, blue sides she almost scraped with her yards—an imminent peril from which alone she was saved by the calmness and fine seamanship of her captain. In these years spent in Southern seas Mr. McCormick became the friend of Sir John Franklin, then the Governor of Tasmania—a friendship which led him to take an active interest in the schemes which many years later were set on foot for the rescue of that unfortunate adventurer in the Northern Arctic circle. Mr. McCormick accompanied the squadron of Sir Edward Belcher, fitted out by the English Government in the hope of finding traces of the lost expedition, and was especially eager to conduct a boat expedition up Melville Channel, where he believed it was most likely Franklin and his comrades might have been. Obstacles, however, the nature of which he himself relates at considerable length, were created; and he returned to England after one abortive, but hazardous, boat journey in a sea rapidly closing up with incoming ice.

As a continuation of the tradition of Arctic adventure and heroism, the log of the steamer Jeannette, edited by the wife of her gallant commander, Lieutenant De Long, of the United States navy, is extremely interesting. The story of a failure—for the Jeannette practically failed to get anywhere except on top of an ice-floe—the simple, manly narrative, which is the literary legacy of Mr. De Long, can scarcely be read with unquickened feelings. The Jeannette, better known to Englishmen as the Pandora, was sold in 1879 to Mr. Gordon Bennett, of New-York, by her owner, Sir Allen Young, to be employed on an Arctic venture which Mr. Bennett was desirous to carry out. This venture was instigated by De Long, a brilliant and daring officer, who had already greatly distinguished himself in the expedition fitted out by the Government of the United States for the relief of the Polaris, and who had a deeply-rooted belief that the real route to the Polar seas lay rather through Behring's Straits than by the more old-fashioned courses along the eastern and western shores of Greenland. De Long, moreover, was intensely ambitious to carry the American flag nearer to the North Pole than any of the European seamen who had preceded him, and it was his hope to make, if possible, at any hazard, some important discovery. In Mr. Bennett he met a generous patron, who cheerfully undertook the formidable charges of his scheme, and started him on his voyage admirably found, so far as foresight could provide where so much was inevitably unforeseen. The ship sailed from San Francisco in July 1879; and, after a brief space of sailing in the Arctic seas, found herself beset in pack-ice. For nearly two years the luckless vessel and her crew were held fast in the floe, drifting helplessly north, west, south, and east as the wind impelled the ice.

The daily record of De Long's log reveals the weariness of these tedious months of inactivity; the strain on the Captain himself of a responsibility almost too heavy to be borne, yet obviously borne with manly and cheerful courage; the hourly perils from the recurring disturbances of the ice; the chafing disappointment of frustrated plans. The terror of such an Arctic captivity would appear from this narrative to be of a singularly strange and awe-inspiring kind. During the summer months, when there is comparatively little or no disturbance of the ice, the senses of sight and hearing are oppressed by the prospect of a boundless plain, heaped with tumbled ice-hills, and the universal stillness of the frozen waste; but, with the approach of winter, the ice is all activity, the air is filled with a tumult of shrieks and explosions, and the noise of incessant rending and grinding; huge masses of solid ice, forced upwards by the enormous strain beneath, are shot with a hideous din on the surface of the floe; the floes themselves of a sudden cleave asunder, and then, coming together with a stupendous crash, hurl their shattered edges into the air. In such scenes, with the knowledge that at any moment the ice on which they were cradled might pass beneath them and engulf their vessel, eager for the pack to dissolve and give them a chance of release, the crew and their officers patiently awaited the issue. At last, in June 1881, the crisis came—the ice parted, and catching the Jeannette in its grip, so crushed her frame that she sank after a few hours.

But one thing remained to the sailors, and that was to seek as best they might the Siberian shore. Thanks to the care of their officers, little sickness had occurred on the Jeannette, and the party started in good health to drag their boats and sledges over the ice. The task was stupendous; the ice was one succession of piled-up barriers, intersected by open waterways. On some days, after hours of effort, the advance was little more than a mile, rarely more than four a day. At the end of eighty days they reached the open sea, and hoped for safety. But, as they sailed for the estuary of the Lena, a storm separated their boats, and driven to various points on the coast, they were scattered, never again to join company. De Long, with those in his boat, landed in the delta of the Lena, only to perish miserably of famine in its trackless wastes; one boat, under the care of the ship's engineer, Mr. Melvillo, had the fortune to be driven to the West, and to chance on a native settlement; a third boat and its crew are presumed to have been lost at sea, no traces of it or its occupants having been met with by the relief parties, which searched every corner of that coast in the course of the subsequent year. The immense sufferings of De Long and his men appear from the daily entries in his diary. Their health had grievously suffered from their week's exposure in the open boats after quitting the ice-floe. One of the men was so enfeebled that rapid progress was impossible, and their supply of food had fallen so short that the speedy discovery of human dwellings was a matter of life and death. To add to their difficulties, they were misled by their maps, which proved useless in a district whose features varied yearly with the floods that hold it submerged for six months at a time, and their expectations were raised only to be rudely demolished by the belief that they should quickly come to a settlement where they might obtain shelter and food. Each day brought fresh disappointment and diminished strength to the unfortunate wanderers. An entry in De Long's journal, dated 20th September, 1881, helps us to realize the hardships they endured.

> I found our progress was terribly slow. Every one of us seems to have lost all feeling in his toes, and some of us even half-way up the feet. That terrible week in the boat has done us great injury. . . . I ordered tea made and pemmican served out. We opened our last can (forty-five pounds), and in order to make it hold out, I so cut it that it must suffice for four days' food. Then we are at the end of our provisions, and must eat the dog, unless Providence sends something in our way. When the dog is eaten——?
> I was much impressed and derive great encouragement from an accident of last Sunday. Our Bible got soaking wet, and I had to read the epistle and gospel out of my Prayer-book. According to my rough calculation, it was the Fifteenth Sunday after Trinity, and the gospel contained some promises which seemed peculiarly adapted to our condition.

The words that cheered this brave officer were the great and inspiring advice, "Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink, nor yet for your body what ye shall put on."

But, despite all efforts to reach a place of security, Mr. De Long was overmastered by the terrible obstacles in his path. With the horrors of the Siberian winter beginning, all food gone, and his men reduced to death's door, he was forced at last to cease his tardy progress, and send forward two of his strongest followers to search for help. The story of their efforts, and want of success to relieve in time their Captain and comrades, is simply told by Mrs. De Long in these pages. Relief when it came was weeks too late; the last feeble entry in De Long's diary fixes the date of his death on or about October 30. It was not until the following March that Mr. Melville, whose determination, great courage, and intelligence are very manifest, discovered the bodies of his friends buried in the snow on the river-bank, and was able to remove them to a secure place overlooking the great river-bed of the Lena for burial.

It is only necessary to add that these pages contain something more than a mere chronicle of human disappointment and discomfiture. De Long was an observant and intelligent student of the regions in which he so long remained an unwilling prisoner, and he has left us the full result of his experience. Like most who come into contact with realities, he grew deeply sceptical of the truth of many of the accepted doctrines relative to the Polar seas, and seems to have had good reason. The preparation of this book for the press must, we feel, have been for Mrs. De Long a labour of love. Much praise is none the less due to her for the care and precision with which she has carried out her task. Probably no better memorial of the brave sailor who led the crew of the Jeannette could be found than the simple story which is now laid before the public. It is one of the few satisfactory features of this sad story that Mr. Melville and Mr. Danenhauer, who were able and brave in support of their Captain in all his trials, are still living to testify to the heroism and steady discipline of those who have perished, and perhaps to give us at some future time the result of their observations and experience in Arctic seas.

FIVE NOVELS.*

THE reviewer of novels, in the exercise of his harmless necessary calling, is constrained to sympathize (or the reverse) with a great many ideals and ambitions, and to bow down and worship (or the reverse) before a great many types of hero and heroine. Fresh from the achievements of Ouida's gorgeous mind, he must go forth and disport himself among the innocent creations of Miss Yonge. Scarce has he put by the tempestuous blandishments of Miss Broughton ere he must make himself all ear and intelligence for the temperate and delicate siren-strains of Mr. Henry James. After a cruise under the Jolly Roger with Ben Gunn and Long John Silver, he must exalt his intellect to the level of the inhuman originality, the cryptogamic brilliance, the unnatural novelty and freshness of the author of the Tragic Comedians and the epic of Sir Willoughby Patterne. It is written that variety is charming; but to him satiated with change, debauched as Mr. Venus was by incessant intercourse with "human various," the adage is a trifle pointless and misleading. Probably it is so to the humble rag-and-bone man and the nobler dealer in marine stores, and for much the same reason. For of course there is variety and variety; that of the British Museum and that of Bollin's Bower, the Shakspearian species and the species developed from Mudie's. Equally, of course, the one is not the other, and between the Shakspearian and the Mudiesque there is a great gulf fixed. To pursue the subject further were a task invidious and fraught with peril. To say that the reviewer of novels is acquainted with the Shakspearian species by reputation only is to say everything. To note that in the present batch of novels the heroic interest is supplied by a model Atheist, a lovely female journalist, a "high-toned" American widow, a ditto ditto widower, a proud and desperate idiot, some very natural and pleasing children, an artful and eccentric murderer, a gifted but repentant Nihilist, a choice selection of maids and matrons of extraordinary beauty and accomplishments, a noble parson, and a brother so sweet and self-sacrificing as to be almost unique in fiction, is to explain the origin of these preliminary reflections, if not to excuse their temper.

In We Two the author of Donovan, still harping on the right of man to disbelieve as he lists, tells us the story of Raeburn, the Atheist, and his valiant little daughter Erica. Raeburn is a model of his kind. He is "very tall," and of "remarkably benign aspect"; he has a "grand head"; he is "middle-aged, yet venerable," or rather "devotional-looking"; and he is "pervaded" by "a certain majesty of calmness," which seems "hardly suited to his character of public agitator." So much for his outer man. Morally and mentally he is an epitome of all the virtues. He edits the Idol- breaker, it is true; but he is admirably eloquent, laborious as the ant of fable, generous, high-minded, brave as Bayard, intellectual as George Eliot, sincere as Danton, magnetic as Mesmer, liberal as Pangloss, the Luther of Freethought, the heroic infidel, a combination of all that is noble in man and lecturer, saint and journalist, martyr and agitator—Beales and Grandison and Spinoza rolled into one, in short, and somehow failing to "come off." Raeburn, it need hardly be said, is the object of dreadful persecutions. Religious soap-boilers libel him, and as he is an Atheist juries cut down his damages to the lowest possible figure; Christian mobs unite to tear his coat, and break his head, and roll him in the mud; parsons backbite and slander him, and nonconforming M.P.'s "in holy horror and pious grief" denounce him in the House and out of it as a monster in human form; and all the while he pursues his noble way—preaching and teaching, lecturing and giving, writing articles in the Idol-breaker and vanquishing his enemies in public debate, like a good unwearied Titan. For a long while Erica—a charming young person—accepts his principles for gospel. At last, however, an admirable (but shadowy) clergyman of the Established Church compels her—rather vaguely, it is true—to own herself mistaken; and in the end, after a certain amount of illness and some study of the Greek Testament, she is baptized and becomes a leader-writer in the Daily Review. All the same she refuses to leave her father; and when the clergyman's son, a noble young doctor of medicine, proposes marriage, she rejects his suit, and goes back to her leaders and her household gods in the most devoted fashion imaginable. Naturally, though, Miss Lyall is not content with that. Her story would be incomplete and her argument futile if Erica remained unmarried and Raeburn escaped martyrdom: and in due course both these consummations are achieved. Raeburn is beaten to death by a mob of ardent but unpractical Christians; and Erica has nothing to do but wed her medical man and be happy. To this complexion she comes; and so, with a novel and satisfying translation of a particular verse in the Greek Testament, her history ends. It is far from exciting; indeed it is barely interesting. But it is carefully written: it is paved with good intentions; and such dissatisfaction as it inspires is tempered with a certain respect.

The story of An Open Foe is based in some measure on a situation in Bulwer's Night and Morning. In that novel, Philip, the stern and haughty hero, loses sight of his younger brother Sidney, and comes upon him years after as somebody's adopted son, and his own rival (if we remember aright) for somebody else's heart and hand. In An Open Foe the hero, a young man whose "fine dark eyes" look "scornfully and stormily out upon the world," is bereft at a blow of his wife and his infant boy, and years after finds the latter (the lady is dead) moving in society as the adopted (and illegitimate) son of a near relative of his, and a suitor for the good graces of his own niece. This impertinence he resents so bitterly that the offspring runs away to Russia, develops a consumption, and is at death's door before his parent's eyes are opened to the truth; so that the inevitable recognition and reconciliation come too late, and there is a funeral instead of a wedding, and a lifelong remorse in place of a lifelong happiness. This, however, is not brought about without a tremendous expenditure of intrigue, the introduction of a crowd of more or less uncommon personages, and the invention or adoption of a world of romantic and lovely names—Gaston Ravenscroft, Olivia and Felicia ditto, Vera de Lusignan, Maurice Guyon (afterwards Count Zaranoff), Adrian Longmere, Ilma von Löwenstein, Lancelot Aylmer, Anna Strolenski, and others from the same noble mint. Of Gaston Ravenscroft, the hero, we have already spoken; his it is to marry his mother's maid to begin with, to be the death of his own son, to behave (for love of Vera de Lusignan) with the blackest treachery towards his rival Maurice Guyon, and finally, a penitent man, to fling away his life somewhere in Asia Minor in rescue of an aged Arab's only child. His mother, the Baroness Waldstein (who seems to have something in common with the lady who married Tom Tusher), is the villain of the story; she lies, she cogs, she paints and powders, she writes anonymous letters, she ruins Gaston by separating him from his wife and babe, and she comports herself generally like the bold, bad woman she is. Vera de Lusignan, again, begins on the boards of a twopenny theatre, and ends—after witching the world with noble vocalization, breaking Gaston's heart, and well nigh being the death of Maurice Guyon—as the Countess Zaranoff, "radiant in her white lace and diamonds," a queen of soft society in St. Petersburg. As for Maurice, he is count, conspirator, fiddler, victim, hero, repentant Nihilist, and favoured official turn and turn about; the mind reels in the contemplation of his innumerable metempsychoses; and it is with an aching head and a sigh of relief that one takes one's last look at him, "somewhat older and graver looking" and "with a brilliant array of orders upon his uniform," and reflects that his metamorphoses are over and done, and the need and opportunity of "lightning changes" for ever departed. It is the same with all the other personages of the story. Their vivacity is extraordinary; nothing happens with them but the unexpected; they shift, they veer, they dissemble, they change sides, they are generally antic and surprising, to an extent unparalleled in fiction. "To think of a whirlwind, though 'twere in a whirlwind, were a case of more steady contemplation, a very tranquillity of mind and mansion." With which fine simile of Mr. Mirabel's we crave to take leave of them, amusing as they are.

Mr. Lathrop's contribution to literature is a study of character and morals and manners in modern America. The scene of it is a fashionable watering-place; the personages are all fashionable, all "bright," all more or less highly civilized, all good at conversation, and all, or nearly all, exasperatingly self-conscious; the story is one of high-toned love and delicate and refined revenge; and the cleverness with which the book is written, the skill with which its characters are drawn, the neatness, the self-restraint, the reticence and dexterity apparent in its every page, are all of the newest type—in short, are fashionable and modern and American likewise. Eugene Oliphant is a widower of seven-and-forty years; Octavia Gifford is an exquisite widow. Eugene becomes enamoured of Octavia, but Octavia is yet in love with her dead husband. It pleases her to believe that she has been his one heroine, and that to none save her has the defunct ever whispered matrimony or affection. It so happens, however ("Ainsi va le monde ici-bas!"), that on this particular point the late Gifford has been by no means all the delicate fancy of his relict paints him. Years before they met he has offered marriage by letter in the most glowing terms; what is more, he has been refused; what is more still, the Cruel Fair is the lady who afterwards becomes Mrs. Eugene Oliphant. By the merest chance in the world our hapless widower discovers the dead man's letter; he reads it, puts it in his pocket, hangs up his coat on a public hook, and more or less forgets all about it. Then through all the length and breadth of Newport it is suddenly whispered that the fair Octavia is tremendously mistaken, and is wearing the willow for an illusion. Octavia traces the report to Oliphant (of course the letter has been taken from his pocket by his host, and by him communicated to the Powers of Air), and insists on seeing the document. No sooner has she read it than she goes wild with wrath, and determines to be revenged. She makes Oliphant love her; she encourages him to propose; and when he does propose, she refuses him in such terms as show that she resents his late wife's influence, and that she is bent on revenging upon him the bitterness inflicted years before on her own dead husband. So much spiritual corruption is more than Oliphant can stand. He retreats to New York with a broken heart; and in due course Octavia repents herself of her crime, and recalls him to Newport. He sets sail accordingly; but the ship takes fire, and Oliphant, abandoning a piece of wreck he has secured to a poor creature who cannot swim, goes quietly under, and departs this life. He prefers extinction to Octavia Gifford, like the good fellow he is. Octavia at once goes into complete mourning—"never to be abandoned"—and sets to work to care for the late Oliphant as she had cared for the defunct Gifford. That a creature so cankered with refinement, so ruined with self-consciousness and the Fine Shades, should be capable, as Mr. Lathrop hints she is, of the higher and nobler form of love, is, to say the least of it, matter for argument. But there is no doubt that she is not worth making a heroine of, and that to ask us to pity and respect her is false sentiment and false art alike. This is what Mr. Lathrop has done; and, cleverly as he has done it, there are few, we take it, who will applaud his mistake, and fewer still who will not wish that he had bestowed his abundant cleverness on the presentment of emotions a little less inhuman and artificial and tragedy a little less contemptible and unsound.

The Leavenworth Case is a very creditable imitation of Gaboriau. The characters are the merest puppets; the style is pretentious and artificial; the motives and results are debatable enough. But the plot is admirably ingenious, and the mystery is not only excellently contrived, but excellently maintained. You start with an inexplicable murder; your suspicions are turned on some three or four potential culprits in succession; you are handed over to an artist in detection, and made to believe him a bungler; and in the end you discover that you have had the criminal in your mind's eye all along, only the author has been too clever for you, and has sent your wits out hunting along all sorts of false trails, and made an ass of you from first to last. That is all that need be said of the book in this place. It is only a story; but it is so neat and dexterous and ingenious, and its merits are otherwise so inconsiderable, that to discuss it at greater length would be unfair.

The story of Tip Cat is the story of two girl children and their admirable big brother Dick. They are reared in affluence (as the penny novelist hath it), and by a will that is never signed they are devoted to misery. But Dick is a good fellow, and a true. He takes his burden on his shoulders; he works, he pinches, he saves; and in the end he is rewarded as he deserves. He is Tip Cat's neighbour; and to Tip Cat, otherwise Tipton Cathcart, he becomes as a son, for reasons which shall not here be specified. How everybody falls ill of scarlet fever; how justice is done on the Wicked Uncle (who in this case is an Aunt), and Dick and his bairns become prospective heirs to immense wealth; how Dick foregathers with his old sweetheart Kathie Dumbleton, and, after some sweet and natural love-making, is constrained to take her for the asking, and be happy in spite of himself; and how Tip Cat, from being a misanthrope and an ass, becomes the best and dearest of men—all these things are set down in the book itself, and shall be told by the book or not at all. It is, no doubt, idyllic and improbable; but that is nothing. It is natural and human, and may be read with pleasure from first line to last; and that is something. Of how little can so much be said! of how few, books or bookmakers, can it be proclaimed that what they have done is not enough, and that we want to hear more of them!

THE UNITY OF NATURE.*

IN the Unity of Nature the Duke of Argyll carries on with the same earnestness of religious conviction and the same breadth and acumen of philosophical thought the line of argument which stamped his Reign of Law as one of the most prominent contributions to the theistic philosophy of the day. In the face of the materialistic or agnostic tendencies characteristic of so much of the spirit of modern science, he boldly takes his stand upon the older ground of an originating and overruling Mind perceptible in nature. He is able to discern a true and definite design or teleological plan, to which is due the unity which he makes it his task to demonstrate as the law of the cosmos or entire system of the universe, to be seen in the domain of nature, in all organized beings, and above all in man, whose mind stands in closest relation to the supreme and primary Intelligence. A master, on the one hand, of the processes and results which observational science has made sure, and, on the other hand, accepting without misgiving or reserve the fundamental doctrines of religion as of divine authority and inspiration, he shows himself eminently qualified to hold the balance between the claims of science and of theism, and to vindicate that unity and harmony in the whole domain of thought which he views as the goal of all well-directed speculation. The barriers which have too often been held to separate the provinces of science and theology will, he maintains, disappear as the facts upon which they respectively rest for their authority are seen in their true nature and their mutual bearings, and not a few of the problems which lie deepest in our intellectual and moral consciousness, and which most perplex us in our efforts after truth, will be found soluble in the light of the Unity of Nature.

The unity of nature in the physical sense is not so much a matter of experience as of instinct or intuition which we bring to our experience. It is bound up with our impressions of the unfailing connexion between cause and effect. Whatever science may have done or may be doing to confirm or illustrate it, science, in the modern acceptation of the term, did not give rise to this conviction. Though some may hold theology to have had somewhat to do with its origination, we can scarcely doubt that the idea of the unity of nature preceded the idea of the unity of God; monotheism, however early we may conceive it to have its place in the history of human belief, being but the form in which that earlier idea became embodied. But what do we mean, asks the Duke, by unity? In what sense can we say that an infinite number of things are nevertheless one? In seeking for the unity of nature we must beware lest, instead of extending our knowledge, we narrow and confuse it. Does knowledge, as some maintain, consist in the perception of differences? Not so, argues our author, but rather in the perception of relations; and the relations or aspects which things assume to our minds rise in an ascending scale according to the fulness of our knowledge and to the development of those intellectual faculties of ours by which alone the higher relations of things can be perceived. One sign of unity is evinced in the ties whereby this world of ours is bound to the other worlds around it. The earth is part of the mechanism of the heavens. Nor do the force or forces by which that mechanism is governed prevail in our own solar system alone, but, there is reason to believe, throughout all space. The revelations of solar physics establish an identity, not only in the materials which make up the sun and its planets and all cosmical bodies, but in the more subtle agencies by which matter is regulated. Gravitation is one agency which brings home to us the unity of the conditions which prevail throughout the cosmos. Light, heat, magnetism, electricity—whether considered as separate agencies or as so many modes of the gravitational force—are further links in the chain of physical causation by which the universe is kept together. What is called the transmutation of forces, so far from implying a rupture of this unity, is but a way of manifesting it, leading up to the conception of the possible ultimate identity of every variety of force. What then is needed is a higher than physical or mechanical unity:—

> Thus every step in the progress of science which tends to reduce all Organisms to one and the same set of elementary substances, or to one and the same initial structure, only adds to the certainty with which we conclude that it is upon something else than composition, and upon something else than structure, that those vast differences ultimately depend which separate so widely between living things in rank, in function, and in power. And although we cannot tell what that something is—although science does not as yet even tend to explain what the directive agencies are or how they work—one thing, at least, is plain: that if a very few elementary substances can enter into an untold variety of combinations, and by virtue of this variety can be made to play a vast variety of parts, this result can only be attained by a system of mutual adjustments as immense as the variety it produces, as minute as the differences on which it depends, and as centralized in direction as the order and harmony of its results. And so we come to understand that the unity which we see in Nature is that kind of unity which the Mind recognizes as the result of operations similar to its own—not a unity which consists in mere sameness of material, or in mere identity of composition, or in mere uniformity of structure, but a unity which consists in the subordination of all these to similar aims and to similar principles of action—that is to say, in like methods of yoking a few elementary forces to the discharge of special functions, and to the production, by adjustment, of one harmonious Whole.

The argument for the manifestation of mind in nature is carried further into the realm of organic life, significant points being made of the structure, habits, and instincts of the lower animals. Here his loving and persistent study of living things enables the Duke of Argyll to draw from his own experience a number of illustrations logically appropriate and of singular beauty. By way of frontispiece to his book he gives us a woodcut of that rare and unique species of British birds, the little dipper or water-ouzel (Cinclus aquaticus), which without the assistance of webbed feet has extraordinary powers of swimming and diving. A nestling of this species half-fledged, stumbling into a pool in an agony of sudden fright, has been seen by him to wake up on the instant to a sense of its hereditary powers, diving down with all the facility of its parents, and giving in the action of its wings a beautiful exhibition of the double progression in two very different elements which is peculiar to the wings of most diving birds. The same instinctive powers have been observed by him in the young of the Dun-diver, or female of the red-breasted Merganser (Merygus serrator). To withdraw pursuit from her young he has watched the common wild-duck (Anas boschas) simulating, in a manner suggestive of the highest art of the stage, the flutterings and cries of a wounded bird. A still more striking effect of mimicry has been observed by him when in the Riviera in winter-time. A beautiful moth, with wings of light and dark chocolate brown, the margins of a lustrous yellow like a brilliant gleam of light, on a sudden alarm gave its wings a violent jerk and instantly became invisible, assuming the hue of the withered and crumpled leaves of a deep blackish brown, by which the interstices of the broken clods around were filled. By the exertion of special muscles the splendid margins of the wings were somehow folded up, reverted, and hidden from sight. In none of these cases was there the possibility of imitation. The experience or tabula rasa school of philosophy must confess itself baffled. Powers such as these were derived from progenitors through faculty, confirmed habit, and hereditary transmission. They have become organized in the race. Are such animals then to be called mere machines? There is surely visible here the operation of mind, which is in no sense part of the machinery. Whatever is done is done in virtue of construction, itself due to a mind which has designed it for the exhibition of certain powers and the performance of certain functions. Is there any light in the theory that animals are mere automata? Was the young dipper a diving machine? In the knowledge and the resources of mind which are shown in the instinctive motions we have spoken of, there is the reflection of some agency and some intelligence which is outside the creatures which exhibit them. It is by the attributes of mind that they are guided—by fear, or by desire, or by affection, or by mental impulses which go straight to the results of reasoning without its processes. In the work assigned to and done by them we behold in various measures the qualities which we recognize in ourselves, as the faculties of sensation, of consciousness, and of will.

Still less is the theory of automatism to be accepted as the explanation of human action. That man's powers of intellect and will, because connected with an organic apparatus, are no more than necessary results of physical structure is, the Duke argues, a mere confusion of thought. At the most this union of the mental operations with the brain, the precise nature and limits of which are unknown to us, is but a further instance of that adjusted harmony which has been established between instinct and the truths of nature. It reveals the strong physical foundations upon which the truthfulness of reason rests; but it in no wise detracts from the integrity or the spontaneity of the human intellect and the human will. And when we pass on to the conception of an order of being and a range of mind above ourselves, are we to be told that all such ideas are imaginary, that all we know is phenomenal, not real, that our conceptions of creation and a Creator are sheer anthropomorphism, that it is our own shadow we are chasing, a mere bigger image of ourselves to which we are always bowing down? Against anthropomorphism the Duke justly protests as a misleading phrase. The true etymological expression for the idea should be anthropopsychism, not "man-formism," but "man-soulism," the proposition really involved being that there is no mind in nature having any relation or similitude with our own. Against this agnostic position the Duke claims the argument of anthropopsychism itself, in proof of identity between mind in nature and mind in man. In virtue of this common attribute, man is a part of nature, and no artificial distinctions can separate him from it. And yet in another sense it is true that man is above nature, outside of it; and in this aspect he is the very type and image of the supernatural, so far as creatures, such as we know ourselves to be, can image the High and the Holy One that inhabiteth eternity. To exclude from nature, as they fain would, all that is called supernatural, philosophers must first exclude man himself. Nor are the ideas of a design in nature to be any more easily set aside. Witness the language of evolutionists themselves, as when Mr. Darwin speaks of "special contrivance" or of the "final purpose" of the several movements in plants, and Dr. Tyndall emphasizes the "continued effort of animated nature to improve its conditions and to raise itself to a loftier level." Such language involves, the Duke urges, far more than a tissue of metaphors; somewhat beyond the picturesque absurdity that nature abhors a vacuum. It becomes a definite, if involuntary, ascription by philosophy to nature of the highest attributes of mind. Even the principle of adjustment in Mr. Herbert Spencer's definition of life is claimed by the Duke as a purely anthropopsychic conception; as is also Mr. Matthew Arnold's "Eternal not ourselves that makes for righteousness." Making for something in, he reasons, a purely human image, involving the elements of will and action analogous to those we are conscious of in ourselves.

* The Unity of Nature. By the Duke of Argyll, Author of "The Reign of Law" &c. London: Alexander Strahan. 1884.

The testimony of human speech, the sure record of the deepest metaphysical truths, comes in to confirm what physical proof, the vital organism and the conscious working of the intellect proclaim as to the unity of nature originating in the absolute oneness of a creative mind.

With equal candour and cogency of reasoning, the Duke addresses himself to the objections and anomalies which stand in the way of an immediate recognition of unity in nature. Foremost amongst these is, of course, the perennial difficulty of the existence of evil in a world which, by the hypothesis, is the work of an originating and all-controlling mind, the essential attributes of which are goodness and love. Now it is especially, if not wholly, in man that moral evil can be said to exist; for such evil as consists in pain and cruelty, and consequently extends its sway to the lower animal creation, is to be estimated by a physical rather than a moral standard. How, then, are we to reconcile the corruption of human character with that law which it has been sought to prove universal in creation; the law under which every creature has been produced, not only with appropriate powers, but with appropriate instincts and intuitive perceptions for the use and regulation of those powers? How comes it that those instincts have in man not only been liable to fail, but seem to have acquired an ineradicable tendency to become perverted? Great as is this mystery, it is a lesser mystery, the Duke would have the evolutionist allow, than that which must needs attach to the original birth or creation of any creature like man in the condition of an utter savage. It is a lesser mystery because it is of the essence of a being above the bestial state, whose will is comparatively free, that he should be able to deviate from his appointed path. Among the lower animals obedience has always been a necessity. In man it has been raised to the dignity of a duty. The very elevation of his nature is inseparable from the possibility of a fall. But for the possibility of evil there would be no possibility of virtue. Thus in the existence of vice we have a witness against the theory of automatism. It shows that the law of life is not that unbending mechanical necessity which the materialist would have it to be. The mystery of his present corrupt state is shifted from man's original endowments and gifts to the use he has himself made of them. As the question of the origin of religion is merged and lost in the question of the origin of man, so that other question how his morals and his religion came to be corrupted becomes intelligible only on the supposition of wilful disobedience, with all its tendencies and consequences, having become inherited and organized in the race. In this formula of expression the Duke does not fail to note a scientific explanation of what is called in theological language original sin. The law of heredity, though, like the law of natural selection, it cannot account for the origin of organic instincts of any kind, can, and in some degree does, account for the perversion of those instincts. It is not their use but their abuse that calls for explanation, and man, the sole exception to the order and reasonableness of creation, must seek in his own unruly will the source of that corruption which is an anomaly in the unity of nature, and at variance with all that is intelligible in its order and reasonable in its law. In reason and in religion, as in morals, we may view without dismay the like tendencies to corruption and degradation; the potential energies in man working downwards rather than upwards; and it being a great natural law that every tendency of thought, whether in a wrong or a right direction, is prone to become inherited and organized in the race. Yet is there room for remedy in a system wherein the disorder is seen to be an anomaly and an exception. There is comfort in the thought that, in proportion as our higher faculties find expansion, and the whole of our nature proves faithful to its intimations, the great anomaly which man's rebellion has introduced into the general order will disappear, the final result being that harmony and that unity to which nature points as its essential and ultimate law.

TWO BOOKS ABOUT MR. IRVING.*

THERE are three or four biographies of David Garrick, two or three of Edmund Kean, four of Junius Brutus Booth, three of Edwin Forrest; but Mr. Henry Irving bids fair to surpass all his illustrious predecessors in the number of his biographers, as he has already surpassed most of them in the amount of interest and attention attracted from his contemporaries. In reality David Garrick and William Charles Macready are almost the only English actors whose position is at all comparable to Mr. Irving's; for only Garrick, Macready, and Mr. Irving have been at the same time the chief English tragedian and the manager of one of the two or three chief theatres of England. Garrick's really unique position was due, in great measure at least, to his talent as a writer, and to his extraordinary social gifts. Macready, with a stronger character and a less flexible histrionic faculty, fell on dark days, when the drama had been distanced in the race for popularity. Mr. Irving has fortunately come in the nick of time, and he has had the high intelligence to make himself the central figure of the recent revival of interest in the histrionic art. His visit to America has been an event of far greater social importance—in both countries—than the visits of George Frederick Cooke, of Edmund Kean, or of William Charles Macready. Their expeditions to America were, in the main, successful; and they came home laden with laurels and dollars. But Mr. Irving's success as he swept through America with the Lyceum company was other than theirs and greater. They went as individuals and as actors only. Mr. Irving went as a manager as well as an actor, and his success as an actor was doubled by his success as a manager. This double success was complete and emphatic and indisputable. It is with great regret, therefore, that we detect in the chapters of Mr. Daly's biography devoted to Mr. Irving's performances in America a tone of controversy, as though the author thought it needful to cry aloud on the housetop that the trip was a success and not a failure, whatever cavilling critics might say or do. This argumentative iteration is likely to produce in England an effect certainly not intended by Mr. Daly; it is likely to cause a suspicion that Mr. Daly is defending, or at least trying to deny, a failure. Mr. Daly is like the Katydid, as Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes has invoked that melodious insect—

> Thou say'st an indisputed thing
> In such a solemn way.

The readers of Mr. Bret Harte's Gentleman of La Porte may recall a character in this story so given to opposition, and so perversely prone to take the other side, that he was wont to lie awake at night to contradict the Katydids. Now, this is just the frame of mind the perusal of Mr. Daly's chapters on Mr. Irving's American experiences tends to produce. These chapters are filled with the quotation and contradiction of criticisms from newspapers of every degree, high and low. The effect is, in a way, to suggest that Mr. Irving's success in America, both as a manager and as an actor, was contested. Now nothing can be further from the fact. This triumph was not as instantaneous as Mr. Daly declares. The first performance in New York was not a failure certainly, but it was not an overwhelming success. The second performance increased the good effect, and diminished the ranks of the doubters. The first play in New York, it must be remembered, was The Bells; the second was Charles I.; and as these were followed by the other plays of the Lyceum repertory, notably by Louis XI., the good impression deepened and broadened, and the objectors became small by degrees and beautifully few. Mr. Irving won his way into American favour by hard work, and he conquered the American public as he had conquered the English public. The tone of American criticism, as a whole, was warm and cordial to the verge of exuberance. The critics of the daily newspapers acquitted themselves of their difficult task with courtesy and skill; and not a few of those who had adverse predispositions were won over by the potent charm of Mr. Irving's personality as exerted across the footlights. The more deliberate articles which appeared in certain of the American magazines—Mr. Towse's in the Century, for example, and Mr. Clapp's in the Atlantic—are taken up by Mr. Daly and answered, as though the few adverse criticisms he quotes from them represented the whole opinion of the writers; whereas, as a fact, there is no competent writer on the drama in America, no American dramatic critic of any recognized position, who did not accept Mr. Irving's work as a thing to be thankful for—whatever personal reserves he might make on minor points. And this is the fault we have to find with Mr. Daly, that he takes up these minor remarks, more obiter dicta, without which criticism would degenerate into eulogy pure and simple, and that he dwells on them too persistently. Mr. Daly likes other people to be like himself, and as he has sunk the critic in the eulogist he is intolerant of those who do not go and do likewise. An Irving worshipper of the strictest sect, Mr. Daly swings his censer threateningly in the faces of all who do not bow down before his idol. It may be well to remind him that a diet of toffy exclusively may pall on the appetite of the stoutest and staunchest of Mr. Irving's admirers.

In other respects Mr. Daly's book is admirable. It contains a simple and straightforward account of Mr. Irving's artistic career, from his birth to the present day. It gives a brief account of his early struggles, and it supplies a useful description of the toilsome apprenticeship he served in the provinces before he made his first great London success. It traces his rise from his monopoly of stage-villains to the production of Hamlet at the Lyceum, and from that time to the present along the series of plays which have marked Mr. Irving's management of the Lyceum. It devotes a chapter to the farewell banquet of last 4th of July. It gives—as we have seen—two chapters to the American tour, and another to an analysis of the "Secret of Success." It refers succinctly to Mr. Irving's literary efforts, essays and addresses, as scattered through the magazines and the reviews, and as reported now and again in the newspapers. And it concludes with a survey of Mr. Irving's personal characteristics. In an appendix are a list of the parts played by Mr. Irving in London since October 1866, the report of an "interview" with Mr. Edwin Booth, an extract from a criticism on Mr. Irving's Macbeth, and an account of a Scottish clergyman's first visit to the theatre. A portrait of Mr. Irving, etched by M. Lalauze from a photograph, serves as a frontispiece; it is admirable in its execution, but it seems not altogether happy in catching the subtlety of the actor's expression. Before leaving Mr. Daly's interesting and useful volume, we may note two or three slips of no great consequence. Twice we find the name of the late Charles James Mathews figuring as Matthews. The reference (p. 126) to Edwin Forrest might imply that Forrest was distinguished only for an "exhibition of brawn," an idea not

INDIAN IDYLLS.*

IN ancient India the Muse of History sat idle, and her representative is her sister of Epic Poetry, who thus in Aryan India wields, unaided, the stylus and the roll. Even at the present day legend with the natives of Hindustan fills the place of history; dates and the philosophic import of the sequence of events are matters ignored and uncared for, while in their place the Hindu holds dear two epic poems of portentous length, the Mahábhárata and the Ramayána. In these two poems mythology, ethics, and philosophy form the warp on which the woof shows forth ancient gods and kings; but the whole structure stands so compacted together, that as yet it has been impossible to separate the historical element from that which is purely fabulous. Still, it may be expected that from a critical examination of these poems, and a minute analysis of the several stages of their construction, scholars will eventually dispel the obscurity which now envelops the early social and political history of India. The inordinate length to which Indian epics run is hardly the less surprising even when we remember that Calliope has here to bear the burden of her sister Clio. Western readers will feel inclined to demur before undertaking the perusal of a poem of 220,000 lines—"seven-fold greater in bulk than the Iliad and Odyssey taken together"—and hence not unwelcome is the volume of episodes from the Mahábhárata which Mr. Arnold has selected out of this gigantic compilation, and rendered for our benefit into English verse.

Philologists have long since demonstrated that in language we are near akin to the Hindus. And we recognize further in reading these "Indian Idylls" how closely allied are all nations of the Aryan stock in the sentiment with which they regard women, justly appreciating the support that strong men in their hour of need will find in the devotion of wifely love. In the Indian epics the wife is the helpmate and the equal of her lord, not the chief of his domestics, far less his slave. In prosperity she is represented as his companion, not his toy; in adversity she is a support, not an encumbrance. Among the Arab tents the birth of a girl was deemed a misfortune. On the other hand, in the opening poem of Mr. Arnold's collection, when the announcement of the birth of a daughter is made, the poet exclaims:—

> A girl, my liege!
> Better than many boys;

and throughout the poem it is the wife who is the heroine, consoling and inciting her husband to virtue, of whom

> The wisest doctors say, "In every woe
> No better physic is than wifely love."
> . . . neither is there friend
> To sad men given better than a wife.

And all this lends a charm in these old Indian songs which is lacking in even that which is highest and greatest in Arabic or Hebrew literature. Mr. Arnold's present volume contains eight poems from the Mahábhárata, of which the longest, called "Nala and Damayantí," illustrates the striking peculiarities of the Hindu epic, both in its high ideal of womanhood, and in its exuberant phantasy.

Damayantí is the peerless daughter of the Raja Bhima, to whom the wild swans have borne the message of love from Prince Nala. The Princess grows to womanhood and suitors throng the palace gates of the Raja Bhima. Among these are "the Immortal Four," the gods Indra, Agni, Varuna, and Yama, who have chosen Prince Nala as their herald, although they know him to be their rival. At a secret interview, and after the message of the gods has been delivered, the Princess still promises to bestow her hand on Nala, loving him above all gods and men; but on the appointed day, when the Princess has to make her choice among the suitors, she is much perplexed at seeing before her five Nalas instead of one, each the counterpart of the other "in form and garb and visage," for the gods have all presented themselves under the likeness of their herald. Damayantí, sore perplexed, at last resolves "to make the gods themselves her help at need." In her prayer she implores them to make themselves known to her, conjuring them by the sincerity of her love for Nala, and by the priority of her secret troth to him at the time when the wild swans had brought the message of his love, long before the gods had deputed him to be their herald. The Immortals are won by her "singleness of soul and constancy." She now distinguishes among the five Nalas, four of whom she notes that > Shadowless they stood; with unwinking eyes,

> And skins which never moist with sweat; their feet
> Light gliding o'er the ground, not touching it; and hereupon drawing "modestly nigh" she gives to the true Nala the bright chaplet.

> So choosing him, him only, whom she named
> Before the face of all to be her lord.

The nuptials take place; and at the subsequent marriage feast, in token of approval, the "Lords of Life" bestow eight noble boons, duly enumerated; after which the gods ascend to the skies, the Rajas and Maharajas depart their several ways, and Nala takes home his bride. And now, as the four Immortals are voyaging heavenwards, they meet the two demons Dwapara and Kalí, who were on their way to present themselves among the suitors of the Princess. Indra informs the demons that the choice has been made, and that, with the goodwill of the gods, a mortal has been preferred to them all, Prince Nala being already the husband of the Princess. On hearing of this Kalí, in jealous wrath, resolves to bring a curse on Nala, and he thereupon repairs to Nala's house to bide his time and watch. Twelve years roll by, during which Nala, blameless, gives the demon no loophole of vantage; at length, in a moment of forgetfulness, the Prince passes to prayer,

> His feet unwashed, offending; Kalí straight
> Possessed the heedless Raja, entering him.

The evil spirit now causes the Prince's brother to challenge him at dice. Nala becomes possessed by the passion of gaming; and, the dice being bewitched, cast after cast does he lose. Gold, palace, steeds, and royal robes, all are lost, and, not even his faithful wife, can persuade him to desist. At last the Prince is beggared, and the brother, with scornful laugh, challenges him to one more throw, urging him, seeing that all his kingdom's wealth is gone, to stake his wife Damayantí in order to win back his lost possessions. But Nala at length rises, uttering no word, only glaring in wrath upon his mocker.

> Then, his rich robes and jewels stripping off,
> Uncovered, with one cloth, 'mid wailing friends,
> Sorrowful passed he forth, his great state gone,
> His Princess with one garment following him,
> Piteous to see!

The two wander forth into the wilderness, she uncomplainingly following in his footsteps, solacing him, and trying to charm his griefs away, while suffering herself the pangs of hunger and thirst in the wild waste which is now their home. After a time Damayantí, worn out with fatigue, falls asleep, with Nala watching beside her; and the Prince—still possessed "by Kalí's cursed mischiefs," and imagining that at his side suffering alone can be the Princess's lot—resolves to abandon her, feeling assured that, once freed from him, she would find her way back to her own people. After many moments of anguish, and twice stealing back for one last look at his sleeping wife, he finally hurries off through the forest drear, still > Thinking upon the sweet face he had left.

Damayantí awakes to find herself alone, thinks that perchance it is some mistimed jest, but at length, after fruitless search, realizes that she is abandoned, and sinks down mad with grief, longing for death.

It would carry us too far were we to detail how the old Raja Bhima sends out his Brahmans in quest of his daughter and son-in-law, the Prince and Princess, and how they are at length discovered. Not the least charming of Mr. Arnold's pages are those which describe, after the Princess has been found, how the Brahman messenger, wandering from town to town, forces Nala to discover himself by singing the verses composed by the Princess:—

> By every husband nourished and protected
> Should every wife be. Think upon the wood!
> Why these thy duties hast thou so neglected,
> Prince! that was called noble and true and good?
> Art thou become compassionate no longer,
> Shunning, perchance, my fortune's broken way?
> Ah! husband, love is most! let love be stronger;
> "Kindness is chief of duties," thou didst say.

Our extracts from this charming poem have usurped more of our space than we had originally intended, and we must refrain from offering even a brief analysis of the remaining idylls of Mr. Arnold's present work. The moral inculcated is the same in all. "Love and Death" tells how Sávitrí, although forewarned, chooses to marry a prince doomed to die at the end of the year, and how when the fateful hour arrives, even Red Yama, God of Death, is overcome by her constancy. In "The Enchanted Lake," the self-denial of the king wins back to life his dead brothers. Of the five remaining poems, the most remarkable is perhaps that entitled "The Birth of Death"; but our readers must be referred to our author's text in order that they may enjoy for themselves, in the cadence of the English version, the "old-world charm of the Indian tale."

In Mr. Arnold's versification there is little to which we can take exception, and our extracts will have shown that in the present work the poetic talent which produced the "Light of Asia" has not failed him at his need. In these "Indian Idylls," however, we should have been glad of a few explanatory notes. Mr. Arnold's readers are the public of England and America, not of necessity Sanskritists; they may therefore find some difficulty in understanding what, for instance, was Damayanti's Swayamvara, and the picture presented to their minds by Gudákesa throwing Karnis, Nardchas, and Nálikas is certain to be left ill-defined in its details. A few short notes for the uninitiated would have made all this clear, and have enlightened the reader as to the attributes of the different gods of the Hindu pantheon. Furthermore, to our mind it is hardly fitting to incorporate Sanskrit words (without interpretation) in English verse. To Lalla Rookh and Hiawatha there were foot-notes for those ignorant of Pawnee and Persian; but how is the "general reader" to guess what may be the import of "Swétugam!" and "Ahoswid!" These details notwithstanding, we feel bound in conclusion to express our hearty appreciation of this present instalment of "Indian Idylls," and also to add a hope that this may not be the last time that our author's countrymen will be charmed by his translations from these two little-known epics of Hindustan which "have constituted the library, the newspaper, and the bible, generation after generation, for all the succeeding and countless millions of Hindu people."

FRENCH LITERATURE.

WE have said enough already of M. Renan's preface to his new book (1), the contents of which were bruited abroad almost before the appearance of the book itself. The body of the volume, however, deserves a few lines of notice, as it contains some interesting essays, nowhere spoilt by such faults of taste as those we commented on last week, though of course pervaded by M. Renan's usual peculiarities. A paper of some length on Buddhism, refused long ago under characteristic circumstances by Buloz the redoubtable; another on the "Eternal Gospel"—that curious specimen of mediæval ways of thinking—are the longest articles in the book. But Galileo, Port Royal, a visionary of the thirteenth century, St. Francis, and various other persons and things give titles to essays and studies which, in their merits as in their defects, take very fair rank with the author's other work.

The matter which is contained in the three completing parts of the edition of Rochefoucauld (2) which MM. Gilbert and Gourdault, with the usual assistance from M. Regnier and his sons, have been for many years editing in the Grands écrivains collection, is rather of bibliographical and scholarly interest than of interest purely literary. The Lexicon, executed with the care usual in this remarkable series, is understood to be the work of M. H. Regnier, and it extends to more than five hundred pages. The Album contains the usual portrait, facsimiles, &c. The Appendix to the first volume seems to show that the bibliographical complexity of the question of the text of the Maximes was less completely solved by M. Gilbert than he thought, for another "autograph" has turned up at Liancourt. The variants it supplies are rather interesting than important; but their inclusion in the present edition, with other supplementary matter, vindicates the high claims of the series to completeness and accuracy.

We shall hope to give fuller notice than would be possible in this place to M. d'Arbois de Jubainville's work on Celtic Mythology (3). Here we simply chronicle its appearance.

The fourth and fifth (concluding) volumes of M. Jouaust's reprint of Faublas (4) have appeared.

Possessors of M. Plon's magnificent work on Cellini (5) should take notice of the appearance of a new Appendix containing besides letterpress a heliogravure of a portrait of Francesco de' Medici, a remarkably fine wood-engraving from Allori's picture of Bianca Cappello, another of the same after Bronzino, and a drawing of Lord Cowper's basin.

Among books of education we have to notice with pleasure a very good Old French Chrestomathy (6), by M. Constans, not so well printed or perhaps quite so well done as Bartsch's well-known book, but much cheaper, and more suitable in form to learners. It has a fair introduction of about fifty pages, summarizing the history of the French literature of the middle ages; but it would, perhaps, have been wiser to make this either very much shorter or very much longer. M. Fasnacht's edition of Perrault's immortal work (7) is apparently intended for a very first book in French, and is prettily illustrated. The notes are capital, and, considering the object, perhaps not too elaborate; but we do not like the special grammatical introduction or the vocabulary. The principle of the objection has been stated over and over again, and we have never seen it validly gainsaid. It is that in editing for school use as much help as may be for the special study should be given, but that the general grammar and the general dictionary must from the first be the pupil's reference, if his study is to do him any good.

We quoted last week Thackeray's caution, "Never let a Frenchman into your house," à propos of a volume of travels; we may quote it with even greater point à propos of M. Paul Bourget's volume of tales (8). The ingenuous confession of his Saint-Luc as to his feelings and intentions and inferences when an English girl, to whose family he had letters of introduction, treated him as English girls usually do treat persons properly introduced to them and supposed to be gentlemen, is sublime. Of the main story of the book it is enough to say that it turns on an act of violence offered to an unmarried girl by her host, a gentleman of birth and station. It is a pity, for M. Bourget is an excellent writer (barring the use of some catchwords of the day, such as "âme," "hade," "usure," and the like), and has a pleasant fancy. Moreover, he is one of the very few Frenchmen who do know something of England. His pre-Raphaelite painter in L'irréparable is very clever. But he has read even his favourite Stendhal somewhat to his wounding, and the very objectionable clique who nowadays take in vain the names of Stendhal and Balzac and Flaubert altogether to his hurt. It would not be fair to class him with the latter; for his style (if not his données) is perfectly clean, and he writes French, not jargon. But their evil influence is over him, and until he shakes it off there is not much chance of his contributing durable work to literature.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

IF it were not for our evil habit of cutting a French book into two volumes and binding it in heavy gritty covers, Miss Yonge's edition of the Memoirs of Marshal Bugeaud (Hurst & Blackett) would be a very readable work. We say "edition" and not translation, because it appears from the title-page that Miss Yonge has only edited the Count H. d'Ideville's Life of the Marshal. Whoever is responsible for the translation has done it in a very stiff and schoolboy fashion. Le Père Bugeaud, as his soldiers called him, was not exactly a hero or even a great man, but he did more honour to France than some others who have been much more talked about. He was a straightforward, hard-headed soldier, who talked as little as possible about la gloire or le drapeau français, and who had a way of looking facts in the face which more than once irritated the more high-flown kind of patriotic deputy into explosions of violence. The Count d'Ideville allows him to tell his own history for the most part. He has republished the Marshal's letters, and given copious extracts from his speeches. The letters begin in 1804, when he entered the Guard of Napoleon as a vélite of the Grenadiers, and they are continued till his death in 1849. The earlier contain many curious sketches of the great Imperial wars. Bugeaud served in the camp at Boulogne, and was once under the fire of our war-ships when his regiment was drilled to embark in the flat-bottomed boats intended for the invasion of England. He passed through the campaigns of Austerlitz and Poland, and thenceforward fought in Spain. One of his letters describes the siege of Saragossa, and it is worthy of notice that he has not a word of praise, but rather the reverse, for the heroic defence of the citizens. "The red English" did not come much in his way, as he served under Suchet in the East. His later letters deal mainly with the Algerian wars, and particularly with the campaigns against Abd-el-Kader. Between the two came Bugeaud's political career under Louis-Philippe, which included the unpleasant episode of the imprisonment of the Duchesse de Berry. This gave rise to the quarrel and duel with Dulong, in which Bugeaud killed his man. It was his third duel with the same result. One of his speeches in the Chamber is remarkable for a severe criticism of the absurd legends told about the Volunteers of 1792.

The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge publish two books—a small and a very small—on John Wiclif. The Rev. A. R. Pennington, M.A., is the author of the small one. He goes at some length into the disputed questions in Wiclif's life (that is the spelling he prefers), and illustrates his doctrines by quotations from his works. Mr. F. H. Matthew's Life of John Wycliffe (we use his spelling) is in size very little more than a pamphlet, and gives only the barest outlines. Both writers pass lightly enough over the communistic side of the reformer's political opinions, and are so enamoured of his merits as an opponent of the Pope that they forget to try and show what he would have put in the place of the great organized mediæval Church.

We hope it is no disrespect to the late Mr. Toynbee to say that the most interesting part of the volume of his lectures is the little memoir of the author, written by Dr. Jowett. The Lectures on the Industrial Revival in England (Rivingtons) are, however, the work of a scholar and a thinker. They suffer not a little from the state in which Mr. Toynbee was compelled to leave them by continual ill-health. The fact, too, that he said what he had to say in popular lectures was against him. It made it inevitable that he should simply go over thoroughly beaten ground.

Messrs. Acland and Jones have compiled a sort of text-book to co-operation under the title of Working-Men Co-operators: What they have Done, and what they are Doing (Cassell & Co.) It is meant partly for people who are interested in the question of co-operation, and partly for the use of the workmen themselves.

A few months ago Mr. Tomlinson's pamphlet on the Congo Treaty (E. Stanford) would have been timely, but to-day it is a little behind the time. In showing that our arrangement with the Portuguese was "no way to behave for" a statesman he is only slaying the slain.

This generation has by no means the happiness of not knowing about its health. On the contrary, it knows a great deal about the subject, or at least it ought to. There is absolutely no counting the works of various kinds which appear on the question of sanitation. Mrs. W. T. Greenup's Homely Hints on Health (Marcus Ward) "is sent forth in the hope that it may serve both to convince and to instruct." The author begins by propounding the weighty question "What is health?" and then answers it at length. Unfortunately, it is a question which never seems to trouble anybody till they are ill to begin with. The Sanitary Laws Enforcement Society publish a manual of the law affecting the housing and sanitary condition of Londoners, under the title of What to Do, and How to Do it (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.) The Report of the Metropolitan Board of Works (Judd & Co.), for 1883, is to some extent a sister work to this treatise.

For obvious reasons, Mr. Elliott's treatise on The Newspaper Libel and Registration Act, 1881 (Stevens & Haynes), deserves the careful attention of various members of the community. We have received the Yacht Racing Calendar for 1883 (Harrison & Son). Not even the charms, such as they are, of Mr. Hitchman's "Anecdotical Preface" can reconcile us to the awkward form chosen for the reprint of Lord Beaconsfield's What is He? and A Vindication of the English Constitution (Field & Tuer). The paper and the printing are good enough, but it is an outrage to make a book—which is not an album—broader than it is long. Dr. Morley has published Herrick's Hesperides in his "Universal Library" (Routledge). We have received Part IV. of Mr. Graves's excellent new edition of Bryan's Dictionary of Painters and Engravers (Bell & Sons). A railway edition of Mr. Hawley Smart's Hard Lines is published (Ward, Lock, & Co.)

Mr. Dickens's useful Dictionaries of the Thames and of London (Macmillan & Co) are now brought up to date, and we need only regret that the editions for 1884 should be so much worse bound than those for 1883.

Messrs. Macmillan also issue a very handsome and complete school edition of the Poet Laureate's works, divided into four parts, closely but clearly printed, and bound in strong, clean, grey cloth.

NATIONAL STOCK EXCHANGE,

130 CANNON STREET, LONDON, E.C.
(Close to King William's Statue.)

The Proprietors of the Exchange undertake to buy and sell Stocks and Shares from and to speculators at Tape Prices, as recorded by special wire direct from the London Stock Exchange. No Commission or Brokerage is charged; therefore the speculator is put on the same footing as a stockbroker is with a jobber when he deals with him inside the London Stock Exchange.

As an illustration of the saving to be effected by this system, the following may be taken as a fair example:

Say £10,000 English Railway Stock is purchased or sold through a broker in the ordinary way, the cost of purchasing same would be as follows:

Jobber's turn at ¼ per cent.	£25 0
Broker's commission at ¼	12 10
Or a total cost of	£37 10

Now the same purchase or sale made through this Exchange would stand thus:

Jobber's turn at ¼ per cent.	£25
Broker's commission	Nil
Total cost	£25

It is thus shown to speculators that while the purchase made in the ordinary way would cost £37 10s., it would, if made through this Exchange, only cost £25; the broker's commission having been dispensed with, it is clear that a large saving would always be made on such transactions. The same rule applies to any stock in which the speculator is desirous of operating.

SPECULATIVE ACCOUNTS opened from 1 per cent. cover, WITH NO FURTHER LIABILITY.

No carrying-over commission charge.
Options granted at fair prices. No commission charged.
Orders by post or telegram have immediate attention.
Telegrams sent free (if required) immediately a transaction is done.
Clients have the free use of a large reading-room, containing all the financial and other papers, together with the telephone and two tapes in direct communication with the London Stock Exchange, thereby affording every opportunity to clients to see their bargains done at close market price.

SPECIAL NOTICE TO INVESTORS.

The Proprietors of the Exchange, being Stockbrokers and Dealers, have every facility of obtaining the latest and best information respecting all safe and sound investments, and are willing to forward (free of cost) such information, and give advice thereon, relating to any Stocks or Shares investors are desirous of buying or selling.

The Proprietors of the Exchange are not connected with any gold mining or other Companies, and they only recommend to investors such securities that are sound and safe; for too much care and caution cannot be exercised either in the selection of investments or the channels through which the business is done.

We do not recommend Mines or Shares in any New Company; for, unless the Directors have a large sum of money invested in same and are men of the highest commercial standing, the majority of them turn out to be worthless, and investors or speculators generally lose through dealing in them.

Prospectus forwarded gratis by the Proprietors,

A. B. COCHRANE & SONS, Stockbrokers and Dealers.

The Proprietors can be seen any day between Ten and Four, except Saturdays, and then between Ten and Two.

STORMONTH'S DICTIONARY of the ENGLISH LANGUAGE, Pronouncing, Etymological, and Explanatory, embracing Scientific and other Terms, Numerous Familiar Terms, and a Copious Selection of Old English Words. By the Rev. JAMES STORMONTH. The Pronunciation carefully revised by the Rev. P. H. PHELP, M.A. Cantab.

Now ready, Parts I. to IX., each 2s.

 To be completed in Twelve Parts.

"The pronunciation of every word is given, the symbols employed for marking the sounds being commendably clear.....After the pronunciation comes the etymology—a feature to which much attention has been given. It is difficult to keep the just mean in this part of a dictionary, so fascinating is the subject, so wide are the prospects which it offers to research, and so boundless the opportunities for illustration. It has, we think, been well managed here."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Mr. Stormonth's Dictionary has passed through several editions, and is well known in English-speaking families the world about. This is intended as an extended Library Edition of it.....When completed it will be a comprehensive and authoritative work..... The practical value of the Dictionary has been subjected to the test of many years' use, and has justified the praise which we bestowed on its first edition."—British Quarterly Review.

SECOND EDITION OF

R. D. BLACKMORE'S NEW WORK,

"TOMMY UPMORE."

By the Author of "Lorna Doone."

THE TIMES says:

To say that a book by the author of "Lorna Doone" and "Alice Lorraine" is an uncommon book is unnecessary; but "Tommy Upmore" is uncommon to an extraordinary degree.....But no bald sketch of a portion of the plot will suffice to give an idea of the charm of Mr. Blackmore's style, of the poetry with which he invests the meanest matter, of the striking and humorous metaphors which he draws from the most commonplace task, of the quaint phraseology in which he reclothes old ideas. We may add two or three remarks, which do not nearly exhaust what could be said upon this book: that stout Conservatives will read it with enjoyment, for, especially towards the end, it is much taken up with politics and political satire aimed at the present powers that be; that the last scene, where Tommy addresses the House of Commons from the roof, having been exalted thither by his indignation, is burlesque beyond anything; and that Laura Twentifold is a sweet girl-lover.

MESSRS. MACLEHOSE & SONS' NEW WORKS.

SCOTTISH HISTORY and LITERATURE, to the PERIOD of the REFORMATION. By JOHN M. ROSS, LL.D., Edinburgh High School. Edited, with Biographical Sketch, by JAMES BROWN, D.D., Author of "The Life of a Scottish Probationer." Demy 8vo. 450 pp. 14s.

"Dr. Ross was deeply versed in old Scottish literature; his patriotic enthusiasm is intense, but duly controlled in expression by a sufficient sense of humour. His book is not a dry compendium of facts, but a vivid account of the national life of Scotland, viewed now from the political, and now from the literary point of view."—Times, June 3.

"Dr. Ross's volume must be pronounced a work of quite exceptional literary and historical value. It fills a place of its own at once in the literary history, and in the historical literature of Scotland. Its peculiar character, as well as its special value, lies in its skilful combination of the early history of Scotland, with an adequate and thoroughly well-informed description of the development of the national thought in the national literature. He aimed at doing for the early history of Scotland what Mr Green did so admirably for the early history of England—in Green, literature is subordinate to history; in Ross, on the other hand, history, at least political history, is subordinate to literature."—Scotsman, May 30.

"There is no trace in this volume of mental weariness or perfunctory cram. It is nothing short of masterly. The style is full, nervous, perspicuous, vitalised by an enthusiasm always kept on the safe side by humour and good sense. The writer is thoroughly acquainted with his materials, and knows when to hurry forward and when to linger.....In the warmth of his patriotic and moral enthusiasm, in his minute mastery of details, as well as in the glowing energy of his style, he reminds us of Mr. Green."—Academy, May 31.

NEW POEM by the Author of "OLRIG GRANGE," "HILDA," &c.

KILDROSTAN: a Dramatic Poem. By

WALTER C. SMITH, M.A. Extra fcp. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

"'Kildrostan' has all the interest and excitement of a novel, combined with the charm of dignified verse, and enhanced by the stimulus of manly thought....The poem is one of unquestionable power, both in distinctness of conception and delineation of character and in force of poetical diction. Scattered all through the five acts there are gems of thought, which are enhanced in literary value by their brilliant setting. Mr. Smith's power of passionate utterance reaches its highest point in the scene, in the third act, in which Treomain's intense declarations of love are received by Doris with scoffs and jeers. It is like the play of lightning on an iceberg, brilliant but harmless.....As a rule, the verse is as musical as the thought is manly, and the lyric is charming."—Academy, June 3.

"Since the death of Scott hardly any man has so nearly approached the Wizard of the North in the art of telling a story in graphic and musical verse.....On Doris Cattanach Mr. Smith has expended his full strength, and not even the worldly-wise mother in 'Olrig Grange,' nor Hilda Dalcraig, nor even Winifred Urquhart, is so powerfully drawn. On Treomain, the esthetic poet, equal care has been bestowed. The esthetic school has never been so fully explained or exposed. The prophet of culture is not encountered by parody or by satire, but by what we may term psychological anatomy, and the effect is irresistible."—Echo, June 2.

SERMONS preached at Ibrox, Glasgow. By

JOSEPH LACKIE, D.D. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"This is a very remarkable volume. We have seldom read sermons so fresh and suggestive, and, although they were spoken sermons, so perfect in their literary form."—Edinburgh Daily Review.

"To those who want a volume of sound yet vigorous sermons, which will set their own minds thinking, we unhesitatingly say, get this without delay."—Leeds Mercury.

TABLES of EUROPEAN HISTORY,

LITERATURE, and ART, from A.D. 200 to 1852; and of American History, Literature, and Art. By JOHN NICHOL, M.A. Oxon., LL.D., Professor of English Literature in the University of Glasgow. Third Edition, greatly Enlarged, thoroughly Revised. Royal 8vo. printed in Five Colours, 7s. 6d.

"The tables are clear, and form an admirable companion to the student of history, or indeed to any one who desires to revive his recollection of facts."—Times.

"In a word, the great leading facts of European history for nearly seventeen hundred years are here compressed, with wonderful clearness, into a single slim volume. The book is a triumph of systematisation."—Scotsman.

"Simply invaluable."—Leeds Mercury.

A Concise Note Book of Geology, having special reference to the English and Welsh Formations.

By C. L. BARNES, M.A.

Late Scholar of Balliol College, Oxford; Science Master at Llandovery School.

"The various formations are arranged in their stratigraphical order, and their chief characteristics mentioned, not only on the same page, but in the same horizontal line, so that at a glance one can read the name of a formation, its development in England and Wales (and, in certain cases, in foreign countries), its mineral character, chief fossils and prominent features. In connection with each table is a map of England and Wales in which only the strata under consideration are depicted, and a plate of fossils is added to illustrate the organisms belonging to each separate period."—Extract from Preface.

THE GOVERNMENT OF LONDON.

A Series of Five Fully-Coloured Maps of LONDON and its ENVIRONS.

Compiled from Ordnance and other Surveys, so arranged and coloured as to show at a glance some of the numerous and complicated divisions of London, for administrative purposes, under the control of the Board of Works, Vestries, District Boards, Paving Commissioners, Burial Boards, Commissioners of Baths, Commissioners of Public Libraries, Registrar General, Gas and Water Companies, &c. &c. So few of the boundaries are conterminous that it has been found necessary to have a series of Maps, viz.:—

No. 1. MUNICIPAL DISTRICTS.
No. 2. WATER COMPANIES' DISTRICTS.
No. 3. GAS COMPANIES' DISTRICTS.
No. 4. PARLIAMENTARY BOROUGHS.
No. 5. POOR LAW UNIONS AND REGISTRATION DISTRICTS.

Each Map is drawn on a scale of two inches to a mile, and includes the whole of the Metropolis Local Management Act area, extending to Kew, Chiswick, Acton, Willesden, Richmond Park, on the West; Woolwich, Bexley Heath, Plumstead Marshes, on the East; Highgate, Hampstead, Crouch End, Stamford Hill, Kingsbury Green, on the North; Kingston, Wimbledon, Lower Streatham, Crystal Palace, Anerley, Plaistow, and Silvup, on the South; exhibiting plainly all the Main Thoroughfares, and most of the Streets, Squares, and Crescents, with their names; the Docks, Railways, and Stations; Parks, Commons, Public Buildings, &c.

Size of each Map, 40 inches E. and W. by 27 inches N. and S.

"The utility of the maps to the London householder and ratepayer is evident; they deserve the attention of all who take an intelligent interest in the government of the metropolis."—Times.

THE EGYPTIAN SURRENDER.

THE speeches of Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL and of Mr. JOHN MORLEY on Wednesday, though neither was a very remarkable speech in itself, supply, from diametrically opposite sides, a rather useful comment on the present state of Government policy in Egypt. Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, even after making allowance for the cheerful audacity with which he is gifted, is at a greater disadvantage in criticising that policy than any other prominent Conservative politician. His earlier proceedings in reference to Egypt deserve at best a merciful forgetting, and his present ideas on the subject appear to be curiously compounded of some intelligent appreciation and a great deal of unintelligent cant. Yet even Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, so utterly indefensible is the course of Mr. GLADSTONE'S Government, so many have been their blunders, so gross and manifold is their incapacity, was able to draw up a very effective indictment without exposing himself to retaliation on any of the counts. On the other hand, Mr. MORLEY, erroneous as his views must be held to be on the general question, is thoroughly acquainted with its details, has at any rate for some time past maintained a consistent attitude on the subject, and, though he is known not thoroughly to approve of the Government policy, as indeed no man in the possession of his reason does approve of it thoroughly, is committed heart and soul to Mr. GLADSTONE'S side at present. All that Mr. MORLEY can find to say is that the forthcoming agreement with France will probably be a very bad agreement, and almost certainly a bad agreement, but that nothing must persuade the Liberal party to turn out Mr. GLADSTONE in these dangerous days—the danger of which (Mr. MORLEY forgot to say it, or the reporter to report him) happens to be almost entirely of Mr. GLADSTONE'S own bringing about.

It becomes more and more evident that this refuge of despair—the appeal to keep Mr. GLADSTONE in at any cost to the country—is the sole refuge to which, in reference to this famous (let it be hoped it may not next week have to be called infamous) agreement, the supporters of the Government are being driven. As it has been repeatedly pointed out, the details of the surrender matter the less because under no possible circumstances can it be anything but a surrender. As admitted by the most thoroughgoing of Mr. GLADSTONE'S defenders, the terms are disgraceful and preposterous. That England, when the appointed term of evacuation approaches, is to go cap in hand to one Great Power after another in search of a second to back her request for a longer day, is sufficiently shameful; and this is the most favourable version of that particular matter. The reconstituted Debt Commission will, in fact, be a Board of Control, and, unless a full half of its members were English-men, the English nationality of the President could not prevent England from being constantly thwarted. On whatsoever terms and by whatever machinery England is to advance money to Egypt, the discreditable and unprofitable fact will remain that Englishmen are to lend money and furnish men for the payment of foreign bondholders—a doubling of the parts of bankers and bailiff which is as novel as it is disgraceful. This is the most favourable report (and it is notorious that there are other reports much more unfavourable), while the truth can hardly be less unpleasant for the simple reason, again and again insisted on, that nothing less unpleasant would accrue to the negotiations at all. In what ingenious fashion the pill may be gilded by the joint efforts of Mr. GLADSTONE and M. FREYCINET it is impossible to say, but it is, at any rate, fair to observe that there is no deception about the matter. Even Mr. JOHN MORLEY admits that it must be a nasty pill, and may be a very nasty one.

To these pleasant considerations has to be added the other pleasant consideration that Mr. GLADSTONE has not been content with making his bid for French countenance, and then submitting the bid to Parliament without going further. The humiliation of England—humiliation it must be, whether it is great or small—is being hawked through all the chanceries of Europe before it is exposed to public view in London. Before Englishmen are asked whether they will confess themselves to be incompetent administrators, unbusinesslike financiers, incapable soldiers, but (if kept under proper control) useful policemen and energetic bumbailiffs, an English Ministry formulates this confession, and sends it round to Berlin and Vienna, to St. Petersburg and Rome. That, at least, is what the spokesmen of the Ministry in the public press say without contradiction from their superiors. Nor is it to be for a moment doubted that when the agreement, good or bad—to speak more accurately, bad or very bad—comes on for discussion, this preliminary tour of inspection will be urged in its favour. It would be so awkward to reject what has been officially tendered to foreign Powers. Indeed the only reason for a proceeding exposed to such obvious inconveniences is that it must precipitate the plumping of that question to which Mr. GLADSTONE and his supporters are anxious to bring Liberal members of Parliament, "Are you "prepared to support the Government at all hazards, or are "you not?" Every day this question is being more and more undisguisedly put, more and more audacious admissions of the probable character of the proposed transactions are being made, and the game is played to win solely by the cards of party discipline, of Mr. GLADSTONE'S reputation and popularity, and of the dislike of certain classes and parties to certain Conservative statesmen or to any Conservative Government. At almost any former period it would have been impossible to win in such a fashion. For Mr. GLADSTONE'S defenders have, as a preliminary necessity, to declare that Mr. GLADSTONE is a complete failure. They have to urge that in two years of unrestricted management of a small country he has brought that country to such a pass that extraordinary arrangements are necessary to counteract the bad effects of that management. They have to admit that these arrangements, defined by themselves, are disagreeable. They grant that Mr. GLADSTONE has blundered completely in Egypt, and that he has placed England in at least an unpleasant relation to the European Powers. They cannot afford to blink any of the bungles and butcheries which have marked the course of Egyptian history since the Alexandrian riot, for those bungles and butcheries are necessary to their attempt to show how very difficult the Egyptian question is, how much allowance it requires, how necessary it is to keep France and Europe in good humour. And when they have done all this, and shown a certain set of men to be blunderers in administration and mendicants in foreign policy, they turn round and demand implicit confidence in the blunderers and the mendicants, a new lease of power for them, and a practical assurance that, blunder and beg as they may, nobody else shall be put in their places. This, let it be remembered, is an argument from which there is no escape, and the force of which would not be weakened if by some coup de théâtre it were to turn out that

Mr. G[illegible] Lord GRANVILLE have all along been strug[illegible] the generous confidence of France inste[illegible] with her exigencies, that no limit is to be se[illegible] that the management of the Debt is to b[illegible] England, that nothing is to be said about t[illegible]on of the Canal, that M. CAMILLE BARRÈRE [illegible]eceive an appointment in Cayenne or the Marquesas, and that the whole European concert has tuned its harps to sound "Rule Britannia" in Egypt. For the premisses of the argument above given are not hypotheses, they are not statements of Mr. GLADSTONE's enemies. They are the assertions of Mr. GLADSTONE's friends, and the acknowledged and recorded facts of the past. It can no more be denied that support is being bespoken for "Mr. GLADSTONE, right "or wrong," than it can be denied that the state of Souakim is now very much what it was before General GRAHAM's expedition, that the lives and fortunes of dwellers on the Nile to the very frontiers of Egypt proper depend on the good pleasure of the MAHDI and his lieutenants, that every English institution set on foot under the DUFFERIN scheme has collapsed or is collapsing, and that the measures which the Government are reluctantly and partially taking now were pressed on them by those who knew the facts and grasped them in December last.

WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.

THE supporters of the preposterous demand for female suffrage have, perhaps, less reason than any other political section to complain of Mr. GLADSTONE's recent proceedings. It is something to have secured a plausible excuse for a defeat which may consequently be represented as occasional and temporary. The composition of the minority will also be thought encouraging, as it was not exclusively composed of eccentric theorists or of womanish men acting under the influence of strong-minded women. Many prosaic and sceptical partisans suppressed their contempt for the proposal with the immediate object of inflicting a check or a reproof on the Government. Whether their motives were morally more admirable than the prejudices of the genuine enthusiasts may be a disputable question; but they are less likely to persevere in their mistaken course. The promoters of the agitation will be grievously disappointed if they rely on a casual alliance, although they may on the other hand hereafter reclaim some real supporters who last week preferred the authority of Mr. GLADSTONE to their own fantastic opinions. Whenever the issue has been directly and seriously raised, the House of Commons has concurred with the great mass of intelligent persons of both sexes in protesting against an absurd innovation. It is true that some of Mr. WOODALL's opponents might be taxed with cynical audacity when they argued that the test of a sound representative system was its tendency to provide the most satisfactory legislative body. The enthusiastic advocates of the Irish household franchise had little right to dwell on the political incompetence of even a female constituency; but questions of vital importance are not to be solved by personal recriminations. Even Irish householders may possibly at some distant time become qualified to exercise some fraction of political power; but it is certain that women, though they may partially succeed in the attempt to unsex themselves, will never be changed into men.

The most respectable supporters of female suffrage, including Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE and Lord JOHN MANNERS, appear to have been convinced by the same argument which prevailed over Lord BEACONSFIELD's possible scruples. Property in the hands of women is, as long as they are excluded from the franchise, not directly represented. The same disability applies to land held in mortmain by corporate bodies, and to the personalty which they possess. The electoral power attached to property of any kind will, under the new dispensation, be altogether insignificant. Several newspaper correspondents have lately complained that an intelligent and cultivated female employer of labour may not have a vote, while all her workmen enjoy the privilege from which she is debarred. A man of the same character and in the same condition may be outvoted by two of his workmen. Lord BEACONSFIELD's authority on questions of electoral competence is impaired by his indifference to popular government in general. His colleagues and successors, though they are thoroughly penetrated by constitutional convictions, formed their opinions on female suffrage before the character of the representation was fundamentally changed. The responsible head of a household would, if Mr. WOODALL's claim had become law, share the franchise, as Mr. GOSCHEN showed in detail, with irresponsible girls, and with electresses of more doubtful character. There is no reason to suspect two eminent Conservatives, though they may be heretical on a single point, of a bias in favour of a class of voters which they may, according to the suggestion of their adversaries, hope to attach to their own party. If they have any expectation of the kind, they may be undeceived by the candid and accurate statements of the ladies who are most noisily clamouring for the franchise. The whole body is, as some of its members have publicly asserted, thoroughly revolutionary in temper and doctrine. Agitators, male or female, have no disposition to leave things as they are. On the other hand, it would be surprising what women who refrain on principle from political activity should organize Committees or talk nonsense on platforms. To prove the justice of their own modest estimate of female politicians, they have only to read the oral and written declarations of their unauthorized representatives.

One of the mock demagogues publishes a highly characteristic declaration that, fortified by the authority of BLACKSTONE, she will henceforth refuse payment of taxes till she is allowed to vote. The famous commentator, who has not generally been accused of subversive tendencies, enunciates, among many other commonplaces, the proposition that no English subject can be taxed without his consent, given by himself or by his representative in Parliament. The use of the masculine pronoun "his" may perhaps be an oversight; but in an age of nomination boroughs and of a closely restricted franchise, the eloquent exponent and apologist of established institutions can scarcely be supposed to have affirmed the legal existence of universal suffrage. BLACKSTONE was perfectly aware that no trader or tenant-farmer had as such a vote for members of Parliament, and that nineteen-twentieths of the male population were habitually taxed, and, at the same time, excluded from the right of suffrage. If necessary, he would have explained his own general phrases by some ingenious theory of virtual representation; and he certainly would not have advised a wilful violation of law. Only a female dialectician would be capable of first believing that every proposition in BLACKSTONE was a part of the law of the land, and of then inferring that she was therefore entitled to act on her own interpretation of the text. In a certain sense it is a not untenable paradox that polemical women are rigid logicians. Entire indifference to the correctness of promisses, and boldness in the acceptance of impossible conclusions, greatly facilitate the process of seeming to reason. It never occurs to the would-be champion and martyr of oppressed female taxpayers that it would be useless to elect Parliaments by any kind of suffrage, if laws were not binding on individual dissentients. The indulgence with which such eccentricities are regarded is itself an argument against the political equality of the sexes. Revolutionary absurdities become amusing instead of shocking when they are accepted as "pretty FANNY's way."

It appears from a letter written by Admiral MAXSE that extreme Radicals as well as the Conservatives of yesterday appreciate the most conclusive argument against the political enfranchisement of women. If they were to hold opinions peculiar to themselves, and to pursue distinctive objects, women with votes might, with the aid of a small minority of men, carry any measure which they might think desirable. If the matter were important, the masculine majority would assuredly refuse to submit. There was probably some exaggeration in the statement lately attributed to a Frenchman that such an antagonism would, if female suffrage were established in France, result in civil war. In England the contest between the sexes would be settled, not by violence, but by a preliminary comparison of forces. The combatants would, as in Paradise Lost, save themselves the necessity of combat by a summary estimate of their respective forces. Even in controversies of secondary interest, on securities against disease, or on the practice of vivisection, the stronger section of the constituency would not long consent to be governed by hysterical impulse or even by amiable prejudice. It is not allowable to decide fundamental issues on grounds of party convenience; but waverers who are tempted to enfranchise women in the hope that they may be amenable to ecclesiastical influence, would, if they were allowed to try the experiment, be utterly disappointed. It is, indeed, probable that many female voters might follow their accustomed spiritual guides; but the communities in which political and religious activity are most closely combined are not devoted to the cause of Church and State. Even among the cultivated classes new-fangled doctrines have lately found their most credulous proselytes in the [illegible] which ought to be loyally tenacious of orthodox convictions. No measure would be too preposterous for female Buddhists or female Positivists; but it is scarcely worth while to pursue a collateral discussion. It is not on account of feminine heresies, but because the regimen of women is intrinsically monstrous, or, in milder terms, unnatural, that their claim to govern and legislate is untenable. Last week's debate was instructive even in the trivial character of some of the arguments which were rightly thought good enough to support an instinctive judgment. Mr. THOROLD ROGERS, who seldom shrinks from any democratic innovation, has been confirmed in sound doctrines as to the rights of women, or perhaps converted, by a late municipal election at Oxford. A candidate who would certainly have conferred more honour on the Town Council than he would have received from his constituency was, according to Mr. ROGERS, rejected by the votes of female ratepayers. That similar miscarriages have sometimes occurred in Parliamentary contests has not been considered a reason for disfranchising misguided voters; but it is not improbable that the city of Oxford would be better governed if there were no female voters. It is, on the whole, advisable that disputants should confine themselves to the use of sound and relevant reasons; but careless fallacies sometimes imply a certainty which is superior to argument. It might be difficult to prove that women ought not to elect members of Parliament on the sole ground that the ratepayers of a ward in a provincial city rejected an eligible candidate for a seat in the Town Council; but in practical matters a just conclusion may stand on its own merits, or rest on "any other reason why."

IRELAND.

DURING the past week in Ireland a salutary lesson has been read to irreconcilable journalism by the fine laid on Mr. O'BRIEN, and the good sense and patriotism of the Orange leaders have saved Lord SPENCER from the consequences of his lamentable defection from equal justice in the matter of the Newry meetings. But the Irish event of the week occurred in England, and was the Duke of ARGYLL's speech of Monday. Important as that speech was in many ways, it was perhaps in no way more important than as eliciting the replies, or the attempts at reply, which were given to it. They were remarkable enough in reference to the actual subject of what for courtesy's sake must be called discussion; they were more remarkable as exhibiting a growing tendency of modern politicians which may be pronounced without hesitation to be one of the most mischievous tendencies that politics and politicians have ever exhibited. No reader or hearer of the debate—no reader even of the comments made upon it by newspapers favourable to the Land Act—needs to be told that the DUKE was left absolutely unanswered. In point of argument Lord CARLINGFORD's stale and repeatedly disproved assertion of some mysterious difference between Ireland and all other countries on the earth, which makes what would be robbery elsewhere restitution in Ireland, stood alone. The DUKE's facts were not disproved, his arguments were not met, his criticisms were not answered. Lord DERBY, who has perhaps the most naturally happy and artificially accomplished faculty of damaging his own side that is now to be found in Christendom, came forward candidly to repeat his former statements that the Act was a very bad business, a very revolutionary business, in fact (save that he did not use the word), a very unjust business; but that he supposed it was necessary. That is, in the first place, exactly what had and has to be proved. In the second, it is exactly what Lord DERBY's present colleagues always strenuously denied. They never (it was repeated scores of times during the debates of 1881) dreamt of yielding anything except to manifest justice. Their Bill was not revolutionary, it was not confiscatory, it would put landlords (all but a very few very bad men) in another better position than before. Lord DERBY's argument that the Land Act was the best way out of a hopelessly bad job will not stand more examination than Lord DERBY's extraordinary comparison of the all-round rent-lowerings of the Commission to the process by which owners are compensated and consoled for compulsory expropriation in England. But, even if it would stand examination, it would be the very worst of all arguments for the Government which Lord DERBY now adorns.

This evasion, however, and the [illegible] scolding with which the supporters of the Ministry [illegible] of Parliament have visited the audacious Liberal who dares to find fault with a pet measure of Mr. GLADSTONE's, [illegible] blinded, and can blind, nobody. The DUKE's facts are solid, unimpeachable, unimpeached. That the result of the Land Act has been to make the landlord's interest unsaleable, and to force up the price of the tenant's interest to a point which, on the first recurrence of a cycle of bad seasons, means bankruptcy for the tenant, if it does not mean that the landlord has been shamelessly robbed, no man off a partisan platform or out of the columns of a partisan newspaper dares deny. The first proposition is admitted by the Government measure now pending and under Mr. TREVELYAN's care; the second is evident to any one who has the slightest knowledge of the facts and the slightest command of reason. Now the two main things which the Bill was to do were, first, to assure the landlord's interest by strictly defining it; and, secondly, to lessen the alleged reckless competition for farms, and consequent running up of rents, by assigning a definite value to the tenant's interest. Neither has been done; the opposite of both has been done. The landlord cannot sell at all; the tenant buys at a price which means either that the fair rent is a scandalously unfair rent, or that he is ruining himself in the purchase, or that he is implicitly buying the chance of a further slice of the landlord's goods. But this only regards justice; and, from Lord DERBY's point of view, justice does not matter. Turn then to expediency. One main object of the Land Act was to do away with the under-farming too common in Ireland, and to secure, with fixity of tenure and certainty of rent payment, a proper expenditure of capital on the land. As it is, landlords, by a wise, or rather an inevitable, inference from the decisions of the Land Commission, have left off expending any money at all, and tenants are sinking their capital in exorbitant purchases of tenant-right. The future of Irish farming, therefore, is as bad as it can be from this strictly business point of view. As for the decisions of the Land Commission and its Sub-Commissions, no valid fight was made in the House of Lords or out of it for what is in fact a scandal admitting no defence of any kind. It may be charitably hoped that those who defend the Commissioners and their understrappers have not taken the pains to investigate the reported cases. Lord CARLINGFORD probably has done this, and he therefore with much wisdom confined himself to perfectly vague language. But the Duke of ARGYLL was prudent enough to spend but little of his speech in denunciation. The iniquity of the Land Act and of those who have lent themselves to working the screw on Irish landlords may be a tempting theme for indignant eloquence; but those who have been guilty of the iniquity, and those who have winked at it, are unlikely to be pricked in conscience. The more reasonable plan is to show the complete failure for its own ends of all this cumbrous machinery, all this ignoring of right, all this generosity with other men's money. And there is no difficulty in showing this. No political conciliation has been effected by the Land Act. A fresh economical crisis has partly come about and partly been assured in the future by it. The moral tone of the country, never very high, has been further disturbed and lowered by the expectations of fresh irregular gain at a period more or less near. There are some precisians who hold (Mr. GLADSTONE used to be among them, but that was when the way lay from Blackheath to Downing Street, not from Downing Street into the vast inane) that what is morally wrong can never be politically expedient. It may, according to the convenient theory of two Justices, be questioned whether the Irish Land Act was morally wrong; the event has shown, and is showing every day, how utterly inexpedient it was, how utterly futile, how successful in bringing about everything that its supporters scouted as impossible, and that its opponents prophesied as certain.

But the point noticed above is an even more important point, because it is one of wider application. The cry of all the Duke of ARGYLL's critics, in and out of Parliament, is, "Oh! you are too late. You ought to have spoken before. The Land Act is an accomplished fact now." The Franchise Bill, if Bills could chuckle, might chuckle to itself on hearing this, and so might a good many other measures, accomplished or inchoate, of present and recent times. Whenever the "big legislation" for which Radicals of to-day ingeniously avow that they pant is brought on, objections as to probable results are invariably poohpoohed. It is unreasonable to prophesy evil, it is unjust to decry the working of a thing before it has been got to work, and the particular dangers indicated are always the particular dangers which can by no possibility happen. But when the big measure has been got through, to point out that it does not work well, to indicate the points in which the prophesies of evil have been verified, to show what fresh evils are impending, is poohpoohed on exactly the opposite ground. It is useless to cry over spilt milk; the thing is done and must be made the best of; the objector ought to have spoken before; he is a belated thinker of the day before yesterday, an old almanac, a tedious babbler of "I told you so." Before the thing is done it is too soon to object; when it is done it is too late. That is Lord CARLINGFORD'S grand argument; for the old wives' fable about Irish tenure, and the absurd contention that the Duke of ARGYLL, not being an Irish landlord, ought not to talk about the matter can scarcely have been meant seriously. Would Lord CARLINGFORD like to refer the Land Act and its merits to a jury of those who possess the qualification which he is so anxious to insist on when the question is that of challenging, not qualifying, a juryman? If Irish landlords only are to decide on Irish questions, we think we may say without rashness that we can forecast the decision in this case pretty accurately. The truth of course is, that it is not necessary to be an Irish landlord, it is not necessary to be an Irishman, it is not necessary ever to have set foot in Ireland, to be qualified to judge this cause. To be able to read and to be able to reason, that is all that is necessary. No man who can do these two things, and who has not what the Duke of ARGYLL calls a "Treasury-bench "mind," which works exactly as it is bidden to work, can fail to come to the conclusion that the grounds on which the Land Act was ostensibly passed were false, and the results which it was ostensibly intended to accomplish have conspicuously failed to follow.

CHURCH PATRONAGE IN COMMITTEE.

CHURCH patronage has for the third time reached the haven of puzzled statesmen. Under the care of the Bishop of PETERBOROUGH it was examined in a Committee of the House of Lords, and the result was an able but drastic Report, with much valuable evidence. A Royal Commission gave another instalment of valuable evidence, and a Report both able and moderate. Now a third Report and a fresh budget of evidence may be expected from the House of Commons.

We cannot say that we anticipate much fresh light from this step, but we do not in the least complain of such having been the result of Wednesday's debate. Any other ending would have bewildered a case which was too strong to stand still and too weak really to go on, and which was complicated by the duplicity of a situation in which some of the assailants of the present system take their stand out of real love for and others out of real hatred for the actual Church of England. Mr. ALBERT GREY posed as the doctrinaire democrat with the success usually attaching to that character. Mr. LEATHAM as little concealed from the House as he can have done from himself that when the padding was dropped his Bill was a scheme to concentrate the whole patronage of the Church in the hands of Queen ANNE'S Bounty, or, in other words, to make confiscation easy by substituting one official manager for many independent owners. Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT in his monologue of the conscious-smitten statesman gave a fine specimen of his best IRVING manner, only the art was a little too visible.

Those who really wish to reform Church patronage, and to help the Church of England, have a task which has been made easy to them by the late Commission to perform, though not so easy to carry out in the face of Mr. GREY and Mr. ILLINGWORTH—namely, to concentrate their attention rather on the quality of the produce than on the theory of the producing power. Private patronage may be wrong; but, if this is so, down falls the defence of our Established Church. But there might be, and there should be, checks on the appointing by private patrons of unfit nominees, not by invoking, as Mr. GREY proposes, the forces of ignorance, self-interest, and prejudice, but by guarantees of fitness, which the Church in the person of its rulers ought to regulate and to administer. Only we must again express our dissent from the majority of the Commission, and our preference for the minority Report of Lord DEVON and the late Lord Justice JAMES, who stood up, as Mr. HENLEY used to do, for the lawfulness of the sale of next presentations. Two evils, independent of each other but quite compatible, would follow any attempt to forbid such sale. The family living would often pass under some temporary stress of agricultural depression, when the alienation of a turn only might have preserved it; and a system of illicit and clandestine sale, far more immoral than anything which now exists, would be devised by the evil wits of the livings trade. The conscientious patron would sell the old living out and out, and the unscrupulous one would plunge into the gulf of corrupt practices.

THE EDUCATION ESTIMATES.

ON Monday last Mr. MUNDELLA laid the Education Estimates before the House of Commons. The sum required for the coming financial year exceeds three millions sterling. Taken as a whole, the statement of Mr. MUNDELLA is satisfactory, and the large sums spent on education will not be grudged by the country, though opinions may differ as to the question whether they could not in some cases be spent more wisely. The increase of 77,000*l.* over the Estimates of last year seems to be fully accounted for by the natural development of our educational system. In nearly all respects signs of steady progress are to be noticed. During the past year 18,540 schools were inspected, as against 18,289 in the previous year. There was an increase of 84,000 in the number of scholars on the register. The average attendance during the year was 3,127,000, which showed an increase of 112,000. In average attendance, in the percentage of passes at examinations, and in the proportion of those who passed the higher standards to the whole number individually examined, there has been an increase. It is satisfactory to read that there is a decrease of 2,800*l.* in the payment of children's fees, and that these payments are now "moribund." In the schools at present existing there is accommodation for 4,670,000 scholars, showing an increase of 132,000 over the previous year. There is thus school accommodation for a larger number by several hundred thousand than the names in the register, and larger by more than a million than those in average attendance. In the number of certificated and assistant teachers there is an increase of more than 4,500. The average attendance is now a trifle over 73 per cent. for England, and a little over 76 per cent. for Scotland. The number of those examined in the higher standards has steadily increased. It is also noteworthy that, while the number of certificated and assistant teachers has been largely on the increase, that of the pupil teachers has been greatly on the decline. Thus in two years the increase in the number of the former was a little over 8,000, and the decrease in the number of the latter a little over 7,000. This means, on the one hand, that the teaching is more efficient, and on the other, as Mr. MUNDELLA pointed out, that the strain of long hours of teaching is not any more, to the same extent as formerly, thrown upon those too young to bear it. That much still remains to be done in England was shown by Mr. MUNDELLA'S reference to the state of education on the Continent. In Germany and Switzerland a child cannot be employed in a manufactory till he reaches the age of fourteen years; and he then, till he has finished his sixteenth year, must attend a night school to supplement the education which he has already had in the day school. Another defect in our present system was pointed out by Mr. MUNDELLA. In England the average attendance of children is 73 per cent. of the total number on the register. In Switzerland, Germany, and even Austria (which latter country many people suppose to be still in a state of primeval darkness), the average attendance is 95 per cent. In other words, there is in England a daily average of children absent from school amounting to one million one hundred thousand. Mr. MUNDELLA attributes this fact partly to the indifference of parents and also to the neglect of duty on the part of local authorities. To these causes may be added the natural inclination of many children of the weaklier sort to play truant from lessons above their capacity. In the rural districts, according to Mr. MUNDELLA, the farmers and the clergy are by no means of one mind with regard to school attendance. The clergy are most anxious that the children should go to school; but the Guardians do not back them up by enforcing attendance, and the Education Department appears to be powerless in the matter except in the way of giving advice. What can be done by private exertions is shown by the signal success of the Jews' free school in the East End of London. It is the largest in the United Kingdom, and accommodates 3,300 children. The average attendance in the school is 95 per cent.; the scholars make the highest classes in England; many of the pupils are of foreign origin, and over fifteen per cent. of them are the children of Russian or Polish Jews who have taken refuge in England from the persecution to which they have been subjected in their own country. Thus, under unfavourable circumstances, the zeal and philanthropy of individuals can attain results which throw into the shade the organized efforts of Government.

Mr. FORSTER, speaking near Leeds on Wednesday last, gave an account of the progress of education in this country rather more rose-coloured than (satisfactory as this progress is) the facts quoted by Mr. MUNDELLA bear out. It is true that, owing in part to the exertions of these two gentlemen, while, before the passing of the Act of 1870, only one in fourteen of the population attended an elementary school, one in six are now on the register. But when he said that "our "elementary education now was as good as in the United "States, that it was better than in France, that it was "quickly catching up similar education in Germany and "Switzerland," he is distinctly in contradiction to Mr. MUNDELLA. Without comparing in detail our own elementary education with that of Germany and Switzerland, it is enough to point to our low average of attendance, as compared with the high average in those countries, to show how over-sanguine Mr. FORSTER's view is. Unless education is conducted regularly half of its value is lost. Nor does there exist in Germany, and still less in Switzerland, that large outcast class, which swarms in London and in all great towns, and to which the teaching which they get in order to pass the lowest standards is almost of no use at all. Whatever good may be done to them in school is rapidly undone at home (if one can call it home) or in the streets. There is another matter closely connected with this subject which urgently requires consideration. The question has often been raised whether the average children of the working classes—or, to put it more accurately, a considerable proportion of them—can bear the mental strain which is now put upon them by our public elementary schools. It has this week been brought prominently before the public by a letter in the Times of last Monday from Dr. CRICHTON BROWNE, whose high reputation is not confined to the medical profession only, and also by remarks made in both Houses of Parliament. Dr. CRICHTON BROWNE was invited by Mr. MUNDELLA to investigate the question and report to him as to the results arrived at. The conclusion to which Dr. CRICHTON BROWNE came was that there is "strong evidence that over-pressure exists in "elementary schools, that it is even now injuriously affect-"ing the health of the children, and that it promises a "rich harvest of degeneration hereafter." Dr. CRICHTON BROWNE's report, which has not been published, and on which therefore we are not in a position to express an opinion, has been publicly criticized by members of the Government in a hostile spirit. This is doubly unfair. In the first place they have neglected to show the public both sides of a question of extreme importance. And, in the second, when the report comes to be published (as will soon be the case) they will have prejudiced, by their depreciatory criticism, the minds of many persons against the conclusions arrived at by the unbiassed investigation of a scientific man of high authority. To the public at large in such a case the presumption is always apt to be that the Government is right and the expert wrong. Better-informed people may draw a different conclusion, and feel inclined, in the absence of positive evidence, to trust rather to those who have made the study of mental and nervous phenomena the business of their lives, than to those who have a strong political motive to make out that the system which exists, and for which they are responsible, is the right one. However, until the report is published it is as well to suspend judgment. It is obvious, however, that "over-pressure" varies not only with the individual, but with the class of society in which the child is brought up. When the child has fresh air, plenty of wholesome food, sufficient exercise, and a comfortable home, much more mental work can be got out of him without any bad results than if he is, like many of the children of the poor, the stunted, half-starved, ill-bred offspring of diseased parents, living in a filthy court or lane. Many of those whom the School Board has swept into our elementary schools belong to this class. They inherit feeble brains, and their home training does nothing to repair the deficiencies of nature, but rather tends to confirm them. It is a not unnatural mistake for persons of the well-to-do classes to fancy that lessons which they learned themselves with ease and pleasure in the nursery or schoolroom of a well-conducted home put no strain on the minds of children less happily situated. But the differences of circumstances must be taken into account. Many of the weakly children in our Board Schools, after lessons imperfectly understood in school hours, go home to some wretched tenement, there to learn, as best they can, perhaps in the same room with drunken parents and screaming brothers, the lesson for the following day. A recent decision in a court of justice has shown that home lessons cannot be legally enforced. Our educational system must be adapted to the needs of our own people; and, as long as in our great cities there exists an outcast class which breeds children weak in mind and body, their weakness must be taken into account in administering our system of public instruction.

GERMAN PEASANT PROPRIETORS.

DURING the earlier months of the present year an official inquiry has been made by most of the German Governments into the condition of the agricultural population, with results that are by no means encouraging for the advocates of peasant-proprietorship. There are districts, principally those celebrated for their vintages, in which the soil will repay almost any amount of labour; and in these the peasants seem, on the whole, to be doing fairly well. The field is treated as a garden; every child is of use; and the more that is done the better the yield is likely to be both in quantity and quality. It may be noted that the case is very similar in Italy. In Tuscany, where the olives, and in other parts where the orange-trees yield the most important crop, the tenant-farmers and the labourers are comparatively well off, as they are also in the scattered villages where the silkworm and its produce afford employment for the women and children. It is only when one comes into the parts that produce nothing but wheat, Indian corn, and other grains which do not improve in proportion to the amount of extra labour expended upon them that one is brought face to face with actual destitution. In Germany, again, there are provinces in which the increase of the population is slow, and the single estates are for the most part large; and here, too, the peasant proprietors seem to have little cause of complaint, except the general depression from which the agriculture of Western Europe has of late suffered.

As soon as we turn from such favoured districts, however, we find that the worst forebodings of the pessimists are being fulfilled. Almost everywhere the debts of the peasantry are increasing at an alarming rate, and in many places speculators are buying their land, and thus forming large estates which they are said to manage on purely commercial principles, without any of the kindly feeling which those who inherit land usually show to their tenants and labourers. The reason of this is obvious. A proprietor who has four sons must either leave his land to one or divide it among them. In the latter case, the land would in the course of a few generations be parcelled out into such little pieces as would hardly repay the cost of cultivation, far less support a family. In Germany, as a rule, a single son, the eldest or the youngest—the custom differs in different places—inherits the estate, on the condition of paying to his brothers and sisters a sum of money which stands in a certain relation to the estimated value of the land. We need not enter into particulars. In some parts of the country it is usual that all children share alike; in others the heir has only to divide a part of the value of his inheritance—say a third—between the other members of the family. But even in the latter case he can only raise the money by means of a mortgage.

Down to 1866 the peasants were artificially protected by laws of an extremely patriarchal character. Thus, no one was allowed to marry until he could convince the authorities of his parish (Gemeinde) that he was able to support a wife and family. These regulations may have had a bad moral effect, but they acted as a protection for the small landed proprietors. They were all swept away by the legislation of the earlier German Parliaments, too suddenly, as some of those who were most strongly opposed to them on principle are ready to confess, and now many of the most earnest German politicians are racking their brains to discover a new artificial means of protecting the peasants from the action of those economic laws which will undoubtedly destroy the class if they are left unopposed.

It is not our intention to enter into a consideration of any of their proposals, but the difficulty with which they are struggling is not without a certain suggestiveness for Englishmen who are asked to make a considerable sacrifice for the purpose of establishing peasant-proprietorship in Ireland. The soil and climate of the island are not suited to the culture of the vine, the olive, or the orange, or indeed to any culture that repays continual care; the Irish, with all their virtues, are not generally thought to be a thrifty race, and, unlike the French, they have generally large families. Are the reformers who desire to substitute a population of peasant proprietors for one of tenant-farmers and field-labourers prepared to take the steps necessary to secure the success of their design? Will they affront the moral feeling of the United Kingdom and bid defiance to the priesthood by placing restrictions on marriage, as the old German laws did? Are they ready to enforce a strict entail, and enact that no burden shall be laid upon the land for the benefit of any member of the family except the heir? If they do not adopt these or similar measures, to which they are thought to be opposed both by prejudice and on principle, their reform will be stillborn, the land will be mortgaged to creditors before it is redeemed from the Government, and they will bring new misery upon a country whose greatest curse is that it has so long served as a text for the political Radical, as a subject for the economic quack.

A PUBLIC PROSECUTOR.

THE popular delusion that there is a Public Prosecutor in this country will probably survive even the Report of the Committee appointed by the HOME SECRETARY. There is not one, however, any more than there is a Public Executioner. It used to be the custom of Sheriffs, before the eccentricities of Mr. BINNS excited a prejudice against him, to employ at every execution the same man. But they were not bound to do so; and Sir JOHN MAULE is not bound to prosecute the person most justly suspected of the most heinous crime. It is but justice towards the framers of the Act of 1879 to say that they did not mislead the country by calling the functionary whom they created a Public Prosecutor. They called him Director of Public Prosecutions—a perfectly accurate title. When the State takes upon itself the duty of prosecuting, it is Sir JOHN MAULE who decides that this shall be done. But what almost every one understands by a Public Prosecutor is an officer who, like the Procurator Fiscal in Scotland, has the duty and the sole right of putting any one upon his trial for an offence against the law. This is what has always been advocated by those who thought that the Continental system should be introduced into England. It is certainly what Sir ALEXANDER COCKBURN meant when he expressed his conviction, as he did repeatedly, that grave public mischief resulted from permitting any individual, however foolish or wicked, to set the criminal law in motion at his sole will and pleasure. The late Government were not prepared to go this length. But they wanted to do something, and so Sir RICHARD CROSS brought in and carried the experimental measure which has just been pronounced by an impartial tribunal to be an absolute failure. The Act of 1879, it must be remembered, introduced no new principle into our jurisprudence. Indictments have always run in the name of the Crown, though any one may bring any one else before a magistrate, and though, even if the magistrate will not commit, he may send up a Bill to the Grand Jury. Cases of real or assumed importance to the community at large have usually been taken up and conducted by the Treasury at the direct cost of the taxpayer, whereas private prosecutors must get their expenses from the county, which again recovers them from the imperial exchequer. Since 1879, as before, prosecutions which were considered sufficiently grave or difficult have been instituted by the Solicitor to the Treasury, the only difference being that the Director of Public Prosecutions was first consulted. It was no doubt thought that the new machinery would of itself increase the number of cases managed by Government, and remove the prevalent dissatisfaction with a capricious and irregular administration of criminal justice. These expectations have, however, been completely falsified by events. Sir JOHN MAULE, less from any fault of his own than from the inherent weakness of his position, has been assailed by constant complaints, and has certainly contrived in a remarkable degree to leave undone those things which he ought to have done, and to do those things which he ought not to have done. The Committee find that "the "existing system—which in its inception was merely of "a tentative character—requires modification and develop-"ment." For "modification and development" we should propose to read "abolition and reconstruction."

Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT announced on Monday night, in reply to Mr. MONK, that the Government contemplated introducing a Bill to carry out the recommendations of the Report. It therefore becomes the more important to scrutinize what the Committee have recommended. "It "appears to us," they say, "that it would conduce both to "efficiency and economy if the duty of deciding in which "cases the State should undertake the prosecution were "united in the same department with that upon which is "devolved the duty of practically conducting the prose-"cution when determined on." This means a return to the old system, and a simple admission that the new system has failed. The Committee might, of course, have proposed that the Director of Public Prosecutions should have the entire conduct of prosecutions, and should annex to his own duties those now undertaken by the Treasury itself. But this, as they justly point out, would involve great waste of time and labour; and, indeed, there can be but one answer to the question which the Committee propound. If the alternative be between giving the Director the powers of the Treasury and giving the Treasury the powers of the Director, there cannot be much difficulty in choosing. Those who believe in the necessity of a Public Prosecutor would, of course, dissent from both proposals. The particular solution of the difficulty which the Committee advise is to make the Solicitor to the Treasury Director of Public Prosecutions, as he has already been made Queen's Proctor in matrimonial causes. Mr. STEPHENSON is, no doubt, fully prepared for the adequate discharge of any responsibilities which may be cast upon him. But a mere amalgamation of offices ought not to satisfy the public, as it will not meet the points which have been raised. Mr. STEPHENSON would, according to this scheme, be the sole head of what the Committee call the "consolidated depart-"ment." He would superintend the conduct of business, both civil and criminal, being called Director of Public Prosecutions and Solicitor to the Treasury. Under him would be two assistant solicitors, one presiding over civil, the other over criminal, affairs. Sir JOHN MAULE'S department now costs the country four thousand a year, and the money can certainly be saved without impairing the efficiency of the public service. The Committee go on to recommend the appointment of district prosecutors throughout the country, and are obviously disposed to believe that the Scotch institution of Procurators Fiscal might be advantageously adopted on this side of the Tweed. But the Committee recoil in horror from the cost, and do not venture to propose the expenditure requisite for the purpose. The Committee find that the chief merit of the Scotch system, which is also adopted to some extent in Ireland, lies in its securing a report of every offence being made, as soon as it occurs, to some central authority. The Committee believe that this end may be secured by calling upon all chief constables and chief officers of police to furnish the Solicitor to the Treasury with a list of all indictable offences committed within their district. The Solicitor to the Treasury may then either conduct the prosecution himself or entrust some local lawyer with it.

Such are the main outlines of the scheme which the Committee recommend. They further suggest that the new Director of Public Prosecutions shall undertake every capital case, and every case which he thinks is unlikely to be efficiently conducted by other means. The "London "Agencies" now employed would be abolished, and the Committee anticipate a considerable saving from the adoption of their plan. No doubt the Act of 1879 has been extravagant as well as impracticable. As a mere question of machinery the Committee's scheme may be better than the present. The HOME SECRETARY and the LAW OFFICERS of the Crown, assisted by Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, Sir HENRY HOLLAND, Mr. GORST, Mr. HENRY FOWLER, and Mr. FRANK MOWATT, could scarcely help making some valuable recommendations. But we miss from their Report any real recognition of the principle on which the State ought to act. They halt, like the last Parliament, between two opinions. There is something to be said for leaving the criminal law to be set in motion by the party injured or his representatives. It has, however, been found impossible to abide by this doctrine. The very facts that there is at this present moment a Director of Public Prosecutions, and that the Solicitor to the Treasury does not confine himself to protecting the interests of the Government, are enough to show that the State recognises its duty in punishing as well as detecting crime. But the present arrangement is a makeshift, which is practically inconvenient, as well as theoretically indefensible. There is nothing to ensure the intelligent conduct of an ordinary prosecution. In the country the proceedings are usually undertaken by the police. The evidence is apt to be collected and arranged in a very slovenly way. Sometimes a copy of the depositions taken before the magistrates is handed to counsel, without a word of explanation, just before the commencement of the trial. There is no reason why offences should not be hushed up, or proceedings compromised, without the consent, or even the knowledge, of any one representing the public. On the other hand, a prosecution may be instituted by any one. The Attorney-General has indeed the right to interpose, but he never does, and, if he did, his action would be regarded with some suspicion. It is easy enough to account for this historically. It dates from a time when there was no distinction between crimes and torts, when the vindication of the law was regarded as part of the wild justice of revenge. Nowadays the State is expected and invited to do a great many queer things, and to make large encroachments upon what used to be considered the sphere of individual action. Yet it hesitates to take upon its shoulders the protection of the public against crime and outrage. Surely this is a matter which belongs to the legitimate functions of Government. The Committee appear to think that a slight change of machinery will remove all difficulties. In this, we think, they are gravely mistaken. The criminal law is not the sort of weapon to be left in the hands of TOM, DICK, and HARRY; nor can men be trusted to undertake what is of no personal advantage to them.

THE ANARCHY IN ZULULAND.

THE Government has once more formally refused to assume control or responsibility in Zululand outside the Reserve; but Lord DERBY acknowledges the duty of defending the territory which was grudgingly appropriated or admitted to protection by his predecessor. A few additional troops have been placed at the disposal of the Resident; and in all probability the Usutus and their Boer allies will avoid a direct collision with the English authorities. It is greatly to be regretted that Lord KIMBERLEY capriciously excluded from English protection one half of the district which was recommended as desirable by Sir H. BULWER. A still better arrangement would have been the establishment of a Protectorate over the whole of CETEWAYO'S former dominions; but the English Government has of late almost always shrunk with virtuous horror from any course of action which tended at the smallest risk to prevent bloodshed. The Reserve itself has not been wholly exempt from alarms, and on one occasion at least Mr. OSBORNE seems to have been engaged in actual conflict; but after all disasters and humiliations the English flag will for the present probably inspire respect. The statement that USIBEPU has taken refuge in the Reserve is officially confirmed; and his late defeat is evidently decisive, as his force was unable to resist the Boer sharpshooters. It appears that the Usutus were at first defeated; but the battle was restored by a formidable contingent of five hundred Boers. Even if he could hope to retrieve the disaster, he could not be allowed to use territory which is virtually English as a base for warlike enterprises. In the early part of the native war he was generally successful; and it was from him that the unfortunate CETEWAYO incurred the defeats which resulted in his death.

As far as he acted on the defensive USIBEPU was in the right, for his title to the province which he held was originally conferred by Sir GARNET WOLSELEY; and it was lately recognized by the terms which were imposed on CETEWAYO as conditions of his restoration. The exceptional valour which was shown to USIBEPU was wholly to be attributed to the natural strength of his position. The country which he ruled was at the opposite extremity of Zululand from the frontier of Natal; and it seemed prudent to give a legal title to a petty potentate who could not be conveniently dethroned. The exiled KING, with an excusable misapprehension of legal and ethical principles, persuaded himself that the conditions which he was compelled to accept were for that reason not binding. In London, and again at Capetown, he plainly intimated his purpose of claiming the whole of his former dominions; and, on his arrival in the country, he immediately made preparations for invading the territory of his former vassal. JOHN DUNN, against whom he was still more embittered, was for the time out of his reach in the Reserve; and, although none of the chiefs showed enthusiasm in his cause, USIBEPU was the most prominent of his opponents. It is not certain whether the restored KING, or the chieftain whom he regarded as a rebel, first began hostilities; but USIBEPU, who seems to possess some military aptitude, at once assumed the offensive. In several combats and skirmishes he obtained considerable advantage; and at last he drove his enemy out of his principal stronghold; and, on the death of the KING, he might have been supposed to be absolutely secure in his possessions. It is not improbable that he may have been encouraged by his victory to enlarge his pretensions; but it is now doubtful whether he will be able to retain his own possessions.

It soon appeared that the so-called party of the KING was not dissolved by his death. His own special tribe continued the war under the command of a chief who had been called CETEWAYO'S Minister; and perhaps the belligerents themselves may not have clearly defined the issues for which they have since been fighting. Even among civilized nations the causes and objects of war have often shifted during the course of a prolonged struggle. The Zulus have probably blood feuds to prosecute, and losses of cattle to revenge, even when they are not contending for disputed lands or for local supremacy. Their new petty quarrels will now be superseded by the more ambitious schemes of the victorious Boers. A state of internal war may probably have been the normal condition of the Zulus before they were drilled into a single military force by CETEWAYO or his ancestors. If the English Government had thought fit to accept the almost unanimous advice of its own agents, USIBEPU and his adversaries might, perhaps, not even have wished to break the peace. When a Colonial Secretary complacently declares that he is not the keeper of a barbarous chieftain in his neighbourhood, he may sometimes repudiate an important moral duty. If a Power which ought to be paramount abdicates its proper functions, the consequences to itself and its subjects are often serious, especially if there is a possible rival who may not be equally scrupulous or timid. It would probably not have been necessary to send even a small military force into the Reserve if the different Zulu chiefs had been in the first instance peremptorily forbidden to prosecute their quarrels. Mr. GLADSTONE himself can scarcely claim for the Usutus or their opponents the privileges accorded to the surviving Arabs of the Soudan as patriots fighting for their freedom. Permitted anarchy is, even to warlike savages, a more than questionable boon; and in this instance the policy of the English Government had been the origin of the civil war and of its more alarming consequences.

Unfriendly moralists and foreign critics may be inclined to hope that retribution is following close on an alternate display of officious interference and deliberate neglect. If the feuds of the Zulus are regarded with selfish indifference, the extension of the territory of the adventurous Boers involves an obvious danger. Those who set CETEWAYO loose to attack his enemies might have foreseen that the weaker combatant would, if he found himself in difficulties, resort to the protection of his formidable neighbours. The Boers, who have long claimed a portion of the north-western territory of the Zulus, would perhaps in any case have profited by the refusal of England to assume the sovereignty of the whole country. A convenient opportunity for swarming over the frontier was furnished by the native dissensions. For some time past Boer Volunteers have been fighting in alliance with the KING'S party; and, according to one improbable account, there were Dutch auxiliaries on both sides in a recent battle. The rumour perhaps merely indicates the impartiality with which the Boers regard the respective claims of USIBEPU and of the Usutus. Every volunteer is really fighting for his own hand; but success appears by a natural consequence to have increased their pretensions. The appointment of DINIZULU as King in the place of his father is both substantially and formally a claim of sovereign power. It is impossible to forget that a similar assertion of supremacy was made on behalf of the English Government when Mr. SHEPSTONE assisted at the enthronement of CETEWAYO. On that occasion it might be doubtful whether, in assisting to crown the hereditary leader of a powerful army, the English agent was recognizing existing facts, or conferring an additional title. DINIZULU, who has no considerable force at his disposal, must consider himself the dependent of his foreign benefactors. In the probable contingency of border disputes between the Zulus and the occupiers of the Reserve or the colonists in Natal, it may be difficult to avoid collision with their patrons and allies. It is also not improbable that the territory of one or both of the South African Republics may be extended at the expense of the native population and to the detriment of English settlers. The most serious result of a timid policy is that for the first time doubts are arising as to the loyalty of the Dutch colonists in Natal. Many of them are said to have joined the invading force before or after the defeat of USIBEPU; but their number may perhaps have been exaggerated by rumour.

The reception of the Transvaal deputation in Holland and in Germany was not encouraging to English political optimists. Mr. KRUGER and his colleagues had succeeded in obtaining from the Colonial Office almost all the concessions which they desired; and Lord DERBY can scarcely be blamed for allowing the inevitable consequences of the wretched surrender made by his present colleagues before he became a member of the Cabinet. The delegates had the satisfaction of securing the nominal independence of their country; and they surrendered little or nothing in exchange. Their diplomatic communications with other Governments appear to have been equally successful. They have apparently not negotiated a loan in the Netherlands; but they have arranged with the Portuguese for the construction of a railway which will give them access to the sea; and they were received at Berlin with a condescending enthusiasm which must have surprised themselves. The attentions which were paid to the deputation by Prince BISMARCK, and by the EMPEROR himself, would require no comment if there were not grounds for believing that the German Government is disposed to engage in large enterprises of colonization. It is of course impossible to dispute the right of other European Powers to imitate the enterprises which have resulted in the creation of the English Empire. It may nevertheless be allowable to regret the probable extension of colonial and commercial rivalry. In general it may be said that every civilized encroachment on barbarism is in a great degree directed against English trade. It is with this object that the French prosecute conquests in Madagascar and in Tonquin. The annexation by Germany of the comparatively unimportant district of Angra Pequeña may be the first instalment of a system of formidable aggression.

DISUSED BURIAL-GROUNDS.

MR. HANNAY'S decision on Tuesday as to the Peel Grove case must not be taken as in any sense conclusive. The facts of the case were only incidentally before him. It was not denied that a Mr. KELDAY, now dead, having made all the money he could out of a graveyard which belonged to him, wished and intended to build over it without removing the bodies. The ground now belongs to Mr. CHAMBERS, a builder, who proposes to carry out Mr. KELDAY'S intentions. The Metropolitan Board of Works, in consequence, summoned him for a breach of their by-law forbidding the erection of dwelling-houses on land filled up or covered with "material mixed or impregnated with "animal matter." The defence set up was that this by-law does not apply, and it is upon this question that Mr. HANNAY'S decision was given. It is satisfactory to know that he expressed his willingness to grant a case for the higher Court; and no doubt we shall hear more of the matter. As things stand now, it seems, there is no law which will restrain a man from building on ground absolutely made up of decaying bodies. He may not disturb them. The Common Law forbids it as a misdemeanour. But he may, if he please, build houses on them and let those houses to people willing to take them. The history of the Peel Grove Cemetery is well known. It has been before the public for a long time, and there is something to be said for the defendant's side of the case, the more so as it was the previous owner who first made the ground a cemetery, and who subsequently cleared it of tombstones and prepared it for building. He is reported to have made a considerable sum by the burial of at least twenty thousand bodies in his ground. He opened it in 1844. The cholera epidemic of 1849 was especially severe at the East End, and thousands of the smitten were buried in the Peel Grove Cemetery, which was situated in Old Ford Road, not far from where the Bethnal Green Museum now stands. In 1855 the little plot was so full that the bodies lay eight deep, the coffins being shoulder to shoulder. The Board interfered, and obtained an Order in Council to restrain Mr. KELDAY from permitting any further burials. This source of income being thus dried up, Mr. KELDAY, after a brief interval, had the ground cleared. The tombstones were removed, and a mortuary chapel, in which burial services had been held, was pulled down. The ground had never been formally consecrated, and was, so far as the tombstones and chapel were concerned, entirely in the power of the freeholder, thus affording another example of the excellent effects of multiplying small estates in London, in accordance with the views of some enlightened politicians. Next a notice appeared inviting the deposit of rubbish. Soon a new surface was obtained by this means, and the cemetery was forgotten. The owner then made an attempt to sell the "deserted piece "of ground," as it was described before Mr. HANNAY, for building purposes, and actually succeeded in finding a purchaser for a portion. The Board, however, interfered. The present state of the case was tersely put by the defendant's counsel, Mr. GAINSFORD BRUCE, Q.C. Mr. BESLEY, for the Board, inquired if there was any way by which the building could be stopped otherwise than by the course now taken. Mr. BRUCE replied:—"Under the Metropolitan Open Spaces "Act, 1881, you can stop it if you pay compensation to the "owner. You want to stop it without paying." He went on to show, and he showed successfully, in the opinion of the magistrate, that the words of the by-law do not meet the case. The defendant had complied with a letter he had received from the Surveyor of the Board, and had removed any objectionable matter found "between the "surface and the bottom of the foundation." The objectionable matter was not human bodies, but only, in Mr. HANNAY'S words, "dead cats, cabbage stalks, and "other fetid substances." That is to say, the Board can prevent a building from being erected on the body of a dead cat, but not on the body of a dead man. This reduction to an absurdity is, it seems, law, though it cannot by any stretch of the reasoning powers be considered right. Meanwhile, pending the decision of a higher Court, and pending the possibility of the Board seeing its way to compensating the landlord, it is satisfactory to learn that a Bill dealing with such cases as this, and, in fact, mentioning the Peel Grove Cemetery by name, is before the House of Commons. "Before the House of Commons" does not mean much in these days of tactless leadership. It depends somewhat on which M.P. has charge of the Bill whether it will pass in time to restrain the speculative builder. Sir JAMES HOGG may succeed where others would fail. But since it is certain that if houses are built they will be inhabited, and is equally certain that not even concrete will prevent the dissemination of poisonous gas from bodies some of which have not yet been thirty years buried, it is much to be hoped that the Bill will be passed at once. In Dr. CORFIELD'S lecture on Thursday week at the Health Exhibition he expressly mentioned the miasmatic character acquired by ground infected with the germs of choleraic poison. The Peel Grove Cemetery answers exactly to the learned Professor's description. Mr. HANNAY'S decision may have the effect of calling attention to it.

FRANCE.

FOREIGNERS, and particularly Englishmen, are most concerned for the moment in watching the development of what are called at Paris the legitimate interests of France. By a well-established tradition its politics are judged to become dull when they cease to be revolutionary. It is true that this, is not often the case, but there have been intervals of stagnation, and, superficially at least, it looks as if the French are in the middle of one now. In foreign politics these breaks are of even rarer occurrence. They happen just after a disastrous war. At other times the French are engaged in rounding off their property, and, as it is long enough since the war with Germany for that process to have begun again, there is nothing surprising in the fact that it is in full swing. Tonquin is settled for a year or two, and now it is the turn of Madagascar. Admiral GALIBER has not succeeded better than Admiral

PIERRE in bringing the Hovas to submission, and, accordingly, the soldiers who took Bacninh and Sontay are, if all tales be true, going to settle that little difficulty at Antanarivo. They will have their work cut out for them; but they will certainly effect more than the squadron which has tried to terrify the Hovas by bombarding a third party. Taken in connexion with the highly moral language used at Paris, this spectacle is diverting and instructive. While the French are feeling the most intensely virtuous disgust at the exorbitant demands of England, they are starting on a war of conquest which was set going by nobody knows what, in defence of interests which had never existed except on paper. Meanwhile, M. ORDEGA has apparently succeeded perfectly in his little coup in Morocco. The Shereef of WAZAN has become the man of the French Republic, and a rectification of frontier is in progress. Adventures of this kind are apt to lead to all sorts of results, but for the present their chief importance lies in the apt illustration they afford of the truth that whoever wishes to keep on good terms with France must make his mind up to play Sir PETER to her LADY TEAZLE. If he yields everything, he will be rewarded with smiles and the privilege of drawing unlimited cheques. If he grows restive, there will be tears, scolding, and endless racket in the house. Just at a time when a heaven-sent Minister is trying the effect of long-suffering with a Power which always asks for everything, and proposes to give nothing, it is as well to be reminded of these things. When the long-expected proposals to be laid before the Conference are at last made public, it will be very surprising if it does not appear that France in Egypt is very like France in Madagascar and Morocco.

The Army Bill, which is about to go up from the Chamber of Deputies to the Senate, is in detail a forbidding subject enough. All Army Bills are apt to lead to debates bristling with figures, which are capable of proving anything, according as they are used. We have a painful experience of the barrenness of such discussions ourselves. Lords and Commons are both given to showing, at least once or twice in every Session, how completely the essential can be lost sight of in the course of a wrangle over figures. Thanks to the Frenchman's love of a general principle, there is no doubt about the question at issue in the Chamber. M. PAUL BERT has set it forth with the most absolute precision. The Army Bill is, of course, meant to improve the army; but that is comparatively a minor object. What it is to do in the first place is to perfect the democratic equality of France by compelling everybody without distinction to serve his three years in the ranks. This heroic measure may secure a better body of non-commissioned officers. M. BERT, and his fellow-democrat the MINISTER of WAR, hope and believe it will; but they are quite sure that it will put a stop for ever to the exemptions enjoyed by the bourgeoisie and other "favourites of fortune." The scientific deputy naturally insists most on the wholesome moral effects of the Bill, while General CAMPENON has referred at least occasionally to its possible good qualities as a military law, but in the main they agree. When the Chamber shows signs of growing restive, the General, who is fond of posing as the rough and honest soldier, threatens them with the next election, and talks about the selfishness of the favourites of fortune. The Chamber murmurs a little, and then yields. It has acted throughout like a body of men who are being driven to do what they believe unwise by sheer fear. At the bottom of its heart it does not believe that the Bill will improve the army, and it does know that a universal obligation to serve three years in the ranks will put a weight on learning, science, art, and the higher industries in France such as they suffer from nowhere else. It will fill the army with men to whom military service in peace is an almost insufferable burden, and if it gets over the difficulty of finding non-commissioned officers, it will be because educated men think it better to spend the time they must pass in the barracks as servants and corporals rather than as common soldiers. When these objections are made, the MINISTER of WAR has one answer—all Frenchmen must be made equal in all things, and the Chamber obeys. The deputies coquetted with the amendment of M. DURAND, who proposed to exempt the pupils of the Ecole Normale Supérieure; they gave a half-hearted support to M. LANESSAN, who wished to give exemptions to those who could pass certain examinations at the end of one or two years' service. They have looked at one amendment after another intended to modify the pedantic uniformity of the Bill, but they have done no more. Common sense and courage may return to the terrified representatives of the people; but up to the present they have committed themselves completely by accepting the clauses fixing the duration of military service at three years, and by rejecting all possible forms of exemption except those of a purely physical kind. When M. THIERS passed the military laws of 1872, he insisted on the folly of supposing that the German system could be bodily transported to France. Events have plentifully justified his opinion. His own modified imitation has failed to produce a satisfactory army, and now general military service is being made the means of producing something as little German as may be—a democratic universal dead level. In Germany the first consideration is the efficiency of the army. In France that is considered after the meaner feelings of the constituencies.

The Senate in dealing with the question of divorce has, as might be expected, shown the other side of the French character. Frenchmen are conservative almost to timidity in all that touches property or the family. They have an instinctive feeling that it is only their profound respect for their primary institutions which has kept France from falling to pieces in the continual changes of the last century. When the Senate was at last persuaded to pass a Bill permitting the dissolution of marriage, it determined to do it in the most conservative possible way. It has gone back to the Civil Code of the Revolution as it was before the reaction of 1816. To a certain extent it has been influenced by knowing that the country is more likely to accept the old Civil Code, which has an imposing name, than the ideas of M. NAQUET. On the whole, however, it has probably taken the old law simply because it thought that the old law made divorce quite easy enough. Even the distinction drawn by former legislators between the adultery of the wife and the adultery of the husband has been left untouched. Englishmen at least will not deny that the Senate has chosen the right course in the main; but one of the provisions of the Divorce Bill seems curiously calculated to defeat its own object. If the Bill passes unchanged through the Chamber of Deputies, it will prohibit marriage between the divorced wife and the person who appeared at the trial as co-respondent. It has been generally supposed that the risk of having to contract an undesirable marriage under pressure of social opinion acts as a check on Don JUAN. Even severe moralists may fail to see what is gained by refusing sinners all chance of making some sort of atonement to society and to one another. The Senate is not of that opinion. It thinks that enough will be done if the husband can rid himself of his wife, and it leaves Don JUAN the same invulnerable person as before. The question is perhaps chiefly one of sentiment, and Frenchmen must be supposed to know what they want their society to be; but to Englishmen it does appear as if French ideas of morality were fearfully and wonderfully made.

THE CLAIMS OF THE CYCLISTS.

THE cyclists, as becomes a fraternity whose very name is a challenge to the timid etymologist, have shown themselves judiciously moderate in their demand for an extension of their locomotive privileges. They keenly feel, it seems, their exclusion from the metropolitan Parks, and they are seeking to gain entrance to them; but they have very wisely abstained from the attempt to force their way into all of them in any high-handed and premature fashion. They have evidently been looking forward for some time to obtaining admission for their vehicles to these hitherto forbidden spots, as for their name into the dictionary; and as a mere matter of convenience we shall have to admit them both. In the meantime their attitude has been essentially one of sweet reasonableness. Lord BURY, who the other day introduced the deputation from the National Cyclists' Union to Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE, prefaced his remarks by the acknowledgment that it would be unadvisable to ask for the admission of velocipedes to the Hyde Park, the Green Park, and St. James's Park, but he thought that the FIRST COMMISSIONER might not be adverse to admitting them to Finsbury, Battersea, and Victoria Parks under certain regulations, and also to the Regent's Park. So careful indeed was the spokesman of the cyclists to seclude his brethren from temptations which might be too strong for their civic virtue, that he refrained from asking for the privilege of using the whole of the Park last mentioned. There was, he observed with a certain embarrassment, a "rather tempting circle round "Regent's Park which might be used for racing, and this "he should think rather unadvisable, but if their vehicles "were allowed to enter on the south-west corner and to go "round the Park to the north-east corner, that would "probably obviate racing or other objectionable practices." To these requests the FIRST COMMISSIONER of WORKS made a most statesmanlike reply. He complimented the deputation on "the temperate manner in which they had put "forward their views"; glanced briefly at the mechanical distinction between bicycles and tricycles, while expressing, "after having given full attention to the subject," his concurrence with the deputation in thinking that it would be unadvisable to discriminate administratively between the two vehicles; and, finally, acceded to the application on the three conditions, that racing should be forbidden, that nothing like parades or "processions" should be permitted, and that the admission of cyclists should be only for the purposes of "traffic," and not for the purposes of exercise.

These reservations of the FIRST COMMISSIONER are in substance so commendable that it seems ungracious to criticize their wording. We forbear, therefore, to dwell upon the somewhat startling conception of a cyclist using the Park for "purposes of traffic"; and substituting "transit," nostro periculo, for the word selected by Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE, we may say at once that he has here not only laid down the sole conditions under which "cycling" in places of public resort is at all tolerable, but has, in our judgment, accurately defined the only sensible and legitimate use of the cyclist's machine. For practically it is by no means the truism it looks to insist upon the fact that the sole end and aim of him who mounts a bicycle or tricycle is, or should be, to increase his powers of locomotion. The necessity of Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE'S prohibition—not so much of races, which, though intolerable in public, may yet be indulged in with a practical purpose, but of "parades" and "processions"—is a proof of the corruption which has crept over the simplicity of the original idea. The "knickerbockers," the "Norfolk jacket," the silver whistle, in more extreme cases the imitation hunting horn, were all so many signs to the reflective observer that poor human vanity was beginning to lift its head in the breast of the once unaffected and at first even diffident cyclist. The pedestrian soon became conscious, as the practice of velocipede-riding increased, that those who in the early days of the movement were wont to steal past him on their machines with eyes averted and modest deprecatory smile, now bore down upon him with majestic deliberation, looking the whole world in the face, as those who fear not any man. But the cyclists have long passed beyond the limits of a modest confidence. They have, many of them, become a great deal too fond of using their skill for mere purposes of display; and this naturally brings them with too great frequency and, what is worse, in too great numbers into the more crowded haunts of men. They come now like misfortune (which, indeed, under such conditions they represent), no longer as single spies but in battalions; and though in the former order of approach they had long ceased to be a horror to horseflesh or an annoyance to humanity, it is not so with them in their new methods. The sight of a bevy of some dozen uniformed, and too often spindle-shanked, youths careering along a crowded thoroughfare has become undesirably common of late; and it is to be hoped that Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE'S prohibition of these displays in the Parks may put the performers upon seriously reconsidering their ways in other places of public resort. The bicycle was not permitted, in the providential order of human affairs, to be invented for the gratification of man's vanity, but for the conveyance of his body swiftly and without fatigue from place to place; and to the tricyclist, though it might well have been deemed unnecessary to caution the riders of these more prosaic vehicles against proud looks and a high stomach, the same remark applies and must be addressed. The desire of the cyclists to use the remoter Parks for the purpose of transit alone is perfectly reasonable; and the concessions which the FIRST COMMISSIONER of WORKS has made to them are the less open on that account to the possibility of cavil.

TALKING OUT.

THE conduct of the Government in reference to Mr. WOODALL'S Franchise Clause seemed to have reached the climax of eccentricity; but a fresh step was added to the ladder on Wednesday last. Mr. GLADSTONE was in a thoroughly characteristic vein when, commenting on Mr. STEVENSON'S proposal to introduce a new form of Clôture, he divided and subdivided courses of proceeding, made pathetic allusions to the nearly approaching time when all those things would be as one with him, and finally stated that just for the rest of the Session the Government did not mind trying Mr. STEVENSON'S scheme. Two or three other members spoke, and then a subordinate Minister got up and made the astonishing announcement that, though it was quite true that Mr. GLADSTONE had said one Session, he really meant two Sessions. Even the present House of Commons could hardly be expected to endure this kind of treatment; and, despite the very peculiar support received from Ministers, and Mr. GLADSTONE'S kind demonstration of the reasonableness of his plan, Mr. STEVENSON was defeated. That was a good thing in itself; but it was almost a less remarkable thing than the demonstration given of the business-like habits and aptitudes of this God-granted Government.

The defeat of the plan was, however, wholly satisfactory in and by itself. In the first place, nothing could well be more unreasonable than this hard and fast limitation of debate on one particular day, at one particular time, and for one particular class of measures. Again, as was duly pointed out in the debate itself, the conditions of the proposal practically substituted one mode of talking out for another. Wednesday measures rarely or never stand alone, and a determined talker-out has only, under Mr. STEVENSON'S scheme of an enforced division at five on anything that has been reached at two, got to talk vigorously on the first measure of the list, whatever it may be, to make the chance of the others even more hopeless than at present. Yet again, Mr. W. FOWLER remarked, with some naïveté, that "any member who brought in a measure on Wednesday was "next door to an idiot." This is a large generalization; but it may be said, more cautiously, that, though many excellent measures have been brought in on Wednesdays, the greater number are such as, à priori, idiots (supposing there to be any such in the House of Commons) are most likely to bring in and support. The occasional loss of a good Bill is made up to reasonable politicians by the opportunities of defeating many mischievous or futile Bills. The danger of the present day is not under- but over-legislation, and Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL'S appetite for divisions is not shared by politicians who are less occupied in constructing something called Tory democracy out of Tory words and democratic ideas. The main objection to the scheme, however—and it is a more than sufficient one—is the impolicy of restrictions, and especially restrictions of this extremely artificial and petty character, on the freedom of Parliament in the supposed interests of legislation. Mr. GLADSTONE said one sensible thing in his speech, though it was from him a rather unexpected one, and that is that the proceedings of Parliament will never be really improved by coercive measures. They most assuredly will not; and it does not make the application of coercion more desirable that it is applied in a form so insignificant, so fussy, and in all probability so self-destructive, as that which Mr. STEVENSON proposed, which Mr. GLADSTONE argued for, and which he then proposed to try for half-a-dozen Wednesdays, leaving word subsequently that, after all, he meant two Sessions.

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

THE date approximately fixed by the PRIME MINISTER'S "men" for the completion of the passage of the Franchise Bill through the House of Commons has, of course, proved to be inaccurate. That might have been expected from any intelligent consideration of the origin and obvious purpose of the misleading fixture. Events have simply declined to keep an appointment which was made without consulting, and with no intention to consult, their requirements in the way of time. It was a characteristic stroke of Ministerialist tactics to pretend that one most important stage of an important Bill could be completed, and two others easily got through, in addition to it, within the limits of the past week. This coup, we say, was characteristic, for the simple reason that it was insidious in conception, and was intended to produce invidious results. The mind of an inattentive public having been once familiarized with the anticipation that the Franchise Bill would be through the Lower House before the week was out, it must follow, as the night the day, that nothing but the wicked obstruction of Toryism could account for its still delaying its departure to the House of Lords. So industriously, indeed, has the appeal to prejudice been worked, that the late addition of some half-dozen new amendments to the Notice Paper has at once been represented to be part of a deep-laid scheme for retaining the Franchise Bill in the House of Commons until a debate could be taken on Egyptian policy. Imputations such as this last it is, of course, impossible to meet. It would be sufficient in the case of an ordinary accuser to point out to him that the burden of proving that a legitimate exercise of Parliamentary privilege has been prompted by an indirect and unavowed motive rests upon him. But this course is ineffectual with the Radical censor, who cheerfully accepts the duty thus imposed upon him and discharges it much as Lord PETER demonstrated the doctrine of Transubstantiation to JACK and MARTIN. He confines himself to the "one plain argument" that the facts are as he represents them to be; and there is an end of the matter.

It is just possible, however, that some bolder disciples of the Ministerial teachers may obey an ill-regulated impulse to examine the facts for themselves; if so, they may conceivably come to the conclusion that, so far from the close of the Committee on the Franchise Bill having been unduly delayed, it has been, if anything, rather imprudently hastened. It was only yesterday week that Ministers made what they themselves regard as a most important announcement with reference to the date at which the Bill is to come into operation; the result of which was that a new clause which has been on the Paper and engaged attention for weeks disappeared, and another immediately succeeded to its place. The substitution of Mr. FOWLER's for Mr. ALBERT GREY's proposal was rather talked about than debated in the night to which we have referred, and though it came up again for somewhat more regular discussion since then, it would be absurd to contend that it has been over-debated, and even a little hazardous to assume that it has been debated enough. Among the first duties of a vigilant Opposition, in this as in every case of mysterious official compromise, is the ascertainment, if possible, of the reasons which have recommended it to the Ministerial mind. Primâ facie, there is not so much difference between the postponement of the operation of the Franchise Bill for one year and its postponement for two as to make Ministers who have objected so strongly to the one accept the other. Mr. GLADSTONE's pretended discrimination between the merits of the two proposals was as daringly nugatory as many other propositions which he submits to a despised House of Commons. To argue against a two years' postponement of the Bill on the ground that it may involve the holding of a seventh Session of Parliament, inasmuch as it would not bind the Government to do the work of redistribution next year, involves a fallacy so exclusively adapted to the mind of childhood that it surely ought to have deceived no one. The holding of a seventh Session for the purpose in question could only be rendered necessary by the default of the Government themselves; and if the Government intend or expect to make such default, they are not less, they are perhaps more, likely to do so when they have only one Session for the work of redistribution than when they have two. And, again, to argue that because Mr. ALBERT GREY's clause would not any more than Mr. FOWLER's afford Parliament absolute security for the passing of a Redistribution Bill before the next election—to argue from this that the adoption of the latter by the Government in preference to the former is a matter of no importance to the Opposition, is to suggest a confusion between the objective and subjective significance of human actions. A choice between two courses which may be represented as identical in their results may itself be of the highest import as an indication of the mind of the chooser. We may have to take a man's word instead of his bond, but it would be preposterous to argue that, because no form of words could give us valid security, we need not mind whether he does or does not show, as between two formulæ of promise, preference for that which will be the easier to evade.

After all, it comes back to this. If the Government sincerely intend to attempt a fair and reasonable redistribution of seats next Session, why should they object to a two years' postponement of the Bill? They would have the remedy in their own hands; and could ensure that Mr. ALBERT GREY's proposal should not in fact delay the operation of the measure any longer than it will be delayed by Mr. FOWLER's. To suggest, as has been since suggested by them or on their behalf, that one Session may not suffice for the mere deliberative work of redistribution in the House of Commons is to overshoot the mark, as far as it was overshot by the instructor of RASSELAS. Such reasoning would, if it succeeded, convince us that it is impossible to pass a Redistribution Bill at all, just as the Prince of Abyssinia was convinced that "it was "impossible to be a poet." The true motives of the Government, however, are only by courtesy to be ignored. They are really identical with those avowed on their behalf by that kind of provincial Radical who shares with children and another class of persons, with whom we would not be understood to confound him, the honourable distinction of always speaking the truth. Mr. JESSE COLLINGS objects to postponing the operation of the Bill even for one year, because it is conceivable that the Government might fall next Session, and the Conservatives, coming into power, obtain the control of the work of redistribution; and where, asks Mr. COLLINGS, ingenuously, "should we"—that is, the Radicals—"be then?" Where, indeed? Where would the immortal inventor of "Gerrymandering"—not, as is too often thought, an imaginary JEREMIAH MANDERS, but a real GERRY—have been under similar circumstances? Let the echo of the halls of the Four Hundreds answer—Where? Undoubtedly, however, the consideration which makes Mr. GLADSTONE prefer the figure one to the figure two is the same which determines Mr. COLLINGS's preference for zero. It is in order to make more certain of retaining the power to offer the House of Commons precisely such a scheme of redistribution as may suit the interests of the Government, with the alternative to them of either accepting it or submitting to dissolution, with the vast and formless new electorate undistributed. Nor do Mr. GLADSTONE's dark sayings on the subject of the Boundary Commission, which is not to be a Commission, to be appointed in the autumn, tend to remove the uncomfortable suspicion that the Ministerial scheme of redistribution may be a very "ingenious" one indeed.

ATHLETIC SPORTS.

IT may be thought a proof of some poverty, either in the English language itself or in the imagination of sporting men, that no appropriate name has ever been found for the competitions now known as athletic sports. The term is in itself just as applicable to rowing, boxing, football, and the whole list of bodily exercises for which training is required, and might, without doing any violence to it, be extended to cricket, fencing, and tennis, for which less preparation of that kind is needed. It might have been expected, in an age when long names are so much in vogue, that one of them could be devised for distinguishing at least running and jumping contests from others in which bodily prowess is tested. Some few attempts were indeed made to do so. There is still, or was till very lately, a weekly journal which recorded the performances of the running-path and kindred pastimes under the title of "Pentathlum." For some years after the rage for these competitions broke out it was almost as common to hear them called "games" as anything else. That term was of course essentially bad; for one of the peculiarities of the contests to which it was applied is the absence of that esprit de corps in the players and of those rather intricate rules of play which characterize cricket, football, racquets, and the like. Moreover, a "game" is something at which a person must be supposed to "play"; and such an expression would sound rather grotesque if applied to participation in the grim struggle of a mile race. So the world—or rather that little section of the world which includes the English-speaking races, and which alone produces good runners and jumpers—has agreed to accept "athletic sports" as a conventional phrase, with a strictly limited meaning born of the last twenty years. And most people could now give a tolerably accurate list of the exercises included in the definition. Walking and running of all sorts—as long as it is really running, and not a stupid struggle of human vitality against nature—jumping of all sorts, and combinations of the two, form the most legitimate and interesting items in a programme at athletic grounds. Amongst these have crept in some few others which ought perhaps rather to have been deemed gymnastic feats, and excluded. Such are notably the throwing of the hammer and the putting of the weight, over the admission of which into their annual programme the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge had so prolonged a dispute. Pole-jumping seems at first sight to have no more right than vaulting to be included; but it has been allowed at many prize-meetings, probably for this reason—that it must be practised in the open air, and no trial can take place in a gymnasium, as it can in the case of vaulting. Throwing is a fairly legitimate form of athletic sport, and is retained in the programme of most schools, and some colleges and other places. Probably it would be still more generally encouraged were it not that the cricket-ball thrown by the too eager competitor has a way of taking an erratic course, descending amongst lady spectators, who are thinking of other and perhaps more important matters, and so creating a panic where it is least prudent to do so.

Such, then, are the recognized component parts of a programme for any championship meeting in England and the Colonies, and in America, though at local meetings there are divers importations of other things, as of "tossing the caber" in Scotland. In the matter of running, the distances selected have been, naturally enough, such as to correspond with the common metrical standards—the multiples of the yard for short distances, known as "sprint" races, the mile and its multiples for long distances, and then, intermediate between the two, the chief fractions of the mile. Roughly speaking, too, as it will be seen, the round numbers in point of time have corresponded with the round numbers in the matter of distance—a second for every ten yards, a minute for every five hundred yards, ten minutes for every two miles, an hour for every ten miles—these may be taken as tolerably correct average performances for the first flight of running men. In walking the tests are taken at wider intervals—the mile, which may be reckoned at about seven minutes, for short races, and for long races the hour, which may be taken as worth about seven miles. Jumping competitions are simple affairs, offering no such diversity as running or walking. They must all resolve themselves into the plain, bare question which man can jump the furthest or highest, however tedious and troublesome may be the process by which the answer is arrived at. It is in high jumping that the most injustice seems to be suffered by a man of small stature. One can imagine plenty of reasons why a man with short legs might be better fitted to run a mile race than one with long ones; but it does seem rather hard when we see a prize taken by a six-foot man who has jumped an inch less than his own height, in preference to one who, measuring five feet nine, clears an inch more than that. Standing jumps, with or without weights to assist the jumper, are encouraged at some local meetings; but the best clubs do not pay any attention to them, and nobody feels the loss. Races which contain an element of jumping in them are of only two kinds—hurdle-races and steeplechases. The latter have, owing to various causes, and perhaps especially the trouble involved in arranging a good course, gone for the most part out of fashion; while the former, after being run at various distances and over hurdles of various heights arranged at various intervals, have now assumed a single stereotyped form, and are run pretty invariably over ten flights, three feet and a half high, set up at equal distances in a course of 120 yards. Neither the steeplechase nor the hurdle-race has, somehow or other, ever found favour with professionals, and this branch of athletics is accordingly confined to amateurs. So also, by common agreement, hammer-throwing has come to mean the hurling of a 16 lbs. weight at the end of a wooden handle; and weight-putting, the projection in a particular way of a sphere having a like weight, though in many parts of the country different sorts of weights and different rules are in vogue.

Athletic sports are an exceedingly late importation amongst us—later than any other great outdoor competition between man and man, except cycling and lawn-tennis, if we admit these latter to the list of leading sports. Thirty years ago they were practically unknown amongst amateurs, for the rough rustic games given at local fairs were unimportant and silly affairs. Any of our third-rate performers nowadays would have beaten easily most of the best men of that period. Five minutes was then considered excellent time for a mile. Four and a half is not now thought extraordinary. To jump over a five-barred gate—about 4 ft. high, or less—was then something of a performance. There were, indeed, stories of men who could walk under a bar and then jump over it; but few believed in this exploit, and still fewer had seen it done. Ditches and rivers were shown, 18 or 20 ft. wide, over which some local hero was said to have jumped; but such traditions were received with incredulity, and a jump of 22 ft., such as has frequently been done by amateurs of late years, would have been supposed a complete myth. The immense advance that has been made in the last twenty-five years would be astonishing, if we did not know by the analogy of other exercises how great improvement the human body is capable of making when it is trained from early youth to excel in any particular way. About five-and-twenty years ago these sports had just worked their way into favour in the great public schools. It was two or three years later before they were admitted into the colleges in Oxford, and thence into the University itself. Running paths, except for the use of professional "peds," were then unknown; and the first sports held between the Universities, just twenty years ago, were held on the soft grass of a wet cricket-ground. At that time the rage for all trials of physical strength was at its height; and a host of athletic clubs, good, bad, and indifferent, sprang into existence all over the country. The winners of those days won with performances which have since been thrown into the shade; but, when it is considered how great were their disadvantages, racing and jumping being things of no honour and repute when they were in their teens, the wonder is rather that they did as well as they did than that younger men should now have managed to eclipse their performances. It is curious to observe how gradually the old feats have been superseded as new men came forward in different lines and from different parts of the world. Very few "records," as they are called, of best performances now date back further than three or four years. One item there is—the hurdle race, not always quite rightly timed—in which a best time is supposed still to have been made in 1865. There are also records for some other unusual and uninteresting distances dating back nearly, or quite as far; but, as a rule, all the feats that were considered good amongst amateurs have been one after another outdone in the last five years. In the professional world it is otherwise; for there has for a long time past been far less encouragement for them than there was even thirty years ago. Thus the leading time for walking one mile still dates from 1874, when it was done considerably under 6½ min. The best time for two miles running goes back to 1863; and in each of these the professionals are still ahead of the amateurs. The same may be said for the half-mile, which was done quickest in 1871 by an Australian "ped." The best time for the 150 yards goes back to 1851; that for 220 yards to 1845; and for 800 yards the record is said to go back to 1826, though the fact that it was then ran on Epsom Downs suggests the conclusion that it was run downhill under specially favourable circumstances. One notable record remains to be noticed. It is that of the famous "Deerfoot," whose doings are now more commonly credited to him in his real name of L. Bennett. This man in 1863 ran 10 miles in 51 min. and 26 sec., and in one hour ran 11 miles 970 yards—performances which had never been approached until the present year, when they were very nearly equalled by an amateur.

In looking through the records for the past twenty-five years, both for professionals and amateurs, there occur, as may be expected, a few great names, household words in the athletic world like Eclipse and Flying Dutchman in the annals of the Turf. The mile is probably of all distances that which is most admired as a test of combined speed and endurance. And here for sixteen years, from 1865 to 1881, remained the memory of the great dead-heat between Richards and Lang, who did their mile in 4 min. 17½ sec. The feat was beaten in 1881, but by one second only. Amateurs are now close up to them with 4 min. 19¼ sec., done about two years ago. In the "quarter," which also has its admirers, and is deservedly preferred to the "hundred," the amateur Colbeck remained ahead of his class, with 50½ sec., for some thirteen years, until he was completely eclipsed by the great American runner Myers, who got over the distance in the amazing time of 48½ sec., very nearly equalling the best professional time, which dates from 1873. This Myers, with his English rival George, may be said to have revolutionized the history of amateur running. At all distances from 250 to 1,000 yards he stands far ahead of his most formidable competitors in any country. His half-mile is scored at 1 min. 55½ sec., within 2 sec. of the professional already mentioned, and a like time in front of the nearest amateur. At distances over 1,000 yards the Englishman comes to the front. Mr. George, whose name is now prominent in the athletic world, has for some three years past had it all his own way in the mile. He has done that distance under 4 min. 20 sec., and in May this year went far beyond all previous performances at two miles by marking 9 min. 17½ sec. Already in the previous month he had done still better at a longer distance, running the ten miles, under disadvantageous conditions, in 51 min. 26½ sec., within a fraction of a second of the great Deerfoot's time. In walking, the American amateurs have the lead at one and ten miles, and are within a short space of the best professionals. But at seven miles an Englishman is ahead of all amateurs, with about 52½ min., the professional record standing at 51 min. Twenty-one miles have been walked by "peds" more than 10 min. under the three hours, but the best amateur time is a like amount over that.

Records of hurdle-racing and steeplechasing possess no real interest; and the same thing may be said for the hundred yards, which it is virtually impossible to time. But jumping feats are very remarkable, as here the amateurs take for the first time a strong lead over the professional class. Only one of the latter, an American, has ever done over 6 ft.; and the best of them in England has not attained to this. But as long ago as in 1876, at the Oxford and Cambridge sports, Mr. Brooks accomplished the marvellous task of clearing 6 ft. 2½ in., a good five inches more than had ever been done at these contests before. The jump is said to have been since exceeded by a quarter of an inch; but in this sort of contest no fraction of an inch less than a half should fairly count, and the Irishman Davin can hardly claim to be more than equal with Brooks. The same Davin last year cleared 23 ft. 2 in. in width, which is nineteen inches better than the best professional, who is a Canadian, and thirty-three inches better than the best professionals in Great Britain or Ireland. Thus it appears that in this, as in other forms of athleticism, the gentlemen are catching up the players, or at least reducing rapidly the gap there is between them. In jumping, where stature is of advantage and training of little service, they are already well ahead. And in the long-distance races, from two miles to ten miles, they are now on even terms. They are very nearly so in the "quarter" also. Certainly George and Myers are very exceptional specimens of runners. We are not likely soon to see their like again. But now that men of ordinary powers are unlikely ever to beat a record, it has begun to be as probable that a "wonder," such as each of there men is, should spring up in one class of society as another. We have in these remarks taken no notice of distances over ten miles for running or twenty-one miles for walking. This may seem unfair upon the men who expend their energies upon such big feats. But the legitimate range of athletic sports may be, and is by many people, held to be limited at that boundary where the natural forces of an ordinary individual begin to be overtaxed. Oarsmen do not make matches to row from Oxford to London, or for many hours at a stretch; nor would a fifty-mile match between horses be considered much of a horse-race. Sensational feats or trials of mere physical endurance may be applauded by the multitude; but probably the most sensible and satisfactory rule is to draw the limit about where we have drawn it, and about where it is drawn in the programme of the Championship Meeting which is to begin to-day.

THE BRAGIAN BOLDNESS OF MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT.

THE original speaker of the famous words partly quoted above was not, it is believed, really wroth with Mr. Bailey. Mrs. Gamp, we are told by the historian (for reasons which will appear presently, it is necessary to speak by the card in this article), was "not displeased." In this point, if in no other, the greatest of all Sarahs before our own days was not like Mr. Gladstone nor like Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice on Tuesday last. But it is certain that they both in Parliamentary but energetic language "dratted the bragian boldness" of Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett and of Sir Walter Barttelot and of Lord Folkestone. It was Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett who came in for the hardest dratting, and, according to some supporters of the Government, this was very severe indeed. It was indeed so severe that these good-hearted Radicals felt constrained to offer a kind of apology for the provoked statesman who had for the twentieth time or thereabouts annihilated Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, with for the twentieth time or thereabouts the result that Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett is not a penny the worse, and as provokingly reminiscent of what a man said on the 24th of April or any day you like as ever. The story of this little episode in the history of the Egyptian question is pleasant for many reasons; and it seems a pity that it should not be enshrined in something more durable than a daily paper and more readable than Hansard. Let us then sing of the bragian boldness of Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, and of the wrath of Mr. Gladstone, and of the humanity of the Liberal party, and of the piteous plaints of Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice. Let us see what the majority of the present House of Parliament thinks matter for "cheers and laughter," and learn what Radical newspapers understand by severity, and hear what Mr. Gladstone understands by misquotation, and taste any other pretty little tiny kickshaws that William Cook may have to set before us.

It seems to have escaped some commentators that the fun began on Monday, not Tuesday. It began, too, on a very funny subject—the reported massacre at Berber. That event—which has been expected for nearly two months, and probable for a much longer time, and which the Government could with ease have prevented—is, it seems, a good joke, to be met on the Liberal side of the House of Commons with "loud cheers and laughter." That fifteen hundred stupid blackish or brownish soldier fellows, who, if they had had any sense, would have run away months ago, should have their throats cut, is the height of diversion entirely—not, indeed, to Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice, who had not on Monday received permission to know anything about it, but to those behind him. The excellence of the jest appears to have been lost on Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett (who is known to all good Liberals to be a man σφόδρα σμικρὸς τὸν νοῦν, as one Father of the Church amiably remarks of another), and he was tempted to cite a certain declaration of the Prime Minister's to the effect that there was no reason to fear that the garrison of Berber would meet with the fate of the garrison of Sinkat. Of the fact of this declaration there is no doubt; it is within the memory of all who have followed the subject. But there is nothing that Mr. Gladstone dislikes so much as a citation of this kind. Not that he ever has the least difficulty in denying or explaining it away, but apparently because it seems to him a kind of breach of copyright.

> None may quote the text, not even I,
> And none may make a comment but myself, is Mr. Gladstone's version of a couplet in the Idylls of the King. On this particular occasion, however, Mr. Gladstone did not arise in his might and his majesty and his magnificence, and so forth. He only asked for the date of the statement. Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett gave it, the twenty-fourth of April, and then came the "cheers and laughter." You see nothing can possibly be more absurd than to show that a statesman poohpoohed the idea of a massacre at a time when the massacre might have been prevented, and to make this demonstration at the time when the massacre has happened. Probably the Liberals who cheered thought, like the Red Queen (or was it the White?), that Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett ought to have quoted Mr. Gladstone's words two months before, not two months after, they were uttered. As for the Liberals who laughed, that exquisite joke of the throat-cutting (there were townsmen, too, according to one account, but unluckily no women) no doubt got the better of everything else with them, if italics after Mr. Thackeray's favourite way of using them may be permitted.

So the sun went down on Liberal laughter at the Berber massacre, and also (it is sad to have to say it of a man of undoubted piety, but the sequel showed the fact too plainly) on Mr. Gladstone's wrath. On Tuesday Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett was more bragian than ever. He put to Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice a question of such exactness that the Under-Secretary could not possibly evade it, and had to give something which for him may be called an answer. The results of that answer were a display of ingratitude on the part of the House in the way of asking for more which cut Lord Edmond to the heart. He ejaculated, in the bitterness of his soul, "Am I under any circumstances to be expected to know what Hussein Khalifa said on the twenty-third of April?" And it is indeed a most preposterous thing that an Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who is kept for the purpose, should be expected to know anything about foreign affairs. But Lord Edmond was not only sorry; he was shocked. It would be, he thought, "most objectionable" if he, a peaceful pékin, were to "enter into military details." And he would doubtless think it most objectionable, also, if a fellow like a military Under-Secretary, who ought to stick to gaiter-buttons, were to enter into political details. The result of this fine feeling on the part of the different departments was put by Sir Walter Barttelot in a rather unexpectedly epigrammatic fashion. "And so Berber has been allowed to fall." Precisely so. But the incident was by no means closed. Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett was as bragian as ever; and Mr. Gladstone, with his wrath yet working from over-night, was partly obliged and partly eager to come to the rescue. The member for Eye quoted the statement of the Prime Minister (like the former, a statement within the recollection of every one who has attended to the subject) that the fall of Berber would not affect Khartoum. Then the Assyrian came down on him. Mr. Gladstone protested against Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett's practices. He said he never used the words uttered. He added (and this is the tremendous castigation which has made Mr. Gladstone's admirers almost sympathise with Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, because he must be so very much hurt), "unless the hon. gentleman changes his habit, no attention ought to be paid to him." At this the Liberal members who had laughed over the Berber massacre gave "loud cheers." The Speaker tried to interfere, but Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett was too cool and Mr. Gladstone too hot for him, and the result was that Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, as he had done before, quoted the exact words used, and requested to know whether Mr. Gladstone still accused him of misquotation. Thereupon followed these remarkable words:—"Yes, sir, I do both to-day and every day" (some more exact authorities say "to-day and yesterday"), and the Liberal members who had laughed at the massacre of Berber once more gave "loud cheers."

Such is the bragian boldness of Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, and such the severity which almost draws tears of ruth down the iron cheeks of steady Radicals. "Yes, sir, he did do it; he's always doing it," is the agonized cry of the Prime Minister of England, and his friends agree that this is a very severe on Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, very severe indeed. "Unless the hon. gentleman changes his habits, no attention should be paid to him," says Mr. Gladstone, and his friends say that "Ashmead-Bartlett, you know, can hardly get over that, you know." The exquisite fun of the massacre of Berber does not pair off badly with the crushing severity of Mr. Gladstone's rebuke. Here are two statements which, unless the reporters' gallery is in league to traduce Mr. Gladstone, were made. Those statements are quoted. Mr. Gladstone majestically avers that he never said any such thing, and requests the world at large to pay no attention to anybody who says he did. And on Thursday, when his enemy gave him chapter and verse, he explained that the risk of Berber was an "opinion" of his, and not a "categorical statement." Risk, Mr. Gladstone may be reminded, is necessarily a matter of opinion, and when it ceases to be such it ceases to be risk. But nothing can be more conclusive and severe, say the flatterers. Which, if it be so, the urgent necessity for that new English Dictionary (quite different from the one now in publication at the Clarendon Press), which we have more than once demanded, appears more strongly than ever. Or, perhaps, a kind of moral and social recipe-book would be even better than a dictionary. It might be arranged something in this fashion:—

REFUTATION, How to make a.—"Say he dreamt it" (Mr. Jingle), "say he's a Tory and therefore a ——" (Mr. Br-ght), "say nobody ought to attend to him if he does it again" (Mr. Gl-dst-ne).

SEVERE, How to be.—Say "Unless the victim changes his habits nobody ought to attend to him" (Mr. Gl-dst-ne).

AWKWARD SITUATION, How to get out of any.—"Deny everything" (Mr. Gregsbury, Mr. Gl-dst-ne, and others).

MISQUOTATION, To prove a.—"Say he's always doing it" (Mr. Gl-dst-ne).

With a little patience, a notebook, and a dictionary of quotations (or in default of the latter a slight knowledge of English and foreign literature) an invaluable guide to conduct in all relations of life might be arranged, and even the bragian boldness of the Mr. Ashmead-Bartletts of this world would cease to have any terrors. Only you must be sure of your circumstances. A great man at Dover, it has been said, is sometimes one of very ordinary stature at Calais, and vice versâ. So also that which appears to be a crushing refutation to one audience may seem the virtual confession of impotent rage to another. But these differences are inevitable; in the same way some people can for the life of them see no joke in the fact that some thousand throats are reported to have been cut two months after it was suggested that measures should be taken to save them from the knife; while to others it seems the most exquisite jest possible. Moreover, there is another little drawback to the practice of exterminating, as per recipe-book, that the victims have a detestable habit of not being exterminated, quail, crush, conclude, and quell as you may. Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett has been by the solemn deposition of Mr. Gladstone's admirers swept off the face of the habitable earth half a dozen times at least by the tempest of Prime-Ministerial wrath. Yet there he is still, with an accurate and inexhaustible memory, an irrepressible habit of wanting to know, a shocking disregard of Mr. Gladstone's wishes and convenience, and a total insensibility to jokes like the massacre of Berber. Perhaps the member for Eye does not make quite such good use as he might of these good gifts; but his worst enemies must admit his boldness to be "that bragian as Mr. Gladstone can do nothing with him"—a quotation which, observing as before a rigid accuracy, is not, we may state, from the published edition of Martin Chuzzlewit. But we are quite sure that Mr. Gladstone "wouldn't be Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett's father for fifty pounds," which, substituting "father" for "mother," is textual and singularly like in style to the tremendous remark by which, according to Radical testimony, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett was so severely handled.

THE INNS OF COURT AND LEGAL EDUCATION.

THERE is nothing on which it is easier to raise a chorus of grievances in any company of well-to-do Englishmen than the costliness and the delays of law. There is nothing which the very same Englishmen find more tedious, or to which they are less willing to give even a little attention, than considering the causes and the possible remedies of the state of things they are so ready to complain of. Everything that has to do with our legal system falls under the same fate. And the subject of legal education is an absolute blank to most people who are not lawyers, and a good many who are. Experiments and reforms, therefore, are conducted in an absence of interest and intelligent criticism which, if we were not familiar with it, would seem hardly credible in this country. For about ten years considerable experiments in the training of students for the Bar have been in progress, and they have now reached a somewhat critical stage. But, with the exception of the handful of persons officially engaged in the direction of legal studies at the Inns of Court and the Universities, we doubt whether a score could be found, we do not say among lay people, but at the Bar itself, who know or care much about it. Yet the matter is of evident importance to the legal profession, for the constitution and the spirit of the English Bar must at least in part depend on the manner in which admission to it is gained; and, through the legal profession, it is of no less importance to the public who depend on the services of counsel for the conduct of much of their affairs—in the first place for lawsuits, as everybody knows; and moreover, as not everybody knows, for a great many other things which are not the less weighty for not being litigious.

In order to make the present state of things intelligible it is needful to call to mind that which came before it. The Bar of England is not subject to any direct State control. By customary law the power of admitting persons to practise as advocates in the Superior Courts belongs to the Judges. By a custom almost if not quite as ancient, and for all practical purposes not less binding, the powers of admission, discipline, and expulsion are delegated by the Judges to the Inns of Court, subject to an appeal to the Judges, not as public officers, but as a "domestic tribunal," like an appeal from the governing body of a college to the Visitor. No Court or Judge acting in an ordinary judicial capacity has jurisdiction over the acts or regulations of these societies. It is a current form of speech in our legal classics to describe the Inns of Court as a whole as a University devoted to the one Faculty of the Laws of England, in which the several societies of Lincoln's Inn, Gray's Inn, and the two Temples hold the place of colleges. The parallel has been more plausible in one way than it seems now; for there is no lack of mediæval examples, notably in Italy, of regular Universities with only one Faculty, and that the Faculty of Law. Still it is a parallel of the roughest kind, and might easily mislead. The bonds of incorporation, of a common constitution, and of common property are in this case wholly wanting. The Inns of Court are isolated bodies without formal connexion of any kind. Like Oxford or Cambridge colleges, they have their separate buildings, halls, libraries, and offices. Even the peculiar position of the Temple Church may be compared with that of the chapel of Eton, which until lately was a parish church as well as a college chapel, or the chapel of Merton, which is so to this day. But the Inns of Court are not in relation to any more comprehensive body whereof their members are also members. A Fellow of All Souls and a Fellow of Balliol, a scholar of King's and a scholar of Trinity are members of the same University. A student of Lincoln's Inn and a student of the Inner Temple have, properly speaking, no common term. There is no place where they have common and equal rights. Nothing exists in the Inns of Court answering to University statutes, a University library, or a University Senate or Convocation; the newly-formed Bar Association is at present but a rudiment of something which may possibly, we dare not say probably, take the place of this last. There is nothing answering to college statutes or governing bodies either. The legal position of the several Inns is far from being that of colleges; it is more like that of clubs than anything else. Not being incorporated or formally endowed, though in fact disposing of property and revenues of respectable collegiate magnitude, they offer no handle to the Attorney-General or the Charity Commissioners. While the Inns of Court control the formation of the legal profession itself, the Queen's Courts know judicially no more of them than of the Athenæum or the Oxford and Cambridge Club, and have no greater power of intermeddling with their concerns. Again, their governing bodies are self-elected and exclusive, in this respect widely differing from those of both clubs and colleges. No external authority is represented or consulted, nor have the members of the society at large any voice, direct or indirect, in its affairs. Whatever standing regulations exist for their internal government are not statutes, but simple resolutions like those of a club committee; and a barrister who is not a bencher of his Inn has no more access to them than an ordinary member of a club has to the committee's minute-book. Thus the independence and autonomy of a club are combined with more than the authority of a college.

Not that the absolute independence of the Inns of Court has ever led to its extreme possible consequences. Nothing in English institutions ever does. We have likened these honourable societies to clubs. It must be added that, as the general plan, arrangements, and rules of any two clubs in Pall Mall will be found very much alike, so the ways of the several Inns of Court are closely alike; more closely, indeed, than those of different clubs, by reason of a comity engendered by their common objects and associations, and the sense of common interests and virtual, though not formal, responsibility to the nation. The course of preparation for the Bar has, therefore, always been the same in all the Inns. Each Inn might, as far as any positive constitution went, have made its own distinct rules. In fact, the rules have been and are identical, save for minute variations in such matters as the amount and apportionment of fees. Before the Restoration admission to the Bar was procured by a series of exercises analogous to those performed for degrees in the higher Faculties at the Universities, and without doubt modelled upon them. After the Restoration it fared with the exercises at the Inns of Court just as at the Universities. They shrank into unmeaning formalities, and qualification for the Bar came to consist in duly paying the fees, in having dined certain times during a certain number of terms in the hall of the candidate's chosen Inn, and in producing a certificate from a barrister of twelve months' attendance as a pupil in his chambers, which last, for reasons well known and too long to repeat here, might itself mean little more than the payment of a hundred guineas. The reaction that established the present system of examinations at the Universities told also, though more slowly, upon the Inns of Court. After a period in which examination was introduced as an optional road to the Bar, the examination was, about ten years ago, made compulsory. In further imitation of the modern University system, prizes and scholarships of considerable value were offered for competition. Courses of lectures were also established, open to members of all the Inns of Court, and delivered by barristers on whom, for that purpose, the title of Professor was conferred. One may perhaps regret in passing that the name of "Reader," which had been good enough for Bacon and Coke, was not thought worth reviving. For those older worthies every barrister was a "professor" of the Common Law; but modern usage has made us conceive of a Reader as a sort of assistant Professor taken on by the job; though it would be easy to name Readers now holding office at the Universities, and in the Faculty of Law in particular, whose position and authority differ from that of Professors only in name.

The scheme of conjoint lectures and examinations now in force required a more open and formal joint action of the Inns than had been previously known. Every part of this scheme is under the direction of the Council of Legal Education, which is a joint Committee of the Benchers of the four Inns of Court. This arrangement is still purely voluntary, and in form precarious, inasmuch as the Bench of any one Inn might at any moment annul it by secession. But this is not worth further dwelling on. The like may be said of a good many material points in our system of Parliamentary government. It is more important that the experience gained by this time has disclosed various weak points in the plan itself, apart from the permanence or ability of the Council by whom it is administered, and among whom are several of our most eminent living authorities in legal science. There is nothing to show that a worse sort of men become law students, or are called to the Bar, than in the days before examinations; but there is also nothing to show that the average of their personal or professional qualities is sensibly better. The honours and prizes do not seem to be appreciated by the men for whose benefit and encouragement they were intended. As a rule, the best men who come to the Bar from the Universities pay no attention to them, and content themselves with passing the examination as soon as they can, reserving serious and special studies in the law to be pursued in their own fashion afterwards if they be so minded. Meanwhile the studentships are taken by candidates whose industry is no doubt deserving, but whose merit is not altogether of the kind that commands fellowships at Oxford and Cambridge, or calls for such particular encouragement as the Inns of Court hold out in this way.

In short, the visible results are not adequate to the expenditure of money and energy. Without going into the larger question of the constitution of the Inns of Court in general, we think the failure is not very difficult to account for. The existing joint scheme was a compromise between the party of resistance to all change and the party of more ambitious reform then headed by Lord Selborne. It was adopted more under the apprehension of external pressure than by spontaneous action. And it is, in fact, a too faithful imitation of our modern University system, in which the difference of conditions has not been regarded, and the safeguards provided at Oxford and Cambridge have been omitted.

Up to a certain age the line of men's studies can be determined and their interest excited by the offer of substantial rewards for competition. But when they come to preparing themselves for an active profession which is itself a field of the keenest competition, the practical interest before them will in the nature of things outweigh, and that immeasurably, any academic interest which it may be sought to foster by means of prizes. A man who is going to take seriously to the Bar as a livelihood will go in that way which appears to him to lead most directly towards making him a successful barrister, and will not be diverted even by hundred-guinea scholarships into byways of Roman law and so-called Jurisprudence. If, on the other hand, you can prove to him that these are not byways at all, but go to making good lawyers, he will enter on them even without prizes, but very likely will prefer to do so in his own fashion without studying to please examiners. Therefore the prizes must tend to fall to the men who cannot afford to wait, or to those who, for one reason or another, do not really aim at the Bar as a profession in the ordinary sense, but want the standing of a barrister to qualify themselves for public appointments of a semi-legal kind at home or in India or the colonies, or to become teachers of law, perhaps to supply the demand for a particular kind of teaching created by the examination system itself.

Another reason may be assigned, and a more potent one than it seems at first sight, for the fact that the really best men do not appear in the Inns of Court honour lists. A first-class man from Cambridge or Oxford comes to London already satisfied, and more than satisfied, with examinations and the fruits thereof. What does a Fellow of All Souls or Trinity want with more prizes? It is not worth his while to put his neck under the yoke again so soon. He feels that he has earned his liberty. Still less does a certificate of honour concern him. His proved general abilities will stand him in better stead not only with the public but with lawyers. And if he is an Oxford man, his own University offers special honours at least as valuable, and much more agreeable, in the Vinerian Scholarship and the Civil Law degree. This reacts again upon the general value and reputation of the Inns of Court examinations. Prizes which the most capable men do not in fact stop to pick up are not likely to be accepted as evidence of first-rate capacity. We have never heard that clients or solicitors are guided by the Inns of Court studentships in their selection of junior counsel. To the public at large, we believe, the honours conferred by the Inns of Court are wholly unknown. Then something might be said about the arrangement and conduct of the examinations themselves; but this cannot be discussed in detail without risk of overmuch technicality for this place. This much we may remark in general terms; it is by no means self-evident that the same type of examination which is found effectual at the Universities for classics and mathematics is the best means, or a good means at all, of testing real knowledge in such a subject as English law.

For the reasons we have indicated, it seems to us that the multiplication of prizes in the Inns of Court is a mistake, and that no further advance should be made in that direction, but rather a gradual reduction should be aimed at. In particular, the prizes (not inconsiderable ones) given by the several Inns exclusively to their own students ought to be either discontinued or thrown into the common fund. There is no real analogy to college prizes or scholarships here. While the constitution of the Inns of Court retains anything like its present form, there is not and cannot be any real collegiate fellow-feeling among junior members of the same Inn; and a scholarship limited to students of Lincoln's Inn or the Inner Temple has even less to recommend it than an exhibition confined to founders' kin or to natives of a particular county. But it is far more important to get rid of the vicious notion that students will come to be taught only if the lectures are baited with money prizes—a notion which, to our mind, is the root of all the mischief and disappointment. The business of the Inns of Court is to form English lawyers, not to be able to point to so much money given away in prizes. If they could form good lawyers without any prizes at all (and we are far from sure that they could not), it would be all the better. There are plenty of other things for the money to do, such as bringing the libraries up to the level of modern scholarship, and keeping them there. Not one of these libraries is anything like as complete as it ought to be in colonial, American, and Continental jurisprudence, not to mention ordinary books of reference. In fact, there are far more vigorous and successful law schools in the United States than here. Why is this? Not because there are fellowships and scholarships to be got there (we believe that there are not any); but because American lawyers are persuaded that law is worth knowing, not by rule of thumb, but systematically, and that it can be systematically taught with real effect. Accordingly they search the best men they can for teachers, and trust the pupils to come. Professor Dicey spoke much to the purpose concerning this matter in his Oxford inaugural lecture last spring. We understand that the division between Pass and Honours in the Bar Examination is to be done away with: and this will be, so far, a good thing. But we should still more gladly see, if it were possible, a revival of the ancient system of exercises, either instead of examination or in conjunction with it, in a form adapted to modern usage. Finally, the Inns of Court should establish further and better relations with the Law Schools of the Universities than they have yet thought of doing. It would be to the profit of both parties. The proper function of the Universities in the teaching and development of law in this country is itself a topic of no small interest, but deserves and requires separate consideration.

ARCHITECTURE IN 1884.

THE sight of the Architectural Room at the Royal Academy fired us with the ambition of classifying, in imitation of Vitruvius and Rickman, those varieties of building which some enthusiasts tell us is the architecture of the future; while more quietly optimist votaries are content with claiming for it that it is the architecture of the present, and others again of perversely practical genius contend that it must be the architecture of the past, if it derives its name with any just title from Queen Anne. But we soon came to the conviction that the good news that the present one was, as the President proclaimed at the dinner, the last year on which architecture was to be housed at the Royal Academy in a cupboard, rendered this exhibition no fitting occasion for the attempt. We may still at some fitting season analyse those disconnected, if not discordant, phenomena which seem to rest their claim to the distinction of being a definite style on the attenuated continuity of a preference for red brick whenever half timber does not intrude with superior attractions; while at one end its professors touch the real, though late, Gothic of the contests of York and Lancaster, and with the other the equally real, but wholly modern, principles in fashion when the claimants for the Crown were named George and James.

Something may come of all this hurly-burly at some time or other; but at present the results are simply negative. In all the strife of tongues the one style which has not succeeded in keeping or winning back a lost supremacy is that of the most genuine classical school which looked to Greece for models, and which seemed to be unquestionably master of the situation sixty years ago.

Italian, which is in its origin Grecian, filtered first through imperial Rome and then through the Middle Ages, is making a better fight, but it can never keep quite clear of the inconsistencies which are inseparable from an imperfectly assured position. On the other hand, if he takes stock of all the mixed elements—Perpendicular, Tudor, Elizabethan, Renaissance, Jacobean, Dutch, Caroline, Queen Anne, and so forth—the candid critic will be driven to confess that, however inconsistently or capriciously exhibited, the modes of composition in connexion with, and modified by, construction which are now in vogue will have far more often to travel for their precedents to mediæval than to classical authorities.

If there is any sceptic who is hardy enough to doubt our anticipations, and deny that the after-Gothic may be capriciously conservative of the Gothic tradition, we have to send him for our vindication no further off than to the Health Exhibition. There he will find that clever show, the street of Old London; and, if he is a man accustomed to see with other people's eyes, he will go home believing that he has enjoyed the lifelike presentment of a bit of mediæval London. But the small residue who know enough and pry enough to reach personal intelligence will apprehend that what is presented to them, after abstraction has been made of a few specialties—such as the gate, the church, the balcony, and the house with the tourelle—is a collection of houses of the ripe sixteenth and the seventeenth centuries, inheriting, indeed, the gables of the middle ages, but made up of details which mainly represent the Italian Renaissance in various degrees of corruption, and yet remain absolutely un-Italian in the general effect. It is, in fact, not the London which welcomed Edward IV., but that which was burnt in 1666. Our critic will equally have to confess that, in the very improbable event of Italian—such as Sir Charles Barry, for instance, bequeathed it, or as it is now manipulated by the manufacturers of hotels—remaining master of the situation, it would be an Italian which carried in itself the seeds of its own dissolution, inasmuch as its energizing elements would be those of which Gothic is the more perfect representation, and its dead weight the beautiful but sterile anachronisms which it has inherited from the architecture of Greece.

Mr. Edis submits a large block of houses which are to fill the gap which has been made at the corner of Brook Street and Davis Street, designed in a smooth version of Elizabethan; while Mr. Ernest George, in the imposing pile which he places in Collingham Gardens, marries a conception in which Flamboyant is predominant to some Jacobean details; and Mr. Aitchison imports Italian feeling into the Dutch outline of a house in St. James's Square.

Mr. Blomfield's Gallery at Denton is a careful reproduction of Elizabethan originals; and Mr. Norman Shaw's Dawpool, Cheshire, treats in a quiet, broad, and therefore agreeable manner, and on a large scale, the theme of a Jacobean country house, with an outline recalling earlier Tudor. In his proposed façade and additions to Easton Lodge Mr. Young, as far as we can judge by the perspective, seems just to miss making a successful work. Messrs. Pugin's additions to the old Palace at Mayfield alarm us. Mr. Rowland Anderson's Central Station Hotel at Glasgow has only the vulgar attribute of size. Mr. Maurice Adams's country house, near Sydney, lends itself to the climate without forgetting its English character. Mr. Waterhouse's Gothic staircase at Owens College, Manchester, is graceful, but the slender round pillars supporting the groining breathe a modern spirit. Mr. Waterhouse also shows the new wing which he is adding to his Cambridge Union, in continuation of his original design. Mr. Oldham's design for the Nottingham Municipal Buildings is oppressively huge; and Mr. Aston Webb spoils his Bedford County Club by a very modern balcony. Messrs. Romaine, Walker, and Tanner's residential flats at Albert Gate are big, but capricious and unimpressive, with strange details. Mr. Edward J. Prior's Manor Lodge, Harrow, is a huge broad-gabled fusion of Jacobean and Dutch; while Messrs. Hunt, Steward, and Y. F. Knight's Stuart House, in Cadogan Square, is an eclectic combination of Dutch, a little Jacobean, and a great deal of Queen Anne. Mr. Ernest Newton's Fremington House, North Devon, with its loaded pilasters and balustrades, breathes the spirit of George II. We should imagine that the court which Mr. Watson adds to Somerhill, Kent, will not spoil the older portion.

It is impossible to form an adequate opinion of Mr. George Gilbert Scott's new Roman Catholic Church at Norwich from a picturesque perspective of the interior of the nave; but it seems a large and stately structure in Early Pointed with the minster-like features of arcade, triforium, and clerestory, only the big round pillars recall those which so often appear in the Late Flamboyant of the Low Countries. Messrs. Hanson's minster at St. Mary Church is too indistinctly drawn and badly hung to admit of criticism. Mr. Ernest Lee's new church at Collier Row shows early feeling of composition joined to Perpendicular details. The tracery, approximating to double trannoms, is more quaint than satisfactory. We approve the east end of Mr. Lee's church at Brentwood. We trust that Mr. Sedding justifies the flying buttresses of his church at Sunbury by internal groining. Mr. Blomfeld in his new church at Portsea has recourse to regulation Perpendicular in a design which is dignified but cold, while Mr. Brooks's minster-like church at Coppehhallp resents, as is usual with him, early features. Mr. Hugh R. Gough's Church of St. Cuthbert, in South Kensington, shows study. Mr. Herbert Booth's dandified view of a proposed moorside church, and Mr. Carröe's savage octagonal church for Swedish worship at Liverpool, stand at opposite poles, and neither of them is to be commended. The reredos and altar in the Bishop of Durham's chapel at Auckland Castle, by Mr. Dodgson Fowler, are rich and appropriate to their situation. Mr. J. Gregory Crace has the courage to offer a suggestion for the coloured decoration of St. Paul's Cathedral—one more. A few designs for internal decoration and for painted glass are exhibited, but no one of them calls for particular observation.

CHRISTIANITY WITHOUT CREEDS.

THE remarkable address delivered by Lord Salisbury on Tuesday last at the annual meeting of the National Society has an interest beyond the special occasion and immediate purpose which evoked it. As regards Lord Salisbury himself we may just observe in passing that it serves, whether by accident or design, to correct the interpretation put the other day by the Guardian on what it called "the perhaps purposely vague and somewhat confused language" of his recent "electioneering speech" at Plymouth. Whatever may have been the precise purport of what he then said, it is hardly conceivable that he can have meant to assert, or imply, as his critic imagined, that there is no essential difference in religious belief between the Church of England and the Dissenting bodies. For it would be difficult to emphasize more forcibly the vital importance of dogmatic, or, as it is called in modern phrase, denominational, teaching than he did in his speech last Tuesday in vindication of the claims of the great Society founded "for promoting the education of the poor in the principles of the Established Church." There was indeed much in his speech to recall that made on a somewhat analogous occasion the week before by Cardinal Manning. We are not however concerned here so much with the speaker as with the speech, or rather the subject of it, the practical importance of which at the present day it would not be easy to exaggerate. The great contest over the body, not of the dead Patroclus but of the rising generation of Christian youth, is a phenomenon, as Lord Salisbury began by pointing out, not of English but European significance. "We are," he said—the italics are our own—"maintaining that it is an essential part of education that religion in its entirety—as a matter of dogma as well as a matter of morality—should be taught to the young; but that is a doctrine against which many enemies are now raised"; and hence the National Society "is the bearer of a flag," and "has cast upon it, by the character of the time we are passing through, a special duty." And that speciality of the age is exemplified in other countries, notably in France and Belgium, as well as in England; but with a certain difference. Lord Salisbury considered—and we fear rightly—that the antagonism to religious education in foreign countries is mainly prompted by a direct hostility to revelation, and a fanatical desire "to drive revealed religion out of the field altogether." There can be no mistake indeed about the feeling of a man like M. Paul Bert on the subject. In England, as he added, there is also such a party, but it is happily as yet in a small minority. The particular form of opposition which threatens us here is not perhaps less serious, but it is of a somewhat different kind. Our education is not, we are assured, to be made irreligious—far from it—but it is to be "mixed"; and all experience conspires to confirm the justice of a criticism passed long ago on that view of the matter, that those are usually most zealous in advocating mixed education—in a religious sense—who have least of their own to mix. Lord Salisbury summed up the case of that class of educational theorists with admirable point and conciseness.

We quite agree with him in thinking that the immediate danger to the cause of all religious education which deserves the name lies rather in the ingenious subterfuges and subtle machinations of that school of "sublimated" doctrinaires—who either do not care to ascertain the inevitable tendencies of the system they recommend, or do not choose to show all their hand—than in the open and avowed hostility of the "larger school, who are enthusiasts for secular education," pure and simple. And the point is one which will bear dwelling upon. It comes of course most prominently to the surface in connexion with Board schools, and while Lord Salisbury wisely disclaimed any wish "to set up the National Society as an enemy to School Boards in all conditions and all places"—because there are considerable districts where no education of any kind can be provided without them—he had a good deal to say on the unequal and arbitrary working of the Education Act in the conflict which often arises between the two systems. And he insisted with perfect truth that the strong sense of injustice provoked by their unequal working, on grounds both fiscal and moral, is by no means confined to the Church of England, but is shared by other religious bodies in the country, especially the Wesleyans and Roman Catholics. Into the details of this part of the question however we do not propose to follow him here. But there are in the present day so many men of some influence—including even a small but active clique of very "Broad Church" clergymen—who throw their whole weight into the scale of the "refined and sublimated essence" theory of religious training, that it becomes worth while to inquire what is likely to be the practical upshot of that ingenious process of reiterated "filtration" in which Lord Salisbury discerns—and we cannot doubt rightly discerns—the complete "frustration of the ends of religious teaching altogether." And first a word may be said of the actual method, as set forth in a return just issued by order of the House of Lords, of administering this "sublimated" or "filtrated" decoction of "all things which a Christian ought to know and believe to his soul's health" in Board schools. There is of course a wide diversity of practice in matters left open by the law. Thus in some Board schools the Bible is not read at all, but in most it is, sometimes with, sometimes without comment—on which the natural observation to make is, that one hardly knows how to decide which plan is the most objectionable. The Bible read without comment is too apt to be degraded into a mere lesson-book, if not a spelling-book. The Bible read with the random and irresponsible explanations of a body of men—not inaptly described by Lord Beaconsfield, when the School Board scheme was started, as "a new sacerdotal class," with none of the restrictions, training, and guarantees of the old one—who may range from the extremest type of Ultramontanism to the extremest type of Agnosticism, is sure to give a very uncertain, if not wholly unintelligible, sound, and the best that can be hoped of such teaching is that it may be too nebulous and colourless to leave any permanent impression on the mind of the taught. In about two-thirds of the schools some kind of prayers are used, and in many hymns are also sung, which last appear often to take the rather irrelevant form of "Grace before" and "Grace after meat." In some the Ten Commandments are taught—which is legitimate, as they occur in the Bible—and in about fifty the Apostles' Creed is taught also, which is distinctly against the letter of the Act prohibiting all formularies of particular denominations, for the "formulary" in question happens to appertain to two pretty considerable "denominations" in the country—namely, the Church of England and the Church of Rome. In one school the Church Catechism is used, also in defiance of the law. One Board expressly forbids the master to make any allusion to the Sacraments, while another forbids his giving any explanation of the sixth chapter of St. John, which is usually held to contain an inconvenient reference to the Eucharist. One Board requires the children to be taught "at least" the Creed, Lord's Prayer, and Decalogue, while another devolves the daily religious instruction on "the minister and Churchwardens." But this coquetting with the forbidden thing in the shape of dogma is of course very exceptional. The general rule is Bible reading only, with or without comment. By some Boards no provision is made for any religious instruction or worship, and by several—in Wales especially—it is directly prohibited; but we have the consoling assurance that in some at least of these "morals, based on our common Christianity"—which must be very "common" indeed, where the Bible is tabooed as too "sectarian"—"are occasionally inculcated." It would be really interesting to hear something of the method and results of this "occasional" inculcation of unsectarian Christian ethics. Is any portion of the Sermon on the Mount for instance sufficiently "common" to be included in the course, or is the young idea nurtured on a scientific appreciation of "altruism"? On the whole the system might fitly be labelled with the motto M. Renan has chosen for his forthcoming collection of Lectures Pieuses, a series of elegant extracts from his more devotional writings adapted to the fifty-two Sundays of the Church Calendar. It might perhaps indeed be found convenient to introduce an English version of this new Christian Year, as a religious text-book, into Board Schools which reject the Bible as too sectarian a work for the purpose.

And now as to the effects of this filtrated quintessence of Christianity on "both the child and the teacher," as Lord Salisbury puts it. One cannot help seeing at once that the teacher or priest of the new religion has a very anomalous office thrust upon him. If indeed he has no belief of his own, the case is simplified, as far as he is concerned. But whether he has or not, he will do wisely to confine himself, if he wishes to avoid breaking the law or treading on somebody's corns at every turn, to a little picturesque delineation of the history and geography of Palestine. And no doubt that is just about what the filtrated or sublimated essence usually comes to. But let us suppose that the teacher has some definite belief of his own, whether orthodox or the reverse, and we will instance a few leading doctrines of large Christian "denominations," of which some may be true, but some must certainly be false, as they contradict each other. Suppose then our master to be an honest Anglican, who believes inter alia the doctrines of the Trinity and the Incarnation, as fundamental verities of the Gospel. There are many passages in the New Testament which must necessarily appear to him to inculcate or imply those fundamental verities so plainly that he who runs may read; and it is hard to see how as an upright and conscientious man he can refrain from expounding them in that sense, when they are read. But they are clearly no part of the sublimated essence—on the contrary, they are terribly "sectarian," and he is bound to hold his tongue about them. Or take, on the other hand, the case of a conscientious Socinian. He is of course well aware how these same passages are understood by the great majority of religionists, and he holds their interpretation to be a fundamental perversion of the true sense of revelation. Surely, when they are read in school, he ought to utter a word in season to guard the minds of his youthful hearers against so prevalent and dangerous an error. But that too would be only another form of sectarian teaching, and he must confine himself to the "inoffensive residuum." Or let him be a Baptist, who holds the immersion of adults necessary to salvation. There are passages in the New Testament open to such an interpretation, though by the immense majority of Christians they are not so interpreted. Is it not his solemn duty to impress on his class the real bearing of Scripture on a matter of such vast moment? But he would soon find his place in a Board School know him no more if he discharged it. It is not perhaps very likely that any Roman Catholic would undertake such an office, but it is quite conceivable in the abstract. He firmly believes of course inter alia the doctrine of Transubstantiation, which holds a prominent place in the faith and worship of his Church. Here again there are passages of Scripture which are generally allowed to give at least some prima facie countenance to the doctrine, as e.g. in that sixth chapter of St. John, which some School Boards consider such a very ticklish affair that they will not permit a single word to be said about it. For our Roman Catholic schoolmaster these passages have and can have one meaning, and one only, and that a very important one; but he must pass them over in dead silence, if he wishes to retain his post for another week. In all such cases—and the examples might be multiplied indefinitely, but these will suffice for our purpose—it is surely too evident to need or admit of discussion that, as Lord Salisbury phrased it, the attempt to escape from controverted questions by reticence must destroy the enthusiasm of the teacher as well as dissipate the faith of the child. And meanwhile, if there be any force in the old saying Scriptura est sensus Scripturæ, it is plain that this residual or filtrated essence of Scripture is in the eyes of those who hold any real beliefs at all—whether Catholic, Wesleyan, Baptist, or what you will—not Scriptural teaching, but a mere travesty of it. At the best, and if it contains nothing positively erroneous in their view—which is not very probable—it is Hamlet with the Prince of Denmark left out. There are those no doubt to whom the "sweet reasonableness" of such a creedless—we were going to say faith, but that term is obviously incongruous—such a creedless cult presents peculiar charms, but they are mostly persons who prefer reason alone to any form of faith. To believers, who take any pains to analyse the nature of their belief, it will appear that a Christianity filtrated of all its dogmas is a Christianity so enlightened as to be able to dispense with Christ. How far the occasional or even habitual inculcation of "morals based upon our common Christianity" would avail to fill the void is too wide a question to enter upon in detail here; but most Christians have no confidence in the sublimated ingenuities of "the moral teaching of the Gospel" divorced from its dogmas, and can anticipate nothing but disastrous failure from the inculcation, whether in pulpit or schoolroom, of Christianity without the creeds.

THE THRESHOLD OF THE UNKNOWN REGION.

MR. CLEMENTS MARKHAM must forgive us for borrowing his admirable title, but no other words can so fitly describe that part of the earth which was reached last year by Mr. W. W. Graham, the Himalayan traveller, who described his remarkable journey in a paper read before the Geographical Society last week. Strange to say, it has received but little notice. The Pall Mall Gazette gave an excellent précis of it; but otherwise it has not been much spoken of, which is singular, as it was a striking narrative of adventure and exploration. Mr. Graham made several extraordinary ascents, and in the greatest of these reached a point higher by 1,700 feet than had ever before been attained on the earth's surface. He showed that men, or at all events some men, can breathe and climb with perfect ease at a height at which it has been generally thought that respiration must be impeded and much oppression felt; and, standing near the threshold of that unexplored and previously unapproached region which is certainly the mightiest mountain district in our globe, he descried two summits higher than that which has hitherto been supposed to be the highest peak in the world, but must now, to use the graceful American expression which he has aptly quoted, take a back seat.

To explain the significance of what he did it is necessary to state some facts well established, but not popularly known, respecting Himalayan geography. The great range running roughly N.W. and S.E. in which rise Mount Everest, Kangchinjanga, and Dhaolagiri, is not, as might naturally be supposed, the true divide of that part of the continent. In places rivers cut completely through it, flowing from some range behind which must constitute the true watershed. Now it is scarcely possible to doubt that this inner range is in the main higher than what we know as the Himalayas; and, although it may not be absolutely certain, it is to say the least extremely probable, that some of its peaks are higher than the loftiest of the outer chain. That higher peaks than any yet measured might be found north of Mount Everest occurred some time ago to General Thuillier, and there have been other surmises as to their existence, and even vague statements of wonderful summits having been seen; but until Mr. Graham's expedition nothing was known respecting these supreme mountains that could, in the widest sense of the word, be called definite. That traveller, as need hardly be said, made no attempt to reach the unknown range; and, indeed, to do so with Nepal and Thibet closed, as they are now, would be almost impossible. His object was to explore and ascend some of the higher Himalayas, and it was in the course of his exploration that he drew near to the threshold of the unknown region, and at a great height saw a second and higher range and two summits, to all seeming loftier than Mount Everest. How long it may be before any traveller reaches even the foot of one of them it is impossible to say; but in getting well within sight of them Mr. Graham has done more than any one has ever done before, and it would be difficult to find in modern travel an incident more striking than this first glimpse of the heart of the mighty and mysterious range.

The ascent of Kabru, from which he saw these summits, was the last which he made in the Himalayas, and was indeed the culminating feat of his expedition. The previous part of it, however, had been full of interest, and the traveller certainly showed great enterprise and courage, and very remarkable powers of endurance. His first ascent was made in Sikkim, where, starting from the summit of the Kangla Pass, leading into Nepal, he made his first attack on the Himalayas, ascending a peak which he estimated as being over 20,000 feet high. After this he reached the great glacier which flows east from Kangchinjanga, and then he returned to lower ground. His next exploit was in Kumaon, whither he went with the famous Grindelwald mountaineer Herr Emil Boss and the excellent guide Ulrich Kauffmann to aid him. In his first attempt in this district he failed, but failed magnificently, as on Dunagiri, 23,186 feet high, he reached an elevation of quite 22,700 feet before a pitiless storm made further progress impossible. Such a height had never been attained on the earth's surface before, and, according to commonly accepted beliefs, the climbers should have suffered greatly from the rarity of the air. It appears, however, that they did not suffer at all. Mr. Graham says that headaches, nausea, bleeding at the nose, and temporary loss of sight and hearing were conspicuous only by their absence, and that the only organ perceptibly affected was the heart, of which the beating became quite audible. This statement, to which we have before drawn attention, excited considerable surprise at the Royal Geographical Society, when he read his paper there; but there can be no doubt as to its accuracy, and possibly there is one fact hitherto unnoticed which may serve partly to explain it. It may be remembered that Mr. Whymper, when first on Chimborazo, suffered greatly from the rarefied air; but that in a short time he grew quite accustomed to it and felt no more trouble. Mr. Graham and his companions had to cross extremely arduous passes, with cols as high as 18,000 feet, to get to their mountains. They were, therefore, thoroughly trained, and, to a certain extent, inured to the effect of thin air. At the same time it is now obvious that the universal effect of thin air on the human frame has been much exaggerated; that, at altitudes where it has been hitherto thought that any one must feel most faint and weak, young and really strong men can do hard work; and that indisputable fact has very roughly shaken hypothesis—we had almost said theory—on this subject.

After this attempt on Dunagiri, Mr. Graham ascended a peak 22,516 feet high, and got to the foot of Nanda Devi, but was prevented from trying it by the misconduct of his coolies, who deserted him, and by the hideous difficulty of the gorge at its base. He left Kumaon, and later on, in the autumn of the year, revisited Sikkim, where, after ascending Cubonu, 21,300 feet high, he and his companions accomplished what is, by a considerable degree, the most remarkable mountain feat on record, as they reached the summit of Kabru, which, according to the Trigonometrical Survey of India, is 24,015 feet above the level of the sea. Marvellous, however, as their achievement was, the ascent of the mountain is not, to our mind, so remarkable as the view which it gave them of the unknown region. On the lower summit, 23,700 feet high, and only 5,300 feet, therefore, below Mount Everest, they were able to see over its northern shoulder mountain-tops which its huge spurs had previously hidden from all others. At this point Mr. Graham pointed out Everest to Emil Boss as the highest mountain in the world. "That cannot be," said Boss, "those are higher"—pointing to two peaks which towered far above the second and more distant range, and showed over the northern slope of Everest." Looking carefully, the other two agreed. Of course all three may have been wrong; but it is extremely improbable that such practised observers were wrong; and, moreover, as the peaks were further off than Mount Everest, if they seemed higher than that mountain, they must in reality be considerably higher. Emil Boss has assured the present writer that he has no doubt whatever on the subject, and that he should be glad to conduct an Indian surveyor to the point from which he could observe the range, feeling certain as to the result of observation. There can then be no real ground for hesitation in accepting Mr. Graham's statement, and very striking are the results of his expedition in the Himalayas. He and his companions got into the very heart of the chain, and made, under circumstances of considerable difficulty, some daring and most remarkable expeditions; and, having approached the threshold of the unknown region, they saw the great peaks of the highest range on the surface of the earth, concerning which we know at present considerably less than we do of the mountains in the moon.

THE MEISSONIER EXHIBITION.

IT is not long since that a Correspondent of the Times, writing upon art matters from Paris, announced that he had discovered what he called a "paradox." It was this—that the French are a people who live in very small rooms, but admire very big pictures. Much pondering this oracle in our hearts, and wondering what it might exactly mean, we found ourselves unconsciously comparing it to the delightful paradox with which a wit once puzzled half the world. "Sydney Smith said to Horace Walpole: 'How is it that you are so fond of green vegetables, although you live at Twickenham?' Horace laughed at the jest, but never forgave the sarcasm." Better still, in its perpetual suggestion of some meaning in nonsense which as perpetually escapes one, is the true story of Sydney Smith, whose patience was once fairly exhausted at table by a succession of vapid questions which a lady who was his neighbour persisted in asking him. "Oh, Mr. Smith," she said at last, "can you tell me why they have made the spaces between the park railings so much narrower?" He looked at her steadily, and he spoke deliberately. "Because, madam, such very fat people used to get through." She reflected on the answer for the rest of the evening, and durst ask him no more questions. The author of the Times' paradox must, we feel sure, belong to some such school of waggery as this. How it is that people living in small rooms can admire big pictures, is a reflection which, once forced upon the philosophic mind, will cause it ceaseless inward exercise. Perhaps they ought logically to have no space to hang them in. Still more searching will the reflection become, should the two pillars of the paradox once seem unsound. What if it should be doubtful if the French, as a rule, either live in smaller rooms or admire bigger pictures than other people?

To judge from the exhibition of the pictures of Meissonier, lately opened in the Rue de Sèze, we should suspect the reverse to be the case. Certainly, to parody Touchstone on the beef and mustard, in this instance the room is big, and the pictures are small. Meissonier's name has been fifty years before the world; and in this collection of his work, made for a public charity, one of his friends has happily said with French point that he and his pencil celebrate their golden wedding. It may not be literally true if, as we believe, his first exhibited work, "Le Petit Messager," was seen in 1836. But it is near enough; and it is possible that the painter, now upwards of seventy, may have produced, earlier than that, work which did not attract attention. However that may be, the qualities which then won admiration for Meissonier were those which have most distinguished him ever since, and won him the especial name which he bears among cotemporary painters. "Like a Meissonier" conveys a meaning to everybody; and refinement and exactness, coupled with a generous glow of colour, are what it differentiates. In every art there is more or less of reproduction; and success, and what is called originality, depend far more on the treatment and the absorption of materials than on the literal novelty of the materials themselves. Meissonier must have sate in thought at the feet of Mieris, and studied in the school of Terburg, to make of himself the incomparable miniaturist which, without much injustice, he has been called. Many think that he has improved on both.

This sameness of subject and method which, unavoidably, and without shadow of blame, as it seems to us, must distinguish the work, and not in painting only, of all artists but the very highest, endowed with the highest gifts of creation—brings, as we think, the artist to an unfair test in the shape of comparison with nobody but himself. We should be slow to recommend to a student of fiction a "course" even of so great a writer as Thackeray; but after he had assimilated Vanity Fair should advise an example of Dickens, sincerely believing that in all arts there is no road to love and knowledge so true as the study of contrast, of cotemporary contrast especially. On the same ground we do not profess any liking for these separate exhibitions of the works of a particular painter which have become so much the fashion of late, and nowhere more than in England. Neither the collection of Constables, nor of Reynoldses, nor of Pooles, nor of Rossettis, has left on many people, great as may have been the different degrees of pleasure to be derived from them, a more marked impression than that of monotony. With so singular a performer as the last-named, it appears to us impossible but that his most thorough-going admirers must for a time have been haunted by occasional nightmares, as of falling in, somewhere in Dantesque or Hugonic regions of middle air. So, too, with Meissonier. Those who appreciate him most—and we believe that we number ourselves among them—must, as we think, have feared, as those who advised the exhibition should have felt, that the very qualities of his work are those which would be likely to suffer most by the policy of isolation. The greatest epicurean can hardly have dined wholly upon claret and olives without regretting it. Even those who love strong fare, and partook of the famous horse-dinner at the Longham Hotel, where everything, the fish included, was of some kind of horse, were reported at the time not to have eaten much horse afterwards. Now the monotony of Meissonier, well as we thought we knew him, struck us more forcibly in the Rue de Sèze than we could have believed possible, and very unfair to the painter such an impression seems to us to be. For why should a man of high qualities be monotonous for using them?—Meissonier any more than Thackeray? Yet there the monotony is. The catalogue contains, for instance, under more or less of aliases, ten pictures called "The Reading Boy." The number of cavaliers hesitating before ladies' rooms, the number of hallebardiers with the same beards and cloaks; the number of people playing chess or trictrac in moods either meditative or quarrelsome; the number of painters being criticized in their studios by the Snarls and Soapers of their times; the number of First Napoleons with the one post-Moscow expression that he seems, in painting and sculpture, always to have worn (did he never change his hat?), passes all cataloguing. Relieved by a few Brions and Dumas, we do not know that we should have felt this at all. As it is, there is but one thing to relieve the sense of monotony—the adroit stage management, if we may use the word, which has contrasted the different colours and subjects by careful arrangement, as far as it can be done. In one instance particularly, where an impressive and desolate snow scene is sharply set against a rich burst of cavalier mantle and colour hung above it, the effect is fine. To ourselves there is nothing which seems so wanting as this sense in the exhibitions of the Royal Academy. We speak with the fear of the Admirationists before our eyes, who at its annual dinners raise us into the seventh heaven. Their speeches, at all events, are quite beautiful, and to good-humoured cynics are apt to recall the strophes and antistrophes of Æschylus, with an unconscious dash of Aristophanes. If only the pictures all matched as well! βρεκεκεκὲξ κοὰξ κοάξ! Before they arrange their wares next year, we wish that the Academicians would call in Mr. Augustus Harris.

We have left ourselves no space to dwell (nor need we) on the individual power and gifts of Meissonier. No man might ever have said of himself so truly, "Mon verre n'est pas grand, mais je bois dans mon verre." He has spoken for himself for years, to us as to others; and the virtues of "La Rixe" or "Le Portrait du Sergent" will not suffer from criticism or time. These two and the "Lecture chez Diderot" are the gems of the collection, for if in portrait-painting the artist's failure is conspicuous, he is wonderful in these pocket-dramas. He is happy in having been born at a date when painting had been freed from the conventional and so-called classic fetters which, with the terrible "Radeau de la Méduse" and the school which it brought into being, Géricault shattered for ever, doing what Hugo and Dumas did for literature. Not often have the Volsces in Corioli been fluttered by such eagles in a dovecote as these. But in conclusion we should like to call attention to one of Meissonier's highest merits—his extraordinary "power of taking pains." We have no space to quote; but Mr. F. G. Stephens's book upon Flemish and French Pictures contains a very interesting account of it. How he secured fidelity for a battle snow piece by modelling his guns and roads and the very lie of the ground, and even devising especial means to reproduce the effect of snow-light in his studio, is a lesson to all men. For if, like most definitions, it is the merest mistake to define genius as a power of taking pains, there is small doubt of the power which painstaking may have in leading genius to lasting fame and success. So it has done with Meissonier.

RECENT RACING.

THE week between Epsom and Ascot races used to be a time of comparative quiet in the racing world, but now one of the most valuable handicaps of the season is run for on the Thursday after the Derby week. The Manchester Cup may indeed be said to put all other handicaps into the shade, for 2,000*l.* are added to a sweepstakes of 25*l.* each. Florence, who had run wretchedly both in the Lincolnshire Handicap and the City and Suburban, won easily by four lengths. Robertson, who had run second for the Manchester November Handicap, was again second, and Corrie Roy was again next to Robertson, but behind him this time, instead of in front of him. Florence belongs to the owner of St. Gatien, and she was ridden by S. Loates, who rode that horse in the Derby. The day following that on which the Manchester Cup was run, she still further proved her power by winning the De Trafford Welter Cup when giving from a stone to 2 st. 5 lbs. to each of her opponents. For the Whitsuntide Plate of 2,000*l.* for two-year-olds, at Manchester, more than 2 to 1 was laid on the Duke of Portland's Rosy Morn, the winner of the Woodcote Stakes at Epsom; but he was easily beaten by Cora, a filly by Uncas, that had won the Sandown Two-Year-Old Stakes. We may add that Cora has been beaten, in her turn, this week, by Present Times, Laverock, and Vacillation, at Windsor, in the Royal Stakes. While writing on the subject of Manchester races, we may observe that, according to the plans for the Ship Canal, the present racecourse is to become the site of the great docks for Manchester.

But it was not only at Manchester that there was good racing during the week between Epsom and Ascot. At Sandown there was a splendid race for the Derby. Superba, who had made a good race with Busybody in the Oaks, receiving a beating by but half a length, was made first favourite, although she was carrying 7 lbs. extra, and odds of 6 to 4 were laid upon her; but Darlington, against whom 20 to 1 would have been laid, if asked for, ran her to a head. Camlet was only a neck behind Darlington, and the Sister to Adelaide colt, now named Gordon, was close up.

The race for the Grand Prix de Paris was less interesting than usual this year. It shared much the same fate as our own Derby, which suffered considerably through the absence of some of the best three-year-olds of the season. Eight horses went to the post, and Little Duck, the favourite, won in a canter by five lengths from The Lambkin. The weather was wretched; the sky was cloudy, the roads in the Bois de Boulogne were a sea of mud, and there were heavy showers. Little Duck is a fine horse by She Saw, out of Little Drum, by Rataplan. Although actually born in France, his birth took place soon after his dam's arrival in that country, and his sire was and still remains in England, so we may fairly claim at least a share in the honours of the Grand Prix this year.

Ascot races are notorious for the defeats of favourites, and the late meeting helped to keep up this evil reputation. As is usual at Ascot, backers "plunged" freely, laying odds in many cases; but on both the Tuesday and the Wednesday the favourite only won once in seven races, and if a backer had put a hundred pounds on the favourite for every race during the meeting, he would have lost between fourteen and fifteen hundred pounds. A similar investment at Ascot last year would have returned a gain of several hundred pounds. For the opening race, 3 to 1 was laid on Thebais, 7 to 2 against Toastmaster, and 20 to 1 against Legacy. Backers could not have blundered more egregiously, if they had tried; for the result was exactly "the other way about," Legacy winning by a couple of lengths, while Toastmaster beat Thebais by a head. Nothing daunted, backers laid odds again for the next race—the Gold Vase—on Corrie Roy. The mare was meeting St. Gatien, one of the heroes of the Derby, on about 10 lbs. better terms than weight for age, and she was receiving a stone and a pound from Tristan. Kinsky was the only other starter. Tristan showed temper at the post, but went away in a fairly good humour when once they started. Archer made strong running on Corrie Roy for about a mile and a half; at the bend both Tristan and St. Gatien went up to her heels, and in coming up the straight Tristan took a slight lead; but at the distance Corrie Roy repassed him. Soon afterwards, Wood made his effort with St. Gatien, who beat the two cracks without difficulty, and won by four lengths.

The Prince of Wales's Stakes is generally one of the most important three-year-old races of the season, and winners of the Two Thousand, the Derby, and the Oaks often run for it. This year it had been expected that Harvester and Busybody would meet in it; but, to the great disappointment of the public, neither of them appeared; and Talisman, who had been sixth for the Derby, represented the best public form of all the starters. Beauchamp was second favourite; Sir Reuben, who had only run once before in public—in the Woodcote Stakes last year, when he was unplaced—was third favourite, and Hermitage, with a few more pounds on his back than any of his opponents, was the least fancied of the party. There were no other starters, and the field was the smallest in the history of the race. Talisman made the running, but at the distance the four horses formed into a line, and for a few strides there was a pretty race. Talisman then gave up trying in a very cowardly fashion, and Sir Reuben won by three lengths. It is said that 5,000*l.* to 1,000*l.* had been taken in one bet about the winner. Sir Reuben, who is by Doncaster—a stallion which the Duke of Westminster purchased for 14,000*l.*, and sold the other day to the Hungarian Government for 5,000*l.*—belongs to Lord Manners, and was ridden by Wood. The Prince of Wales's Stakes has seldom turned out a poorer affair; and, considering its high promises, it has been the most disappointing race of the season. The Biennial for two-year-olds found the backers again laying odds on the wrong horse. Nearly 3 to 1 was laid on Lord Cadogan's filly Lonely; but she ran very badly, and the race was won easily by Lord Allington's colt by Beauclerc out of Stella. The winner had never run in public before, and 8 to 1 was laid against him at the start. He will have plenty of opportunities of distinguishing himself, as he is entered for the Two Thousand, the Derby, and the St. Leger of next year. Only half a dozen horses came out for the Ascot Stakes, and Regain and Keir were made first and second favourites. Regain made the running for more than a mile and a half of the two-mile course, when he appeared distressed by the pace and gave up the lead. Narcissa and Gonfalon then raced away together; but Greenbank, who had found some difficulty in getting an opening, made a rush as they were running in, and catching the leaders in the last hundred yards won by a length. Greenbank belongs to Mr. Jardine, who has now won the Ascot Stakes five years running. At last the backers picked out a winner in a Maiden Plate; but they were wrong again in the Triennial Stakes, for which they selected The Prince. The two-mile course was probably too long for him with 5 lbs. extra on his back, and the race was won by Hamako, the winner of the Free Handicap Sweepstakes of last year.

The greatest certainty of the Wednesday appeared to be the Coronation Stakes, which stood first on the list. Queen Adelaide, who, in the opinion of many people, would have won the Derby if she had not been shut in, was only opposed by Sandiway, a filly that had been about a couple of lengths behind her in the race for the One Thousand Guineas, and Thirlmere and Tombola, who were mere platers. All things considered, the odds of 9 to 4 which were laid on the favourite did not seem excessive. But the hammering on the hard ground at Epsom in the Derby and the Oaks probably had had a more serious effect upon the filly than was supposed, for she was beaten below the distance, and Sandiway won the 2,200*l.* for the Duke of Westminster in a common canter. In the Visitors' Plate another mistake was made, for Disfranchise was chosen as first favourite, and Polemic, to whom he was giving 12 lbs., beat him by a head. The Fern Hill Stakes for two and three-year-olds brought out a small field. The unbeaten Cherry, Bedouin, who won the Earl Spencer's Plate at Northampton, and ran nowhere in the Derby, and Whitelock, who had been third for the One Thousand, a length behind Queen Adelaide and half a length further behind Busybody, represented the three-year-olds; while Grecian Bride, the winner of the Stanley Stakes at Epsom, was the only two-year-old. Cherry was the first favourite, and Archer made the running with her; but about a quarter of a mile from the winning-post Cannon brought Bedouin up, and the two famous jockeys had one of their usual battles. This time Cannon had the best of it, and he won, pretty easily at last, by a neck. Cherry ran gamely; but it is probable that she was not quite herself. Grecian Bride was a length behind her, and was running very well at the finish. The short course suited Bedouin; and, if the distance had been much longer, the result might have been different. The field for the Royal Hunt Cup was the smallest that had ever run for that race since its institution more than forty years ago. Only sixteen horses went to the post, and Duke of Richmond was made the favourite, although he had 8st. to carry—a very heavy weight for a three-year-old, especially for a rather small colt. He ran well; but his weight told very much in the last hundred yards. Acrostic, to whom he was giving a year and 23 lbs., beat him by a length. The Duke of Westminster's Donatello was looked upon as almost a certainty for the Triennial, chiefly on the strength of his form at Chester, where he won a couple of races; but even in Archer's hands he refused to struggle at the finish, and the race was won by The Dauphin, a well-shaped and promising colt by Childeric, against whom 12 to 1 had been laid at the start. At last the backers hit on the right horse in the Ascot Derby; but even then they only just landed their money. It was a beautiful race. Brest—who had been unplaced in the Grand Prix—won by a head; while Cambusmore and Pontiac ran a dead heat for second place. Brest was giving 8 lbs. to each of the dead-heaters. In the last race it was the old story of a hot favourite easily beaten. The first horse in the betting was last in the race, and the first horse in the race had been the last in the betting.

The backers had rather better luck on the Cup day, for they discovered two winners in seven races. They made a blunder in selecting Caltha for the New Biennial, as the race was won by Fritz, who ran well last season with Queen Adelaide, Busybody, and Reprieve, and was a Derby favourite until a severe attack of influenza affected his breathing. On public form he ought to have been first favourite, and the T.Y.C. course was well suited to a horse that made a noise. The learned were wrong again in the next race—the St. James's Palace Stakes—for which they chose Mr. Chaplin's colt by Hermit out of Departure's dam, who it was thought must win a big race because he had been bought in at an enormous price as a yearling. Among his opponents were Cambusmore and Pontiac, the two horses that had run a dead heat for second place in the Ascot Derby on the Wednesday. The distance was better suited to Cambusmore in the St. James's Palace Stakes than in the Ascot Derby, and he won the 1,850*l.* for the Duke of Westminster in a canter by five lengths from Talisman; while Royal Fern, who had shown some of the best three-year-old form in the spring, was a bad third. Odds were laid on Lucerne for the Biennial, but here again a mistake was made, for, after an exceedingly fine finish, Giles, on Corneille, snatched the race by a head from Lucerne, and by more than half a length from Nautilus, the two last-named horses being ridden by the crack jockeys, Cannon and Archer. Then came the great race of the day, the Ascot Cup. The famous three-year-old St. Simon, who was first favourite, was opposed by his public trial horse Tristan, by the noted stayer Faugh-a-ballagh, by Friday, a winner of the Goodwood Cup, and by his owner's second horse Iambic. There was some difficulty in getting Tristan to the post, but once there, he behaved well, and he ran without any attempt at bolting. At the hotel turn Faugh-a-ballagh and Tristan went to the front and made the running. After they had gone about two miles, Faugh-a-ballagh was beaten, and as they rounded the turn into the straight, Wood, on St. Simon, began to hunt down Webb, on Tristan. The two horses were soon side by side, but St. Simon had no difficulty in leaving Tristan, and he won by about twenty lengths, as Webb eased his horse when he found he could not win. There is much force in the argument that St. Simon would have won the Derby because he has done more with Tristan than did St. Gatien; but we must remember that, if Tristan's form this season is to be trusted, not only St. Simon, but St. Gatien, must be considerably better than the three-year-olds of average years, which was far from being the general opinion on the Derby day. For the time being, at any rate, St. Simon is the hero of the British Turf. In the All-Aged Stakes the favourite won again, but only two horses started, Gehcimniss and Despair, and the former had it all her own way, winning by many lengths. Langwell, who cost 1,150 guineas as a yearling, was favourite for the New Stakes for two-year-olds; but, although he is considered by some good judges to be one of the best-looking colts of the year, he was unplaced, the race being won by Lord Hastings's Melton. Backers preferred Chislehurst to Lucerne for the Rous Memorial Stakes, as the last-named horse had disappointed them earlier in the afternoon; but, as if out of sheer spite, he won this time, and easily, by two lengths.

Gehcimniss gained a second victory in the Queen's Stand Plate on the Friday, which she won in a canter after starting first favourite. The Hardwicke Stakes brought out Tristan, who had won that race in the two preceding years; but Harvester was made the favourite, and Waterford, who had been fourth in the Derby, and was now receiving 10 lbs. from Harvester, was second favourite. Condor made the running as far as the entrance to the old course, where Waterford took the lead. When they came into the straight, Quicklime and Tristan were at Waterford's heels; but Archer was already urging the favourite to hasten his speed. At the distance Tristan went up to Waterford, and after hanging a little as if he were half inclined to swerve, he ran on gamely and won by a length. Harvester was a bad third; but it is quite impossible to believe that this can have been his true form. Duke of Richmond was a strong favourite for the Wokingham Stakes; but he was destined to be second twice in the week, for he gave way to Energy at the last moment, and lost the race by a length. Florence, who had won the Cup and the Trafford Welter race at Manchester, confirmed that excellent form by winning the High-Weight Plate in a canter, although giving as much as 23 lbs. to horses of her own age. Such running as this makes her wretched performances in the spring quite inexplicable. For the Alexandra Plate, Faugh-a-ballagh, who won that race last year, was opposed by Corrie Roy and Donald. Corrie Roy had a slight advantage in the weights over Faugh-a-ballagh, which told over the long three-mile course. Both were completely pumped out at the finish, and they fairly "reeled" in, but Corrie Roy had a length the best of it. The Duke of Westminster's Farewell was made favourite for the Windsor Castle Stakes for two-year-olds, but Crosskeys, who had won a race at Newmarket, won easily, and Farewell was absolutely last. In the Triennial Stakes, Talisman at last won a race, but apparently much against his will, for he tried to shirk, and only won by a neck. This was his twelfth attempt.

The weather was fine throughout the week, and the racing was interesting; but to backers the late Ascot meeting must have been anything but satisfactory.

THE LATIN UNION CONVENTION.

THE Swiss Government has in technical phrase "denounced" the Latin Monetary Convention, which was renewed in 1878, and which in consequence of this denunciation will terminate at the end of next year, if not previously renewed. It does not by any means follow, however, that Switzerland means to withdraw from the Union, and it is certain that very strenuous efforts will be made to renew the Convention. The Union was one of those attempts made by the late Emperor Napoleon to bring about a Confederation, or at least a League, of the so-called Latin races, under the leadership of France. Its immediate object was to ensure that the coins of the countries entering into it should be of the same denomination, weight, and purity, and should circulate freely within the dominions of all. The Union consists at present of France, Italy, Switzerland, Belgium, and Greece; but it was the hope of the Emperor Napoleon that Spain, Portugal, Roumania, and the Spanish and Portuguese communities of America would ultimately enter into it. He dreamed also that this monetary union might be made the foundation of a commercial and political union, or at least, as we said, of a League of some kind under the presidency of France. Perhaps if he had possessed the abilities with which he was credited in the early part of his reign, or if he had found such a Minister as Prince Bismarck, some part of the dream might have been realized. But its realization has been rendered impossible by Sedan. Still, the Convention outlived the Empire, and, as stated above, was revised and prolonged six years ago. France is by far the wealthiest of the nations forming the Union, and with her Italy, Switzerland, and Belgium have by far more intimate and important commercial relations than with any other foreign country. It is extremely useful, therefore, for all these countries to have the same monetary system, and all, therefore, have an interest in prolonging the Union. Moreover, all of them have immense masses of silver in circulation. In France, for example, there is a vast silver currency; while the Bank of France alone holds above 40½ millions sterling of the metal. If the Union were to be broken up, and there were to be in consequence a demonetization of silver, the metal would be depreciated so much in value that the loss to the several States would be very serious. The demonetization of silver by Germany caused a depreciation of above 15 per cent. A demonetization by the Latin Union, followed, as it inevitably would be, by a demonetization all over Europe and America, would practically render silver unsaleable. There would be no sufficient demand for it elsewhere, and the price would consequently fall so low that the losses to the several States would be extremely great. It is certain, therefore, that the several Governments have strong motives for renewing the Convention, and they may reckon upon the support of the United States Government. It is not probable that the United States Government will enter the Union; but it will be strongly inclined to agree to any stipulations that will perpetuate the Latin Union. The Chicago Convention has already pledged the Republican party to do what it can to rehabilitate silver, and doubtless the Democratic party, if it were to be successful, would adopt the same policy, for bimetallism is the old policy of the American Government. Besides, the United States, like France, have a considerable silver coinage; while the American people desire strongly to maintain the price of silver—a valuable product of their own country. There will therefore be strenuous efforts made to induce our own Government and that of Germany to adopt such measures as will facilitate the renewal of the Latin Union. And those efforts will be aided by the Indian Government, which is hardly less interested than the Governments of France and the United States in raising the value of silver.

There is little real superiority in one or other of the two precious metals as a standard of value. Gold in the past, it is true, has fluctuated in value less widely than silver; and so far, therefore, it is a better standard. Moreover, for rich countries it is a better standard, since it is a dearer metal; while, on the other hand, silver is more suitable for poor countries. It is contended by the bimetallists that, although silver has in the past fluctuated more violently than gold, yet a bimetallic system is preferable to monometallism, because the combination of the two metals renders the fluctuations less violent, if more frequent. But recent experience disproves the theory. It is further contended that the tendency of all civilized nations at present is to adopt gold and demonetize silver; that the ultimate effect of this must be to render gold extremely scarce, and, therefore, to increase largely its purchasing power—in other words, to lower prices generally and produce all the evils which follow constantly falling prices; that these evils will be aggravated by the struggles of the several countries to procure gold, which will render financial crises more frequent and more serious than they have been in the past; in short, that there is not enough gold for all the countries that want it, and that therefore all countries should agree in maintaining silver as well as gold as legal tender. It may freely be admitted that, if all countries did agree to adopt bimetallism there would be no objection to the system. If there were any central Parliament that could give the legal tender character both to silver and gold, and could ensure that its orders would be obeyed, bimetallism would undoubtedly work. For that matter, paper would then be as good a standard of value as any other; for a universally recognized Parliament could give the legal tender character to any material it pleased. But as matters stand at present, the difficulty is to induce the various countries of the world to adopt bimetallism, and to ensure that, if by any chance they do adopt it, they will maintain it for any length of time. Up to the present Prince Bismarck has shown very little inclination to adopt bimetallism. He deliberately discarded silver as the standard of value in Germany and adopted gold, and up to the present time he has shown not the slightest inclination to depart from his policy. We fail to see any inducement that can be offered him now to help France and the United States out of their difficulties. But supposing that the German and English Governments could be induced to adopt bimetallism, the difficulty would still remain, how the policy could be perpetuated? A Convention of the kind would be concluded only for a certain number of years, just as commercial treaties are; and when those years elapsed, bimetallism might be discarded just as Free-trade has been. It is well, then, that the public should ask what sufficient motive there is for subordinating our municipal law to international engagements, and running the risk of doing so in vain. For it is unquestionable that if only a few countries adopt bimetallism, the cheaper metal will have a tendency to drive out the dearer, and therefore the bimetallic countries will be left with silver alone in circulation, while the monometallic countries will get gold. It may be objected that this has not occurred either in France or in the United States; but it is to be remembered that France has prevented the evil by suspending the coinage of silver altogether, while the United States have avoided it by refusing to the public the right of getting silver coined at will, and limiting the amount to be coined annually even by the Government itself.

So far as this country is concerned, the ill effects of the depreciation of silver make themselves felt chiefly through our connexion with India. The Indian Government has to pay large sums here at home in gold every year; but as the Indian Government collects its taxes in silver, it has to give a larger proportion of these taxes to meet its obligations in England than it did before, because of the depreciation of silver. Again, all English people resident in India who remit money home, either for investment or for the support of their families, have to give a larger portion of their incomes than formerly, because those incomes, being received in silver, exchange for a less amount of gold than they did in times past. Practically, therefore, for all payments of whatever kind to be made in Europe, money in India is less efficient than it was a dozen years ago. In the same way the export trade from this country to the silver-using countries undoubtedly is at a disadvantage. Our manufactures being sold in the silver-using countries for silver, and that silver being less valuable than it used to be, the profit is proportionately less. In the interest of India, therefore, and in the interest of our export trade with the silver-using countries, it seems desirable that the value of silver should be raised if the means of doing so are not otherwise objectionable. But those who urge this argument take too narrow a view of the question. Although it is the interest of India—that is to say, of the Indian Government representing the Indian taxpayers—that the value of silver should be raised, it is to the interest of the Indian exporter—that is to say, of the Indian producer of goods for the European markets—that the value of silver should remain low. Indian merchants who sell Indian produce in England exchange that produce for gold, and as the gold buys a larger amount of silver than it did formerly, practically the Indian merchants receive a higher price for their goods than they did in times past. The depreciation of silver thus acts somewhat in the same way as do the sugar bounties in Continental countries, which we discussed last week, with this difference, however, that the sugar bounties are the result of legislation, and that the depreciation of silver has been brought about chiefly by natural causes. The depreciation of silver, therefore, has contributed quite as powerfully as the opening of the Suez Canal and the extension of railways to enable India to compete with the United States and Russia in the wheat markets of Europe. If silver were suddenly to rise to its old value, the Indian export of wheat would be completely stopped, unless, indeed, the price of wheat were to rise at the same time in our markets and in the same proportion. Altogether, then, it is by no means so clear as at first sight it looks, that the real interest of India is that silver should be rehabilitated. The home charges of India amount to about 16 millions a year, and the loss by exchange, as it is called—the loss, that is, through the depreciation of silver—is about threepence in the rupee of 1s. 10½d., or about 10½ per cent., which would represent an annual loss upon the 16 millions sterling of less than 1¾ millions sterling. But the development of the export trade of India will certainly benefit the taxpayers to a much greater extent than this. In the long run, of course, the development of the export trade will lead to a rise in the value of silver should there not be a general demonetization in Europe; but that rise will be slow, and in the meantime the trade and the wealth of India will have so greatly increased, while its communications will have been so much opened up, that probably it will then be in a position to continue the competition, which is possible now only by the fact of the depreciation. And what is true of India in this respect is true of all the silver-using countries. The depreciation of silver is disadvantageous to those who export from England to those countries, while it is advantageous to those who export from the silver-using countries to England. The disadvantage on one side is thus counterbalanced by an equal advantage on the other; and this being so, there seems no sufficient motive why we should give up a monetary system that is admitted to be excellent in itself, and should at the same time subordinate our municipal law to international agreements, and run the risk of doing all to no great purpose.

THE RICHTER CONCERTS.

THE story of the last three Richter concerts is one of comparative failure. The audiences have been numerous as ever, and the critics, as always, kind; but there has been a certain falling off in the concerts themselves. The novelties produced have been mostly unfortunate: either they were unhappily chosen—as, for instance, Raff's so-called Romeo and Juliet overture and Méhul's prelude to La Chasse du Jeune Henri; or they were badly rendered—as, for instance, the Symphonie Fantastique of Hector Berlioz. On the other hand, the older material, the stock-in-trade of Herr Richter's orchestra, has been not always interesting, as in the case of the excerpt from the Walküre, the "Wotan's Abschied und Feuerzauber," and in that from Tristan und Isolde, the concert-room arrangement of the overture and the "Isolde's Liebestod"; or they had been hurriedly rehearsed, and were imperfectly played, as was the fate of the two Beethoven symphonies, the "Pastoral" and the "Choral." Of course there were exceptions. Thus, the seventh concert was remarkable for a superb performance of the "Leonora" overture (which, as it seems to us, Herr Richter knows better, and plays better, than anything else of Beethoven's we have heard him do), and a brisk and vigorous rendering of Liszt's third Hungarian Rhapsody, a brilliant and dashing piece of claptrap not heard in England before; while the ninth, which included the "Choral" symphony and the Schicksalslied of Brahms, is in some sort memorable for a magnificent production of the Tannhäuser overture. Twice, too, has Mme. Schuch-Proska, a lady with not much voice, but with an admirable method and a fine musical intelligence, been heard to advantage; once in "Glücklein im Thale," the lovely air from Euryanthe, and again in a charming recitative and air from the Marriage of Figaro. On the whole, however, the impression left by the three concerts is one of disappointment. Probably Herr Richter has had too much to do, and has found it impossible to do himself full justice at the opera and in the concert-room both. What is certain is, that he has seemed content to be heard at his best in Wagner alone, and inclined to bestow less pains than is desirable on the work of greater and less fashionable masters. This is not the way in which he won his admirable reputation; nor is this the way to keep that reputation now it is won.

The greatest disappointment of all was the Fantastique of Berlioz. This extraordinary work is a reflection (it was written in 1830) of all the ideals and the aspirations of Romanticism—is the absolute expression in music of the influences by which the Romantic Renaissance was inspired and of the principles by which its leaders were stimulated and controlled. The first part—"Rêveries, Passions"—might have been played as an overture to Antony or Marion Delorme. The second, "Un Bal," is such music as, in its combination of elegance and brutality, of esprit and passion, of gallantry and cynicism and charm, suggests the heroes and heroines—the Maulrigneuses and De Marsays and Rastignacs—of the Comédie Humaine. In the third, the famous "Scène aux Champs," there is, as it were, a mixture of Byron and Delacroix: it is landscape, but landscape informed with a certain individual and peculiar sentiment, made the mirror of a certain egoistic idiosyncrasy, like the Alpine scenery in Manfred, the melancholy sea and lurid sky in the Barque de Don Juan. As for the third and fourth, the "Marche au Supplice" and the "Songe d'une Nuit du Sabbat," they are the purest Eighteen-Thirty in all music. Revolt, love, terror, violence, blasphemy, crime, torture, the devil: here are all the romantic influences, all the romantic moods, all the romantic ideals. And the work is typical of the epoch it reflects in other and more important senses than those of mere matter and tendency. It is rich not only in daring and in strength, but in the great quality of style; its sincerity is amazing; it is a prodigy of technical invention and accomplishment; it abounds in novel views of life and in the most brilliant practical illustrations of new theories of art. Here, for instance, is an unmistakable leit-motif, one of the earliest, and certainly one of the most consistent and suggestive in music. Here are instrumental combinations, achievements in sonority, effects in tone and timbre, which mark the appearance of an orchestral practice not before discovered to the world. Here are passages of narrative and description—logical, continuous, exact—which seem to prove that Wagner is no more original in work like the "Walkurenritt" and the adventure of Siegfried and Brünhilde than in work like the music of Fafnir and the bridal-march in Lohengrin. That the Fantastique is mannered, eccentric, in places even absurd, may be unhesitatingly admitted. But it is certain, all the same, that in some sort it is of special and peculiar excellence, and that it is an anticipation—original in form and unsurpassed in substance—of much that is reverenced as novel and incomparable in latter-day music. At Herr Richter's hands it fared but poorly. The Viennese artist seemed ill at ease, and out of sympathy with his work; he conducted his Berlioz from a score (he usually conducts from memory), and the obvious pains he took resulted in a certain heaviness, a certain insufficiency, a certain lack of life and passion and sincerity. At his best in the "Marche au Supplice" and the "Sabbat," which were clearly and neatly rendered, if with no great spirit or propriety, Herr Richter was rather cold and methodical than anything else in the "Scène aux Champs" and the "Rêveries, Passions" movement; while in the "Scène du Bal," which elsewhere, even with Mr. Ganz, has nearly always to be repeated, he was no more than careful (by the way, he was content with two harps instead of four, which he would hardly have been had the music been signed "Wagner" or "Liszt") and uninspired and tame. It is much to be hoped that, when he next gives us the Fantastique, he will not only have rehearsed it properly with his orchestra, but studied it to greater purpose himself.

The hero of the season has certainly been Richard Wagner. Something of his has been included in every programme, and more than once he has been represented by a plurality of excerpts, a very faggot of selected masterpieces. As a natural consequence, Beethoven has suffered; of him we have had, comparatively speaking, but little, and much of that has been indifferently produced. Of Mozart we have heard but an overture and some songs; of Handel only one poor air; of Berlioz no more than the Symphonie Fantastique; of Gluck, Bach, Spontini, Glinka, Cherubini, Meyerbeer, not a single note. Herr Richter announces three concerts for the autumn. It is to be desired that by the time they come round he will have seen his way to making his programmes a little more catholic and a little less egoistic and exclusive.

FRENCH PLAYS AT THE GAIETY.

IT will puzzle the admirers of Mme. Judic to say whether she is seen to the greatest advantage in Niniche, which she has played in London before, or in the new parts which have been supplied for her by MM. Meilhac and Millaud in Mam'zelle Nitouche and La Cosaque. In all she does Mme. Judic gives intellectual pleasure; for her style appeals emphatically to the imagination. We are not for a moment asserting that the clever plays in which the French actress appears are works of a high class. They are not; but the intellect may occupy itself with small things as well as with great. Mme. Judic speaks or sings a phrase which obviously has significance behind it; the precise nature of that significance the hearer must decide for himself. She shrugs her shoulders, makes a gesture with her hand, gives a quaint glance or an eloquent smile; the observer is left to interpret at his own list. "Il y a un silence éloquent," Rochefoucauld says; and thus Mme. Judic says much. Denise, the heroine of Mam'zelle Nitouche, is a schoolgirl, demure to all outward seeming; in fact, full of sly fun. Célestin, the organist of the convent where Denise is being educated, is, allowing for difference in age and sex, not unlike her in disposition. He is known away from the convent as Floridor, and under this title has written a comic opera. Denise has laid her mischievous hands on the score; has learnt one of the most lively numbers, a duet; and, in the course of a singing lesson which she is receiving from Célestin, lets him know that she has found him out. They sing this duet, and show a tendency to diverge into it when music of a much more sedate character ought to be sung, under the guidance of the organist. All this is, of course, precisely in Mme. Judic's vein; and so is the subsequent act, which takes place behind the scenes of the theatre where "Floridor's" opera is being given. In a fit of pique the leading actress quits the theatre. Denise knows the part, and is naturally persuaded to take it up. A credulous audience is invited to suppose that the untrained girl makes a brilliant success; but in comic opera this is a trifle. As a taste of her quality, before she goes on the stage Denise, or "Mlle. Nitouche," as she calls herself, sings the charming ballad of "Babet and Cadet." This is an eighteenth-century song, the production of Collé, who could write very gracefully when he chose. The song has been well set by M. Hervé, and forms one of the most delightful features of the opera. The third act of Mam'zelle Nitouche is the weakest. What there is of plot in the piece is exhausted, at least there is not enough left to make an act, and so prominence has to be given to incidental characters. One of these, a drunken sergeant of cavalry, played by M. Lassouche, is so wonderfully true that we hardly know whether it is more comic or painful. Another extremely clever study is the Major Château-Gibus of M. Christian. He is a martinet of the severest type, so accustomed to giving the word of command that he conducts his private business, even his love affairs, as if addressing his regiment or presiding at a court-martial. The part is played with remarkable consistency and humour. M. Cooper, as the young lover, is throughout clever and pleasant. It was formerly a foolish fashion with some critics to over-praise all French acting with ludicrous extravagance. Recently there has been, as an equally foolish reaction, a tendency to under-praise, and we have seen adverse comments on the performances of M. Christian and M. Georges in this piece. The latter, as Célestin, is remarkably good, and the former is excellent.

The part of the Princess in La Cosaque is in marked contrast to that of Denise in Mam'zelle Nitouche. Instead of the timid schoolgirl with the livelier side to her character, Mme. Judic is the wayward Princess who fires a revolver instead of ringing a bell, and keeps a lion instead of a lapdog. MM. Meilhac and Millaud are both to be congratulated; the former on finding a partner to replace the sharer of half a hundred successes, M. Halévy, and the latter in being admitted to the partnership. La Cosaque, which was only produced a few months since at the Variétés has the two great requisites of such heroes; it is amusing in itself, and affords the leading actress a capital part, besides good parts for others. In the playbills of the Gaiety all reference to M. Hervé, who composed the music for both these pieces, is omitted. They are called "comedies, with songs"; but the composer of the songs is surely worth mention. To escape from a family council of three generations, who seek to coerce or persuade her into good behaviour, the Princess, "La Cosaque," as she is called, makes her way to Paris under the escort of Jules Primitif, traveller for the firm of Mme. Dupotin et Cie., who has been sent to the Princess's palace in St. Petersburg with samples of lace. The three Princes—Cyrille, grandfather, Grégoire, son, and Fédor, grandson, that is, son of Grégoire—have all tender reminiscences of Paris, and are not sorry for the excuse they find to follow their charming relative. Primitif does not know the companion of his journey, with whom, however, he falls violently in love. She accepts the position of assistant at Mme. Dupotin's, and treats customers with an imperiousness which belongs to the Russian Princess rather than to the saleswoman. Her songs present her with those chances of effect which no actress understands better how to utilize. One of the first introduces inarticulate expressions which would be vulgar from almost any other lips, but have no trace of vulgarity from the lips of Mme. Judic. The description of a saleswoman's duties is also capital, and there is a charm about "Colinette" which makes it no less popular with hearers than the "Babet et Cadet." There are some touches of real sentiment in the love affairs of the Princess and her lover which Mme. Judic shows with rare delicacy. Her "Ne m'aime pas" to Primitif is irresistible. Every playgoer who knows the play and knows the company would be able to cast La Cosaque, for the characters fit those who are called upon to present them with noteworthy neatness. M. Christian is the middle-aged Prince Grégoire, M. Georges the elderly Cyrille, and M. Lassouche Fédor. The last-named is extremely funny throughout. He questions Primitif as to the last popular song at the Café des Ambassadeurs, and his imitation of the facile Parisian's method of giving the quaint refrain is most diverting. In the second act, where he is mistaken by a fascinating customer for Mme. Dupotin for the assistant deputed to measure her for a new dress, the business is unquestionably broad. It is the artist's merit, however, that fun is always uppermost. M. Georges does well the little he has to do. M. Christian has much merit, but does not succeed as he did in Nitouche. His Grégoire lacks humour in spite of the performer's diligence and energy. M. Cooper plays brightly as Primitif—we need not go into the secret of his birth, which is a point of the play—and sings most agreeably without having a note in his voice.

MUSIC IN CHANCERY.

MESSRS. BOOSEY & CO. write to us in reference to the article "Music in Chancery" in last week's Saturday Review. They urge that their claim was not an afterthought, but was shown in evidence to have been made in substance some time ago, and that they endeavoured recently to come to terms with Dr. Stanford on the understanding that the opera should be performed in English first. We willingly give publicity to these statements, and our readers may decide whether and how far they affect the article in question.

REVIEWS.

THE HISTORICAL MONUMENTS OF FRANCE.*

THE attraction of Mr. Hunnewell's book, which is considerable, is almost wholly an attraction of matter; and the fact that it is considerable is a reason for condoning, as far as possible, certain undeniable shortcomings in point of form—not only the strict literary form of style, but general handling and treatment. Severe criticism from the latter point of view Mr. Hunnewell assuredly cannot stand. Although he mentions the fact of legal status which makes the historical monuments of France almost as unique in point of condition as they are in point of number and material interest, Mr. Hunnewell has not, as he might well have done, criticized the zeal (very far from according to knowledge) which has marked the history of their preservation. He is, as far as we have observed, grateful, with a plentiful lack of discrimination, for the reckless restoration which has destroyed in at least as many cases as those in which it has preserved. In beginning his survey of France from the archæological standpoint he has prefixed some rather naïve remarks on French travel, which are more excusable, no doubt, in an inhabitant of the New World than in an inhabitant of the Old. Moreover, any one who chose to pull to pieces the details of his miscellaneous statements, not merely in the preface but throughout the work, would assuredly find plenty to do. He must know, or ought to know, that in saying that "Over the country first were rude and Pagan Gallic tribes" (the italics are ours), he makes a statement almost demonstrably false, and that in attributing without hesitation the dolmens scattered far and wide to these tribes he is stating, without qualification or safeguard, a proposition which, whether probable or improbable, is certainly not proved. When he follows up his aboriginal Pagan Gallic tribes with Romans, Germans, and Normans, and then (adhering, as far as we can see, to chronological order, in intention at least) mentions Arabs and Basques as persons who had "minor influence," he again betrays a singular indifference to the results of historic and ethnological research. A statement on his fourth page about "King René, who introduced so much good wine and minstrelsy to France," throws the instructed reader into singular meditations. There are certain senses in which the statement is no doubt true; but it is calculated to convey the impression that Mr. Hunnewell thinks that good wine needed to be introduced into France in the fifteenth century, and that he takes a very late and not particularly gifted follower of five centuries of troubadours and trouvères as a father of French poetry. Yet, again, when he says that his "splendid Pagan Romans left their impress" on the language that we find to-day, he uses a very odd metaphor. We do not generally say that Paros and Pentelicus left their impress on the monuments of Greek art; and Mr. Hunnewell's phrase, unless it is simply thoughtless, would seem to show a decided absence of comprehension on his part of the fact that the matter, no less than the form of French, is Latin to such an extent that all other ingredients and influences are insignificant in comparison. Finally, Mr. Hunnewell's style is not exactly that of a master in the literary craft. But on these matters we care to dwell no further; and we have dwelt on them so far chiefly because a merely generalising notice is anything but a compliment to the author of a book. In many ways Mr. Hunnewell's book might have been done much better. But, as a survey of France intended for the use of strangers who are anxious to see its treasures of historical art, and as a collection of sketches and descriptions which would otherwise have to be sought in a large number of scattered, and in some cases out-of-the-way, publications, the volume has a very considerable value. That value, if not directly increased for Englishmen, is certainly not lessened by the author's anxious desire to inculcate on his own countrymen the importance of preserving while it is yet time such historical monuments as America possesses. We have suffered too much from late awakening to this necessity ourselves not to sympathize with any effort to take time by the forelock elsewhere.

The plan of Mr. Hunnewell's work is that of an irregular itinerary, beginning at the extreme south-east corner of the country, and working westward and northward. He has added to this sketch nearly seventy pages, filled partly with lists of historical monuments of different classes, and partly with miscellaneous information bearing on them, and he has illustrated the whole with twenty-two large-sized and generally well-executed heliogravures of important scenes or objects. These are avowedly taken from existing works, and do not pretend to any originality. Indeed Mr. Hunnewell, with a proper spirit of scholarship, takes pains to explain that they are merely, as it were, so many illustrative quotations. They include Carnac (from Mr. Miln's well-known book), the Pont du Gard, the Gate of St. Gilles by Arles, Carcassonne in its old state and in its new, the west fronts of Reims Cathedral, of Amiens, and of Chartres, some details of the last-named place, plans of five great Cathedrals, the inevitable house of Jacques Cœur, Coucy according to M. Viollet le Duc, Pierrefonds as it is, Blois before and after restoration, Chambord, Fontainebleau, the ceiling of the Grand Gallery at Versailles, the Morlaix Viaduct (which, though the author pleads its use for comparison, is, we venture to think, out of place, and which, if comparison is necessary, had much better have been replaced by the aqueduct of Roquefavour), some houses at Le Mans, and, to finish, St. Ouen. It will be observed that this list is a little spoiled by the author's inexplicable docility in accepting restorations, and that it might for completely representative purposes have been slightly altered and increased with advantage. But such alterations and additions can always be made by a critic, and there is no need to draw up fancy lists of them. Neither is there any need to attempt to open Mr. Hunnewell's eyes on the point of restoration à la Viollet le Duc. It is good that a man should love ancient monuments well even if he does not love them altogether wisely, and the state of him who rejoices in a spick-and-span Carcassonne or Pierrefonds is better than that state in which the Lord Francises of this world regret that they and their ancestors have not "done for" historical persons or monuments altogether.

The real value of a book like this lies in the chance that readers of it will be tempted to go and see likewise, to explore for themselves on the lines of the exploration which it describes. As it is, it can scarcely be said that France, as a whole, is a well-known country to Englishmen. Very few of her districts rank among regular holiday places, and perhaps to no country have railways done more harm in this particular respect. France is on the way to everywhere, no doubt, but to be on the way to everywhere is nowadays exactly the best possible qualification for being rested in on the way to nowhere. It is the proper thing for every one who journeys beyond Paris to grumble about wagons-lits. No one would have anything to do with wagons-lits whatever, if he gave the Morvan and the Bourbonnais, Burgundy and the Rhone country, Auvergne and the Cevennes, the time and the attention they deserve. It is the very laudable ambition of Railway Companies, whose ambition is not always laudable, to cut down the hours between London and Paris, exactly as it is the ambition of Steamboat Companies to cut down the days between Liverpool and New York. With the latter effort there is no cause to quarrel, for if the ocean is not disappointing, it offers few stopping-places. But when it comes to nine hours instead of ten and eight hours instead of nine, or, for the matter of that, to eighteen instead of nineteen, how shall a man "do" an Amiens or a Château Gaillard on the way? On the other hand, except in the case of professed historical or literary students, France (putting out of the question the Mediterranean corner, which luckily contains many interesting relics, the Pyrenees to a much less extent, and Brittany to an extent, except as far as sedentary economizers and wandering pedestrians are concerned, even less considerable) is very little haunted by the Briton. No country has better guide-books, for those of Joanne can give points in the way of information and variety of contents, especially if illustration and maps be concerned, to almost any other series. Although very much dearer than it used to be, the country is still far cheaper than England or than any show district in Europe; its means of communication, if not extremely rapid or convenient, are universal and not costly. Except in a few very limited districts, there is always something to see, and everywhere there is unsurpassed historical and literary interest. Last of all, if the traveller does not go to France soon, there will be no France to see. What with restored historical monuments and Haussmannized towns, it will probably, after another fifty years of Republic or Empire, be preferable to stay in London. Here we have nearly done destroying our old monuments, and are trying to do what we can in the way of making new ones. In France the process of destruction is at its height. It is, however, very far from accomplished. No one who begins with Mr. Hunnewell's book in an unscientific fashion will have much difficulty in discovering a wider or narrower scene of operations. When he has visited that scene, if not before, he will scarcely rest content with Mr. Hunnewell, and he will probably find out how to add to the interest of his journeys by doing what Mr. Hunnewell has abstained from doing, and exploring not merely the historical but the literary interest, which attaches to most of the places here noticed and to many of those omitted. For our part we should recommend a system of division by provinces or groups of provinces. There is far more idiosyncrasy of character not merely historically, but even actually, in the French province than most Englishmen with departments in their heads nowadays understand.

It is for its possible effect on determining such journeys that Mr. Hunnewell's handsome and well-intentioned book seems chiefly worthy of notice. In some other respects than those mentioned above, the author might have improved it considerably. His descriptions are often much too meagre, and become mere lists, less useful because less distinct and orderly, than the lists proper of his appendix. Thus no good can be done, but some harm, by lumping Autun, Semur, Auxerre, and Sens in half a dozen sentences of nearly twenty lines. Mont St. Michel is, in proportion to its singularity and interest, even more cavalierly treated. We do not find the quaint town of Concarneau noticed at all, and neither the index nor, as far as we have noticed, the text gives a hint of the supposed site of the Æduan capital at Beuvray. To say of a church like the Folgoet that "some persons may think it rather the result of superstition than of faith," appears, from every point of view we can think of, singularly inept, and we very much wish we knew what Mr. Hunnewell had in his mind when he gravely wrote down the words, "In England, where the so-called Conquest brought about remarkable results, the Norman power was greatest." But, as we have said, we prefer not to dwell on the weaknesses of a book which calls up many pleasant memories and is itself a handsome volume. One remark of a mechanical kind, however, we must make. The illustrations as noted are excellent, the type clear and good, and the paper very satisfactory; but is it not rather a reductio ad absurdum of the American plan of machine-shaving the edges to leave the sides where the sheets are folded uncut? The reader has after all to have recourse to his paper-knife, and yet he has not the solace of the pleasantly fringed paper to reward him. If laziness and a mistaken love of trimness are to be consulted at all, let them be consulted consistently.

THREE NOVELS.*

RUPERT DISNEY was a man of thirty-eight, and private secretary to Lord Gresham, an almost sinecure position, very different from that of most private secretaries to Cabinet Ministers nowadays. He was a good-looking man, with a resolute will and a keen intellect, much kindness of heart tempered by a tone of irony, and a general air of prosperity, looking as if the world and all things in it had gone well with him. This rather enviable gentleman had a nephew, Harold Disney, a very young officer in a cavalry regiment quartered at Brighton. Harold was not a wise youth, and his looks were in unison with his unwisdom. The soft contour of his fair rosy face "bespoke an immaturity that is apt to merge into overbloom." His uncle was vexed to find that this nephew had established a footing of intimacy with a family of fifth-rate women who were living in Hugh Street, Pimlico. This family consisted of a Mrs. Wynter, who was always reminding her friends that they had a relation a Duke, and of three daughters—Missy the mimic, Lily the beautiful, and Addie, "who did not count." The nephew carried off his uncle to visit his friends. Now Mr. Rupert Disney had an instinctive hatred of vulgarity, meanness, slang, and small jokes; and the mother and the two daughters, who begged for invitations to officers' messes, and even for the unconsumed food left upon their tables, and who asked their female acquaintance for their left-off clothes, were positively loathsome to the fastidious private secretary. Harold, however, escaped from the Hugh Street meshes, and was called a "brute" and "beast" for his backwardness in coming forward. He transferred his facile affections to Miss Dulcibella Surge, an American medium, who is described with fine lights and shades of character. Her evident mission in life was to marry a rich slangy young English gentleman, who desired nothing better than to be ruled and made much of by a person with better brains than his own. But if Rupert Disney was himself a master of irony, he was a marked victim of what is called the irony of fate. The sensible, self-contained, high-bred gentleman, who hated everything low, and who shrank with a mimosa-like sensitiveness from unwomanliness in woman, the uncle who shuddered at the bare notion of having a slipshod Wynter girl for a niece, had himself not been a wise lover. He had adored Aurelia Lynton, who had thrown him over for a rich nobleman. He had then had a love affair, of which we hear but little, with an Austrian widow. He had worn the shackles of a Miss Hermia Lyons who was studying for the stage, and who became the wife of a tobacconist. Aurelia, Lady Ferney, who spoke and thought coarsely, and who had "the quivering scarlet nostrils which betoken that their owner—equine or human—sticks at nothing," still hankered after the man she had jilted, and, failing to recapture him, did her best to spite him and to thwart his wishes. But he voluntarily became the affianced husband of a woman less bold and passionate, but more false and contemptible than his old flame whom he had learned to know and to despise. Marguerite Rieder was a heartless woman, full of affectations, "with whom insincerity was a habit, and who could not breathe the air of simple, unconscious truth." She thought it pretty to cover herself with pearls and daisies in honour of her name, and to wear dresses fantastic and original such as it never entered the head of any milliner to devise. She never troubled herself about other women unless there was anything in their garments or adornments which she thought it worth while to copy and improve upon. Rupert Disney knew that he did not love this woman, that she was absolutely unlovable. He even despised and suspected her, and his contempt and suspicion warped his naturally genial disposition and made him cynical and almost ill conditioned. But he was a loyal gentleman who thought no man had a right to escape from unhappiness at the price of his honour. He would unflinchingly have set the seal on his own misery if his prettyish sallow fiancée, whose skin his irreverent nephew Harold declared had the complexion of cold pea-soup, had not clandestinely married a young marquis, who, when a boy at Eton, had found his chief pleasure in roasting white mice alive, and who as a man cheated at cards and was addicted to most forms of blackguardism. Mr. Disney, like most wise men, was a fool about women; but he was in most actions of his life a gentleman, "beak and talons," as the French say. He made one great lapse, however, from "gentylhood" when he wrote a scolding and, truth to say, rather a spiteful letter to Lady Stamer upbraiding her for her treachery. It is the part of a true gentleman as well as of a wise man to smile and to keep silent when a woman deals him a wound. And all this time we have barely mentioned the name of Addie or Adelaide Wynter, who did not count with the rest of her family. She is no cypher, however, in the story, and she counted for a great deal in the future fortunes of Rupert Disney. How she influenced them it is for the author, and not for us, to tell. Point Blank is a decidedly clever and well-written story, and quite worthy of the author of Jack Urquhart's Daughter. We think so highly of the book that we will venture on a word of advice which we should not care to offer to a writer of inferior merit. We will hint this word of counsel as delicately as we can. It is this. The lines of drawing in the portraits of the personages of this tale are so true and so good that a certain pulpiness and extra warmth of colour, such as are to be seen in the picture of Lady Ferney, for instance, are not only unnecessary and out of keeping with the general surroundings, but are calculated to give somewhat of a shock to persons of good taste. A little closer attention to style and grammar is also sometimes to be desired. A Lady Letitia ought not to be made to say in print, though we are afraid that many Lady Letitias would say in spoken words, "Did you ever hear of any one making such a goose of themselves as Harold did at dinner?" and Adelaide Wynter, an author herself and a governess to boot, should not remark that "A person may sometimes wish that they had never known a very happy life when circumstances are forcing them," &c. A "duel à l'outrance" is not French, nor is "en déshabille," nor is "que dira ton," as the author writes and divides the words. What is an "Imperador cigar"?

If the old saw, that the eloquence of an orator lies in the ears of his audience, deserves general acceptance, the narrator of these adventures of "a highly original family" ought to begin by packing the house with prosperous gentlemen who have well dined, mothers whose daughters are not quite of the regulation pattern, young lovers who are allowed to sit near each other, boys at home for the holidays, and girls whose governesses are on a prolonged visit to their friends. "Superior persons" of any kind should be informed that, for them, there is no standing room to be obtained for love or money; and unfrivolous people, who see no fun in the adventures of Miss Alcott's "Little Women," and who read Vice Versâ with a countenance as unmoved as if they were conning the advertisements in the Times, should ask to have their money returned. Mrs. Denbigh and her three daughters are delightfully eccentric persons. Their eccentricities, however, are diverse and various. Each wears her rue with a difference. They live in a German residenz, and eke out a wofully scanty income by giving lessons in music and English and by translating advertisements of a particularly glossy blacking. Nora, Elizabeth, and Dorry are the names of the young ladies, who make atrocious puns, go to parties dressed in table-cloths for want of more conventional clothing, and who pass themselves off on their visitors as their own maidservants. We can fancy many persons moved to scorn rather than to laughter by the very foolish and delightful story of the two girls who, having bought a big shabby old clock, hide it in the flower-bed of a public garden on the approach of a gentleman of their acquaintance. He accosts them, and takes a seat by their side, whereupon the wicked timepiece emits loud spiteful strikes from its hiding-place, and thus betrays the shameful secret of its poor little owners. The book is full of similar absurdities. This galimatias of nonsense, however, which the grave and foolish will scoff at and which the merry and wise will chuckle over, is not monotonously frolicsome. The death of poor home-sick little Dorry, who is drowned in the Dnieper while attempting to save the life of her Russian pupil, is as honestly touching and pathetic as the rest of the tale is honestly funny and humorous. The author seems to think that a novel must contain at least one pair of lovers, so she gets up a courtship between Elizabeth Denbigh and a Mr. O'Brien. But this love affair requires a good deal of "make believe" on the part of the reader. It is scarcely possible to think of "Bet" as a married woman with the cares of a household upon her. Three Sisters is a very charming book; we recommend the author, however, another time to supply herself with a little more stuff to work upon; like her own Nora, she is very successful in hiding her paucity of material by plentifully "dropping bows" upon it. Very pretty and winsome these bows are; but the device, like other fleeting fashions, must soon wear out. A person capable of writing so good a story as this should eschew the ponderous playfulness of calling herself "Mr. Anon."

It may be laid down that a ghost should only at rare intervals and for a few brief moments revisit the glimpses of the moon. Even Sir Walter Scott, the greatest magician of all time, failed when he fixed an historical period for the appearance of his White Lady of Avenel, and when he brought her with wearisome frequency upon the stage, across which so ethereal a spirit should only have flitted once or twice in the course of the story. Lockhart is right when he says that "a phantom with whom we have leisure to grow familiar is sure to fail." The author of The Wizard's Son has struggled valorously with these difficulties and almost overcome them. She has told a ghost story in three volumes, which, with intervals of tediousness, is interesting throughout. The tone of the book is as pure and even lofty as that of Sintram. Much indeed of the story itself reminds us of La Motte Fouqué's masterpiece. The poor hero of Mrs. Oliphant's story has, however, no fierce passions to rid himself of like the Scandinavian knight. He is a feckless shambly sort of young man who frets his mother by his want of ambition, his failure of distinction in his studies, and his taste for doubtful company. He frequently falls into paroxysms of weak anger against himself, and proclaims that he is "a cad"; and vague hints are given of his "badness." But he is not a cad at all, and we cannot see that he is even vicious. He seems to us very much like other young men would have grown to be who were brought up under similar circumstances, and who were born with a similar flexibility of moral backbone. Living in a small English country town with a mother in straitened circumstances, who was equally wrapped up and disappointed in him, with no career open to him, and with only the uncertain prospect of a clerkship in a Scotch attorney's office, it was natural enough that a young gentleman of Walter Methven's modest aspirations should be content to smoke and drink and play economical games of cards with Captain Underwood and that mysterious officer's boon companions. Sometimes, when he grew tired of his unintellectual companions, he would say spiteful things of them, and the "Captain" would try to put him in better spirits by confidently prophesying that something good would be sure to turn up for him one day. When this "far-off collateral," Walter Methven, who barely knew that he had a distant relation, a rich nobleman, suddenly became Lord Erradeen, the surprise was not so great to Underwood, and that pour cause, as it was to the lad and his mother. This disreputable mentor warned the young peer of various "mysteries" which haunted his Scottish houses, and these hints were more than confirmed by Miss Alison Milnathort, the sister of Lord Erradeen's solicitor, who had herself been a victim of the uncanny influences at work on Kinloch Houran, where the wizard ancestor of Walter Methven played strange pranks with his descendants. Lord Erradeen soon found himself in a constant "fever of impulses which drew him like mesmerism." The evil influence of the warlock lord could only be overcome by the union of "two persons set upon all good things," a man and a woman who should together make up the perfect man. Lord Erradeen would have united himself to the rich heiress Katie Williamson. She "would have fought the very Devil for him and brought him off"; but that young lady saw that it was his hand and not his heart which the young lord offered her, and she declined to become Lady Erradeen. Another of his old flames, Julia Herbert, would have been of little use to him as a guide and protectress. Oona Forrester alone could save him. She alone, with her own goodness, could draw out the good that still lay latent in him. She was resolute to save the poor man who was powerless to save himself, and who could never stand very firmly without female support. At the cost of a broken arm to her lover, and the agony of a day and night passed by both of them in the ruins of a burning house, the wizard's direful lamp was shattered, and the hero of the tale was freed for ever from the companionship of his unpleasant and pertinacious forbear. It is needless to say that Mrs. Oliphant has written this strange story with the skill of a practised hand. Her style is always even and correct, and her good taste is seldom at fault.

THE ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA.*

THE seventeenth volume of the Encyclopædia Britannica discusses all knowledge which begins alphabetically at Motenarbi or Motonerbi, and ends at Ormuzd. The immense variety of persons and things which lie between the two are, as usual, treated by competent writers. Prof. E. Ray Lankester, Prof. Ayrton, and others sign the scientific articles. Dr. Freeman, Mr. Morris, and Mr. Middleton write on history and art. The presence of such names among the contributors is enough to show that the volume contains much which is not only useful for purposes of reference, but has an independent literary and critical value. How far it will be interesting to the mere reader for curiosity depends obviously on his taste. If he happens to enjoy geography he will have a feast. Very early, supposing him to begin at the beginning (which is perhaps less plainly the right course in tackling an encyclopædia than another work), he will find an account of Mysore by Dr. Hunter. Then he may go further east, to Nanking, with Professor Douglas. He may double back through Nepal, with Dr. Wright as a guide, and reach the United States by New Guinea, Mr. Coutts Thomas duce. Once in the New World he may stay there indefinitely. New Brunswick (Mr. G. Stewart), Newfoundland (Rev. M. Harvey), New Hampshire (Professor C. H. Hitchcock and J. K. Lord), New Jersey (General Maclellan), New Mexico (Hon. J. B. Prince), and New Orleans (Mr. G. W. Cable) all follow one another. The name of Mr. Cable is tempting. After these come many others—seas, countries, and cities—before we reach Ormus (Colonel Yule, C.B.), and hear about its ruined Portuguese castle, its former glories of silk and pearls, and its present desolation. As far as we can judge, the relative length of the articles corresponds fairly to the comparative importance of the subjects. It is not self-evident that Napier of Merchiston is entitled to nearly as many columns as Newton; but, then, Mr. Glaisher's biography of the pious and mathematical Scotch laird is highly interesting. Some of the engravings in the text are neatly done, and there is a good handful of coloured plates at the end; the first, intended as an illustration to the article on Mural Decoration (Messrs. Morris and Middleton), is singularly pleasant to look on.

Turning to the individual articles, we select the biographical first as being the least technical. One or two of them are by no means what we should expect in a work of this class. Professor J. R. Seeley is responsible for an article on Napoleon which is full of that absurdity the historic present and of marks of interrogation. Mr. Seeley is continually asking, What was Napoleon to do now? and then answering himself, rather after the manner of the eloquent Chadband. Mr. W. O. Morris writes of Nelson with depressing solemnity, and shakes his head over the sad Lady Hamilton business like a highly moral man. We have to make a criticism on the editing of this part of the Encyclopædia. It would add to the value of the work if special articles were devoted to great families. At this moment we are hearing a good deal of the house of Nassau, and are likely to hear more, but on turning to the article on that word at p. 238, we only find an account of the place, and a very brief mention of a few of its princes. Now a pedigree and a sketch of the family history would fill the columns of the Encyclopædia quite as usefully and much more agreeably than monotonous plans of New Orleans or New York. The advantage of such a novelty is illustrated in this very volume. It contains notices of two remarkable "stirps of nobles" belonging to our own history. Four articles are devoted to the Norths, who produced the economist of the seventeenth century and the fat and imperturbable Prime Minister of George III. Four articles are required by the Napiers. The Laird of Merchiston fills nineteen columns with credit. The brothers Sir Charles and Sir William, with their cousin the noisy Admiral, precede and follow the inventor of logarithms. It would surely be instructive to be able to see at a glance what was the descent of the wonderful fighting brood of Napiers, who feared nothing but soap and water, according to the well-known saying. There are some other deficiencies in this respect. John Norris, "the disciple of Plato and Malebranche," has over two columns to himself; but nothing is said about the Elizabethan soldiers. The words pedigree and family suggest reference to the article on "Nobility." It is the work of Mr. Freeman; and that, again, is equivalent to saying that it is concise, lucid, instructive, and just a trifle whimsical. Mr. Freeman shows from the history of Rome what a nobility is, and how there may be different forms of it. Then he applies the lesson to the modern world; and, with his well-known power of making things clear, conveys his meaning without a superfluity of examples. But, and that also is usual with him, he carries his respect for the accurate use of words to the verge of pedantry. It is a favourite proposition of his that we have never had a nobility in the proper sense, because we have not had a privileged caste like the French noblesse. Surely this is taking the accident for the essence of the thing. We have always had a number of families, titled or untitled, which have enjoyed social position, and have been thought to have a right by birth to leadership and influence, provided they could turn out men of reasonable energy and brains. It is this pre-eminence which makes a nobility not the exact form or extent of their privileges.

Mr. Freeman also contributes two historical articles on Normandy and the Normans. Whoever has even a moderate familiarity with contemporary historical literature knows beforehand what they contain, and whoever has directed his reading to other fields, or, as is generally the case, has read next to nothing, may study them with the certainty that he will find a host of facts admirably well stated, and views of history and politics founded on study and thought. Mr. Barnaby's sketch of naval history is a far less satisfactory piece of work. It is the sad fortune of the service to have been at all times very badly written about, at least as far as its history goes. The article in the Encyclopædia does not look as if we were about to see better things. Some of the sentences are so worded as to be misstatements of facts. Take, for instance, this one. "In consequence of the dissipation of the King"—Mr. Barnaby is speaking of Charles II.—"and his pecuniary difficulties, he neglected the navy on account of the expenses; the Duke was sent abroad and Pepys to the Tower." This looks as if it was because of the King's dissipation that the Duke of York went into exile and Pepys was sent to prison. Indeed, the whole article is singularly confused. Reasons of a business nature probably explain why the American navy has a sub-article to itself by Lieutenant Kelly, whereas the navies of France and Holland, which assuredly deserve notice in this place, are passed over. The account of the actually existing maritime forces of the world is good and clear. A very long article—there are fifty-two columns of it—is given to "newspapers." The student of the history of the press will find in it how our own grew to its present flourishing condition, and will also learn the main facts at least about the presses of the Continent and America. It is copiously illustrated by tables. The authors give another stab to the absurd old story about the English Mercurie supposed to have been started in the Armada year by Elizabeth and Burleigh, which has not only taken in the authors of "the latest works on English journalism"—no remarkable feat for the rest—but even the too credulous M. Forneron, who does know the history of the sixteenth century. The article is not, however, so complete as it might well be. There is, for one thing, no proper notice taken of the famous press of Holland, which, especially in its earlier period, well deserves study. In the sixteenth and seventeenth century the Dutch gazettes and caricatures were a force in European politics.

This volume is not remarkable for general literary articles, but Mr. Sime's study of the Nibelungen Lied is scholarly and clear. Mythology and Names are not easy to class under any particular heading; but, as dealt with by Mr. Lang, they make excellent reading. He proves in the first that mythology has tempted various learned persons into making imposing-looking theories that will not stand criticism, and then proceeds to point out what are the facts about the subject. On the whole, he accounts for what is absurd or shocking in myths on the indisputable ground that there is more of the fool than of the wise man in human nature, and that primitive man was and savage man is nearly as credulous as a spiritualist. Myths, from Mr. Lang's account, seem to be generally very dull rubbish till they fall into the hands of the poet. The article on Names, which might be so cruelly dull, is a bright essay, full of the delightful inconsequences and crackling phrases which are found in Mr. Lang's writing. A remarkable number of religious subjects come in between "Mot" and "Orm." Professor Andrew Smith does his best to say what Mysticism is; but, as he justly observes, it is a not easy thing to make intelligible. Principal Tulloch writes of Neander and his "theological position." Professor Albrecht Socin, an ideal name for a writer on religion, sketches the history and describes the opinions of the Nestorians. Oaths, though commonly another thing in practice, are historically and theoretically religious. Dr. Taylor has been entrusted with the task of showing what they have been and ought to be. Obadiah and the Obadiahs are disposed of by Professor W. R. Smith. His article is a good deal longer than the one chapter of the most minor of minor Prophets. Mr. J. Bass Mullinger discusses the newest phase of the unchanging Church in a paper on Old Catholics. It is, however, impossible to name even a minority of the subjects treated in the 858 pages of double-columns contained within the boards of this seventeenth volume of the Encyclopædia. As far as any sane person can take upon himself to speak of the general quality of the work, it seems good. There is nothing very obviously controversial or one-sided. The reader who turns up a paper on one of the ninety-nine out of a hundred things written about here concerning which he in all probability knows nothing, may feel tolerably sure that he will get facts well stated and find references to authorities. If he looks at the hundredth thing, which he does know a trifle about, he does not find much that is alarmingly wrong. The standard of excellence in printing, paper, and arrangement is high.

VERTEBRATE ZOOTOMY.*

"I DON'T wish my child to know anything about her inside" was the reply of a middle-class matron to an extremely intelligent schoolmistress of our acquaintance, who had provided some excellent and very harmless elementary teaching in natural science for her scholars. This remark, made not more than two months ago, shows how rampant prejudice still is on these subjects. We are glad, however, to notice many signs which lead us to hope that it will not long survive. What Kingsley laughed at as "the bottle and squirt mania, miscalled chemistry," has given place to regular teaching in a great number of both public and private schools; and the other mania of collecting sickly sea-anemones and pale unhappy shrimps in an aquarium, which was once so fashionable, is now replaced by solid information on the structure and zoological arrangement of the whole animal kingdom. If we had to name any one individual to whose energy and scientific ability this change is mainly due, we should select Professor Huxley, whose unrivalled powers of popular exposition have revealed to persons who would never have thought of opening a regular scientific treatise the importance and interest of the study of biology; while those to whom he has given a regular scientific training have gone out into the world, and become in their turn founders of schools and centres of instruction at home, in the colonies, and in America. The admirable work before us is an instance of this; for the author, now Professor of Biology in the University of Otago, was originally one of Professor Huxley's Demonstrators at the School of Mines, South Kensington; and the book professes to be nothing more than a development of the zoological portion of the Elementary Biology which Professor Huxley published some years ago in conjunction with his friend and pupil Mr. Martin, now Professor at the Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore.

We are sorry that Mr. Parker should have called his book A Course of Instruction in Zootomy, as the title may lead people to think that it treads on the dangerous ground of vivisection. Let us at once explain that the subjects to be investigated are all to be as dead as the languages on which we were exclusively trained when we were at school and college, and that Mr. Parker gives directions for killing in the most merciful way possible any animal that may be brought alive to the dissecting-table. The work originated in the desire to enable a student of comparative anatomy—or, to use a more modern term, of Morphology—to work out the structure of any ordinary vertebrate animal with some of that thoroughness which has always been demanded from students of human anatomy. In large and well-appointed morphological laboratories, such as Professor Huxley's own, or that which the late Professor Balfour established at Cambridge, this sort of help is supplied by a staff of demonstrators; but Mr. Parker has conferred an immense boon on teachers and students alike by enabling the latter to dispense to a very great extent with the services of the former. He has selected half a dozen types of vertebrate structure, the lamprey, the skate, the cod, the lizard, the pigeon, and the rabbit; and, under each head, gives clear directions as to the way in which these creatures are to be dissected, and what points the student ought to make out at the successive stages of his work. The method is the same throughout; the skeleton is taken first; then the zoological characters are briefly indicated; and, lastly, the dissection of the organs and muscles is described in a way which seems to us to leave nothing to be desired. The author in his preface is at pains to inform us that he "makes no pretence whatever at giving a complete account of the anatomy of the types selected"; and in a subsequent paragraph returns to the difficulty he had felt in deciding what should be retained and what omitted. We know by experience that there is no harder task than that of selecting, out of a number of small details, those which are of really first-rate importance; and we are convinced that only a complete mastery of his subject, from the practical side, could have enabled Mr. Parker to exercise so sound a judgment in dealing with this very important question. In treating of the skeleton, he has very properly left out all description of the bones, as that may readily be found elsewhere; but in the rest of the work, where the ground is comparatively untrodden, we cannot discover that he has omitted anything essential; while, on the other hand, he has carefully described a number of points which could not be found in any of the ordinary manuals. In working these out the student will find invaluable help from the seventy-four excellent illustrations, which form a distinctive feature of the book. It is part of Professor Huxley's system to advise his students to make drawings of work done, as being a better memorandum than mere notes; and, when we add that all the figures before us, except six, have been drawn by Mr. Parker himself, it will be easy to estimate the thoroughness and originality of this part of his book. We have tested the accuracy of some of these drawings by personal experience, and can confidently recommend them not only to beginners, but to more advanced naturalists, who may want to find accurate information ready to their hand on some disputed question. The figures illustrating the brain are especially clear and instructive. In a few instances the letters of reference have not been printed with sufficient distinctness; but this is a defect which can be readily corrected in subsequent editions. In other respects the book is excellently got up, the catch-words being printed in thick type, and the less important sections in a type rather smaller than that employed for the bulk of the text.

HOUSES IN BATH.*

AT first sight Bath seems to be as modern as an American town, and to have arisen in brightness and beauty some two or three centuries later than the walls of the early Tudor church in its midst, which, having belonged to a Benedictine monastery, had been spared to impart an ecclesiastical character to the future city. Looking deeper, however, that is, literally to a depth lower than the discovered foundations of one or two houses recently demolished near the Abbey church, we see evidences of domestic occupation dating more than fifteen hundred years back, the capacious reservoir of a noble Roman bath being laid open to the eye, with its bordering steps and approaches as perfect as when the last of the crowd of local Romans went down into the thermal waters. This is suggestive of a city of habitations, while the votive tablets and remains of temples that have from time to time been discovered indicate that the residents under the Empire considered godliness to be no less proper than cleanliness. But these relics can hardly in one sense be called historic, for no definite history connected with them has come down to us. A studious archæologist may yet find remains of the old encircling walls of Bath, but the historic houses must, from the reconstructed character of the place, be of purely modern consideration, and limited in date, with a few or no exceptions, to the last hundred and fifty years. This range, however, includes a wonderful concentration of memories of more or less illustrious persons; for the saintly multitude that clustered like bees about the snow-white rose of the Divine Comedy were hardly more fondly drawn to the glittering flower than were the select and unselect people of genius, learning, and fashion, and even of piety, of a few generations back to the rose and flower of Western cities. The tablets in the Abbey might alone afford a pretty good index to the names of important visitors to the healing springs and gay promenades of this one time queen, with whom they lived so deliciously, though frequently not for long. A more complete record than these marble names is contained in the present volume, which we welcome as a well-intentioned effort to give more than visible meaning to the handsome streets and terraced rows and crescents of the place. It is not the first effort of the kind, as the author admits; for the Rev. Joseph Hunter once privately circulated a paper on the "Connexion of Bath with the Literature and Science of England," and Mr. G. Monkland followed him (1854–5) with two small volumes on the "Literature and Literati of Bath." Mr. Peach's book includes much of the matter in the above works, but keeps more particularly to its avowed subject—the houses actually existing that are associated with remarkable persons or incidents. The writer is, we understand, a bookseller of the place in which he takes so intelligent an interest.

We are not disposed to be hard upon the writer's English; but it is a pity that some scholarly acquaintance did not revise the proof-sheets of his book, to save such incongruous metaphor and contradictory wording as we find, for example, in the following sentences:—

> In our desire to pick up here and there a crumb of information we have had to wade through oceans of jargon and archaic literature, in which we were nearly overwhelmed. One of the controversies of the day was between Dr. Peirce and Dr. Guidott, the former contending for bursting libations (!) of the waters, the latter for limiting their use almost exclusively to external application.

Built entirely of the light freestone or oolite of the district, without the intermixture of a single red brick or block of grey limestone, the appearance of Bath from any of the encircling heights, with its stately rows and crescents rising stage upon stage against a background of green hills and woods, is that of one of the most theatrical of landscape cities, and is unsurpassed in its kind. "Children," we are told by the Son of Sirach, "and the building of a city continue a man's name"; and few men have had an opportunity of perpetuating their names with the like effect of the elder Wood, the builder of modern Bath, whose architectural creations show a genius for street construction that stamps him for a master in his profession. Moreover, his son entered into his labours, and continued them with almost equal ability. His first work was the North Parade, which was begun in 1740; and, had the original design been completely realized—which was to give the whole block the appearance of a single house, or rather of a palace—it would, with its three hundred Corinthian columns and pilasters, central pediment, and corner towers, have been finer than even now, and well worthy of some of its illustrious inhabitants and visitors of the past. Among the latter was Goldsmith, who here stayed in the opening months of 1771 with his friend Lord Clare, whose portrait was painted by Gainsborough, then residing in Bath. At the same house, No. 11, Edmund Burke spent the first five months of the year 1771. He came here in his last illness, but, finding no recovery by the change of air and use of the waters, he returned home to be "nearer a habitation," he said, "more permanent." That lasting habitation he reached on the 9th of July, 1797. William Wilberforce speaks of having here called upon him with the Hon. William Windham, and remarks that the attention shown to Mr. Burke by his own party "was just like the treatment of Achitophel of old; it was just as if one went to inquire of the oracle of the Lord." Burke's wife was a lady of Bath, being the daughter of Dr. Christopher Nugent, who lived at "Circus House." From the centre house (now divided into two, 32 and 2) in the high-sounding Pierrepont Street, the Earl of Chesterfield wrote some of his ineffectual letters to his uninteresting son, and fairly says in one of them (Oct. 4, O.S. 1746), "Though I employ so much of my time in writing to you, I confess I have often my doubts whether it is to any purpose"; for "those who want advice most, like it and follow it least." In the same street, and apparently in the same house, died (January 27, 1766) Quin the comedian, whose decrepid form in his last days had gained him so little respect in the eyes of at least one of the humble "locals" of the place, that, while talking one day with a friend, the kill "buck" suddenly placed his hands on the actor's shoulders and vaulted over his head, to his astonishment and indignation, his regret however being that he could not perform a like feat of agility. Quin used to say that he did not know a better place than Bath for "an old cock to roost in." His last earthly, or roosting, place is the central aisle of the Abbey. At No. 2 Pierrepont Street lived, from the autumn of 1790 to August 1791, the future victor of the Nile and Trafalgar, whose father here died in 1803. At No. 5 was born Sarah Siddons, who lives in memory as the wife of Siddons, rather than as the loudest and most popular of public singers. There were many women before she was wed but one only of the unsuccessful suitors deserves to be remembered. Mr. Long, unlike Auld Robin Gray, finding that he would be unloved as the elderly husband of the Bath beauty, desisted from his advances, and magnanimously settled 3,000*l.* upon her as dower for a more favoured lover.

Londonderry House, in Kingsmead Square, was evidently not intended originally for the uses of a "Fish, Fruit, Pea, and Potato Salesman," to which it is now devoted. It was built in 1756 by John Strahan, a not unworthy follower of the elder Wood, and with its vigorously moulded windows, firm pilasters, fluted cornice, and carved brackets, is a stately composition of its kind. Here the author of the Analogy died on the morning of Tuesday, June 16, 1752, a date that is accordingly inscribed on his funeral tablet, only that it there occurs as "XVI Kal. Jul." The latter form seems to have misled the good Bishop's biographer, for he oddly says, "The date of his decease is here erroneously written July instead of June," forgetting or unaware that "16 kalend. July" is the 16th of June. The anecdotes of the prelate's deathbed are by no means authenticated, though his chaplain, Dr. Forster, was present at the solemn scene, and might well have reported correctly. His imputed expression that it was "an awful thing to appear before the august Governor of the World" is by no means unlikely to have been uttered by one of his dignified humility, but the thought is more awful than profound. The funeral procession from Bath to Bristol Cathedral where Butler was interred consisted, besides the hearse of two coaches and six, his servants in livery going before on horseback, so that it could hardly be said in its modest simplicity that, in Pope's words, his "long funeral blackened all the way."

At 6 South Parade, Walter Scott, then a young boy, was residing (1777) when he made his earliest acquaintance with the stage, being taken by his Uncle Robert to the Old Orchard Street Theatre to witness the presentation of As You Like It. At the quarrel between the two brothers he was so shocked that he called out to remind them of their relationship, but found out, he says, in no long time after, that it was not unusual for brothers to disagree. He stayed at Bath about a year, and went through the discipline of the pump-room and baths, though without the least advantage to his lameness. While he abode here he acquired the rudiments of learning at a day-school kept by an old dame near the Parade, whose name, were it recorded, might almost be reckoned among Bath celebrities. He confessed to a Scotch horror for imagery, and tells us that Jacob's ladder, with which the west front of the Abbey is adorned on either side, with the ascending and descending angels, filled him with superstitious terror, while even a statue of Neptune which guarded the banks of the Avon had no charm for him, and apparently for no one else, for it was soon after thrown down and left neglected.

If it is difficult to grow old gracefully, it is still more difficult to grow young again gracefully, and Mrs. Piozzi hardly succeeded in this when she opened a ball in the Lower Rooms on the anniversary of her eightieth birthday. Her house was No. 8 Gay Street, but she had previously resided on the North Parade, where with Mr. Thrale she was visited in 1776 by Dr. Johnson. The Doctor stayed at "The Pelican Inn," now "The Three Cups," in Walcot Street. No greater contrast to Mrs. Piozzi in her "perpetual state of rampant senility" could be afforded than Selina, Countess of Huntingdon, "the most precious saint of God" Mr. Toplady says he "ever knew." Had the attempted conversion of Beau Nash been accomplished, the influences of Lady Huntingdon and her sect might have spread beyond the very narrow company of Calvinistic Methodists that circled her at Bath. Nash was prevailed upon to hear Whitefield preach at her house; but the lampoons he suffered in consequence were too much for the Master of the Ceremonies, and he went no more.

Though there is nothing to indicate on the title-page that the present book is incomplete, the writer gives us to understand that he intends to supply an additional series of like records. It would be well if the work could be published as a whole with a table of contents and index.

RECENT STORIES, AMERICAN AND ENGLISH.

TURGENEF'S small volume of Poems in Prose (Boston: Cupples, Upham, & Co.) well deserves its title. It consists of short stories, sketches, and dialogues, which are all more or less poetical, and as suggestive as they are dainty. Each contains the outline of an exquisite poem. The stories are too short and too numerous to be discussed in detail; but the best of them are perhaps "A Dialogue between the Jungfrau and the Finsteraarhorn," "The Beggar," "The Blockhead," "An Oriental Legend," "The Sparrow," and "The Dogs." The most original of them all is "The Supreme Being's Banquet." The Supreme Being gives a banquet to the Virtues. The smaller Virtues are more genial and affable than the great. The Supreme Being notices that two of the most beautiful of his guests do not know each other. "The host took one lady by the hand, and led her up to the other. 'Benevolence,' said He, 'this is the first.' 'Gratitude,' added He, introducing the second to her. Both Virtues were much surprised to make each other's acquaintance. For the first time since the creation of the world, and that was a great while ago, they now met face to face." It is difficult to choose favourites among so many gems, but to appreciate them at their full value the advice of Turgenef himself, which is given in the preface about this little volume, may be quoted:—"The reader must not slide over these poems in prose one after the other, that would probably tire him, and he would soon put the book aside. But let him read each one separately—one to-day another to-morrow, and then perhaps one or more of them may sink into his soul and bear fruit."

Mumu and the Diary of a Superfluous Man (New York: Funk & Wagnalls) are two short stories also by Turgenef. In the first a very graphic picture is given of the former tyranny of the Russian master over the serf. Gerassim, a serf of colossal stature and of Herculean strength, but a deaf mute, is brought from the village in which he was born to Moscow, where he finds his work too easy. Among the household of his mistress is a laundry-maid named Tatiana, whom, moved by her lonely and desolate condition, Gerassim first protects and gradually falls in love with. He shows his admiration and devotion by small presents, and by the peculiar whining sound which deaf mutes make when pleased. Tatiana is pleased with Gerassim. On the estate, and in the service of the same lady, is a shoemaker, named Kapiton Klimoff, a hard drinker, who, after many transgressions, at last disgraces the household by being picked up drunk in the road. His mistress determines to marry him to some one who will keep him in order. In spite of Gerassim's evident affection for her, both the mistress and her steward decide upon Tatiana as the fitting wife, and the match is arranged between the two parties. The servants, however, all dread the fury of Gerassim when he comes to discover the state of affairs. And as they know that he has a horror of drunken people, they persuade Tatiana to feign tipsiness before him. She acts her part so well that Gerassim is deceived, and, disgusted with her, makes no objection to the marriage. After a time Tatiana and her husband are exiled to distant estates in the country on account of his bad habits. Gerassim suffers from depressed spirits for a long time, but after Tatiana's marriage he gradually recovers his former composure. One day he saves the life of a puppy, which he finds drowning in the river. He takes it home, feeds and caresses it, and calls it in his peculiar whine "Mumu." The dog develops into a beautiful spaniel, and attracts the attention of the lady, who wishes to take it away from Gerassim. But Mumu snaps and snarls, and will not be parted from her master. One day, when his mistress is more than usually ill-humoured, Mumu's bark annoys her, and she gives orders that the dog is to be sold. Accordingly Mumu is kidnapped and disappears. Gerassim is in despair, and loses interest in everything. Mumu breaks the rope which fastens her, and returns to her master, who is overjoyed to see her. He hides her, and takes her out for exercise at night. But she contrives to annoy the mistress a second time by barking, and orders are given for her to be strangled. Gerassim, being warned of this, drowns Mumu himself, and quitting Moscow, walks back to his native village. The description of Gerassim's grief at parting with Mumu is very touchingly told. Indeed all through the story the signs of a masterhand are visible. The Diary of a Superfluous Man, we are informed by the translator, "is intended to personify descendant aristocracy. As it removes from its original stock it becomes first impoverished, then degraded, then 'superfluous,' and dies at last in self-torment." It is to us a morbid and disagreeable story, and the translation is at times so rough and uneven that it jars upon the ear and detracts from the interest which the story might otherwise have.

In Memoirs and Rime (New York: Funk & Wagnalls) we have some of Mr. Joaquin Miller's reminiscences of his life abroad and in the West. Among them, scattered about at random, are to be found some of his poems. There is a curious description of a dinner at the house of the late Mr. Rossetti. "All London, or rather all the brain of London, the literary brain, was there," we are told. "These giants of thought" and the "literary brain of London" must have been singularly torpid that night to judge from the imbecile bits of conversation to which we are treated. Let us hope that such arrant nonsense is rarely talked at literary tables. Of one thing we are very certain—i.e. that the "Master," as Mr. Miller styles Mr. Rossetti, would have said "Bella Italia" and not "Bella Italia," as attributed to him by Mr. Miller, when he said "I am an Italian who has never seen Italy." The chapter on "Damming the Sacramento" is a good one, and gives a graphic description of the rough life of the miners, when the first crowds of gold-seekers flocked into California. The prayer of "Lazarus" and "Nut Crackers," "chipping in a sort of side prayer for the mine," and the pawning of the boy for "ons squar meal," are very amusing. But the book is, on the whole, tedious reading, and we cannot recommend it.

John de Wycliffe (Shaw & Co.) gives an interesting account of the great reformer and of his work in England. The ecclesiastical situation in 1366 is very simply and clearly told, as well as the political struggles of the time. The book ends with a summary of the writings and opinions of Wycliffe, with quotations from his sermons. Very little is said about the "poor priests" whom Wycliffe sent out into the world with portions of the Scriptures. The book is pleasant reading, and sustains its interest throughout.

In Wiclif's Days (Shaw & Co.) is intended for young people, and is therefore put in the form of a story. It turns upon the discovery of two manuscript books of the Life of John Wiclif, compiled by a certain Henry West Denham from the traditions by the "pore priest" Henry Ford. It is a pity that the conversations of the children with their grandmother at Denham Old Hall should so constantly interrupt the interest in Wiclif throughout the book. Children may find it fairly readable.

Mrs. Willoughby's Octave (London: Seeley & Co.) is a charming book for young readers. Mrs. Willoughby has a family of eight children, with names the initials of which correspond with the letters of the notes of a piano. Hence the title. The father is away on duty in India, and the pleasures, trials, and helpful sympathy with others, of Mrs. Willoughby's family during his absence, are very pleasantly and interestingly told. Some of the illustrations are charming.

Leo and Dick (Shaw & Co.) is the story of a boy who has been kidnapped by gipsies. By a lucky coincidence the gipsies encamp on the common near the house of a gentleman named Courtenay. While watching a game of cricket, Dick attracts the notice of Leo Courtenay, who is one of the cricketers. He discovers that Dick is badly treated by his master, Joe Smith, and persuades his father to interest himself in the boy. But all Mr. Courtenay's efforts fail to induce Joe to give up the lad. Dick is afterwards caught in a poaching fray, and wounded. Meanwhile, a certain Patty Simmons arrives on the scene, and seeing that Dick is maltreated by Joe, she turns Queen's evidence, and confesses that Dick is the child of Mrs. Courtenay's sister, who was supposed to have been drowned. And all ends well. Dick is adopted and educated by the Courtenays, and the wicked Joe meets with his deserts.

Left to Ourselves (Shaw & Co.) is the story of five children whose parents are obliged to leave them to manage for themselves for a time, while they are called away to America. It is a book apparently intended for Sunday school use, but we doubt whether the boys who are influenced by it would ever grow up to be manly men. For example, one of the boys, when very thirsty, drinks a glass of beer, for which offence much maudlin religious sentiment is preached to him, which he imbibes with a docility not common among healthy boys, and auguring ill for his future.

Friendless Johnny (Shaw & Co.) is another book of the same sort. A little boy sells oranges on a ferry-boat, and is harshly treated by the old woman with whom he lives and by her son. He interests another boy named Clarence Adams, who tells his sister Nellie, and she in her turn persuades her father to do something for him. Johnny is rescued from the bad old woman and her good-for-nothing son, and becomes respectable.

In the Sea Gull's Nest (Shaw & Co.) we have the story of a poor boy who takes his revenge for unkind treatment from a rich youth by rescuing him when he falls over a high cliff and saving his life. The story is in itself very slight, but the same unhealthy sentiment pervades this as well as the three other books noticed above. Yet we hope that they may do good to some into whose hands they may fall.

THOUGH the period covered by the new volume of the Calendar of Commonwealth State Papers extends over as many as eleven months, and though these eleven months are certainly inferior in interest to very few years in English history, yet Mrs. Green must have found many previous sections of her work more attractive than this. The meetings of the Council, as she reminds us, were far less frequent in the months from July 1656 to May 1657 than in the earlier years of the Commonwealth, and the original papers are accordingly less numerous. Nearly a third of the volume is taken up by navy papers, which, notwithstanding the important part played by the fleet in this period, are necessarily as a rule devoid of general interest; but in the body of the volume, too, entries possessing high importance are by no means frequent. The truth is that much of what was most momentous in the domestic affairs of these months must have been transacted behind the scenes; and that the lack of information at first-hand concerning it is ill supplied by the utterly irresponsible gossip of Mr. Joseph Williamson's correspondents. Some of the most valuable letters here calendared have only, as it were, by accident found their way into the State Paper Office. These were addressed, chiefly by Secretary Thurloe, to Lockhart, the ambassador sent by the Commonwealth to France in 1657, or to his secretary, William Swift; and copies of them were surreptitiously obtained by the Royalists through some member of the embassy all too "easy of access." The information, on the other hand, as to the doings of the Royalists contained in this volume is rarely of much consequence—a fact which easily admits of explanation. At home the party had been recently crushed with ruthless vigour; abroad, though the Commonwealth was at war with Spain, the fortunes of the Royal Family were at their lowest ebb; there was disunion at headquarters to make impotence more impotent; and the King who was to reconquer three kingdoms had, literally, not the wherewithal to satisfy the claims of his laundress.

The great issue decided during the months to which the papers calendared in this volume belong was that of the English Kingship. Within their course it rested entirely with the judgment of England's de facto master whether he, and perhaps his descendants after him, should wear her royal Crown. He refused it, but not without much preliminary hesitation and searching of the minds of other men, if not of his own. The suspense in which his hesitation kept public opinion reflects itself in many pages of this volume; and the expectation of his refusing seems to have been small. Among the least fruitful suggestions for finding a way out of the difficulty was that mentioned by Williamson's correspondent, the bookseller Robinson:—"Now we hear he has lately got a cold, and is much indisposed; it's said because they have sworn against Kingship the name of Emperor will content them; this may reconcile all." Cromwell preferred to secure a measure of power in nearly all respects equal, and in some superior, to that which the constitution had given to previous English sovereigns. He was contented to share the control of the army with the Parliament; but he obtained the right, which no English King except Henry VIII. had at any time possessed, of naming his successor. He was, moreover, to name his own House of Lords or "Sanhedrim," as the lively Mr. Robinson calls it, and it cannot be wondered that more was expected to follow. According to the same authority:—

> Nedum, our News writer, being last night in Dr. Goodwin's chamber at Whitehall, the Protector asked him the news. He told him that vox populi said Mr. Nye should be Archbishop of Canterbury, and Dr. Owen of York.

Owen (then Vice-Chancellor of Oxford) and Nye had not long before been entrusted with the management of a business which at this time seems to have given more trouble to the Council than any other—namely, that of "augmentations to ministers"; but, though Mr. Marchamont Needham had been a Royalist editor before he became a Republican, it is on the whole probable that, if he really ventured on this remark to the Protector, he rather made it as a jest than threw it out as a feeler.

It is well known that, though Oliver Cromwell ultimately refused the crown, the increase of his authority as Protector deeply offended some of his most trusted military associates and agents—Lambert among the number, who was soon afterwards dismissed from his employments with a retiring pension so handsome as to cause much satirical comment. We live in hopes that forthcoming volumes of this Calendar may furnish at least some contribution to that rather obscure chapter of Commonwealth history, the later political biography of General Lambert; in the meantime it is needless to say that the rumour of his having been implicated in the Sundercomb plot, and having accordingly been "within an inch of execution," may be very confidently dismissed. (As a curious detail, we note that Lambert's attendances at the Council during the eleven months covered by this Calendar were more numerous than those of any other member, with the single exception of the President, Lawrence.) There seems better reason to credit the information derived from the same source, that the objections taken among the Major-Generals to the proposed assumption of the Crown by Oliver Cromwell were not unconnected with his decision to determine their tenure of their extraordinary offices. At all events, it is a remarkable proof of his consciousness of strength that he should as early as the end of the year 1656 have felt able to dispense with the machinery which he had so recently called into life. For its effectiveness was no more to be denied than its unpopularity; and the Protector had himself insisted upon the former in the memorable speech of September 17, 1656, of which the publication of Mrs. Green's new volume naturally suggests a re-perusal. It lasted for three hours, and touched on a wide variety of topics, ranging from the war of Spain to the treatment of the sects. Carlyle might naturally recognize in it a most forcible illustration of his cherished view of the Protector's character, when on the very morrow of its delivery it was supposed "that he has roused a party in the House, and that now we shall have Acts to purpose." The fulfilment of this hope was, however, delayed for some little time. The Parliament which had been opened with this great speech was still more drastically prepared for its work by having to undergo at the hands of the Council a purge which was in reality even severer than that applied by Colonel Pride to the Long Parliament eight years earlier. Mrs. Green calendars the protests of 160 members (they seem afterwards to have been reduced to 140) who had partly been excluded from the House, partly, as it would appear, afterwards indignantly seceded from it, for the number actually excluded seems to have been 99. There follows the Order of the House that the persons rejected be referred to the Council for their approbation, and the answer of the Council "that they have refused none who were men of integrity, and within the qualification of the Instrument of Government, and therefore his Highness and Council have ordered the soldiers to keep these persons out." Yet even this Parliament, much against the will of the Protector, though it passed an Act for the security of his person, and declaring an absolute déchéance of the Stuart family, devoted a considerable part of its first Session to discussing the best method of persecuting an ecstatic Quaker, and thus earned for itself from the great dispenser of historical nicknames the sobriquet of "the James-Nayler Parliament." We are not aware that the petition of this strange fanatic's wife has been previously printed. There is perhaps, nothing very unusual in it, but it somehow goes to the heart. Was he, by the way, really a German, as Mr. Perrott, who wishes him and his followers the same persecution, implies in his letter of January 7th? In the midst of the Parliamentary debates the Protector is found intervening with a letter "for some moderation," but the House would not hearken to it. The Quakers gave trouble enough in this period, and made it difficult for the Government to carry out their policy of tolerance, which is exemplified in an early entry, where the clerks of assize for the Western Circuit are instructed to forbear from entreating George Fox and other Quakers for the fines imposed upon them. There remains, notwithstanding its undeniable imperfections, no nobler feature in Oliver Cromwell's system of government than this; and, every allowance being made for Oriental phraseology, it is difficult to read without admiration for the magnanimity to which it appeals the following:—

Petition of Manasseh Ben Israel to the Protector. What modesty forbids, necessity, ingens ta'um, compels; that having been long very sickly, I beg you, my only succourer in this land of strangers, to help me. I do not prescribe the way, but having experienced your compassion as well as majesty, I lay myself at your feet.

Early in 1657 the operations of Parliament, which had by this time begun to address itself to the business of its existence, were, no doubt, hastened by the discovery of Sundercomb's plot for the assassination of the Protector. Cromwell, who in his speech had not shrunk from appealing, in connexion with the Spanish war, to the example of Queen Elizabeth of famous memory, was not spared a further development of the parallel between himself and the national Queen. In the Declaration of the Protector and Parliament for a day of thanksgiving on February 20th, 1657, the combination between the Levellers and the Spaniards is referred to as the source and beginning of the plot, which had gone through successive phases, including that of blowing up Whitehall, and, as the flippant Perrott writes, "sending the Protector to heaven in a fiery chariot." It was about a month after the discovery of the plot that the idea of offering the Crown to Cromwell was first mooted in Parliament. Never had the great man stood more erect before England and the world than at this season, when, after full consideration, he, to the astonishment of friends and to the disappointment of foes, refused the Crown. At home the resistance of the Royalists had been virtually extinguished by the rigorous measures adopted against them after the Salisbury rising, though, of course, the flutterings of hope and the mutterings of discontent were still audible. Thus, even before the recall of the Major-Generals, we find one of them reporting from Maidstone "the sad spirit" which still existed against the Protector in that self-willed county, Kent. But Major-General Kelsey's fears had been chiefly directed to what the Parliament would do or fail to do, and the action of Protector and Council had effectively removed all danger of his having as he dreaded to return to his "Egyptian taskmasters." Very noticeable in this period are the "reconciliations" with the Protector's Government which were preparing themselves on the part of certain noble families, and which before long were to find expression in the marriages of Cromwell's daughters, Frances and Mary, to Mr. Rich and Lord Falconbridge. The latter is mentioned more than once in this volume, and Ambassador Lockhart, from Paris, reports him to be a person of great merit, who is "much troubled that his enemies give him out to be a Catholic, and has purged himself from having any inclination that way." About the same time the gossip went that the match between Mr. Rich and the Lady Frances was "off," and that a bridegroom was being looked for in France. As the former half of the story proved false, it is perhaps useless to inquire into the foundation of the latter. That some of the nobility should begin to reconsider their position towards the Protectorate was at least excusable, when we find the ladies of so great a house as that of Hamilton suing for the means of maintenance at the hands of the usurper. At the other end of the political scale there were still signs of discontent among the extreme zealots, such as the Fifth-Monarchy men, whom in his great speech Cromwell had acquitted of the charge urged by him against the Levellers, of plotting with "Charles Stuart." In April 1657, however, while the negotiations about the kingship were in a critical stage, these fanatics attempted to carry out their wild design, of which the following account is given by one of Thurloe's stolen letters:—

Meantime he has had a new testimony of God's favour to him. The Fifth-Monarchy men designed an insurrection, and were so ready that they had appointed their rendezvous this night at Mile End Green, but we had notice of it, and seized some 20 of their ringleaders, as they were ready to take horse, took many arms and some ammunition, and their chief standard, a lion couchant, with the motto, "Who shall rouse him up?" There was a declaration in which they set forth a new government. We are sending up and down to apprehend others engaged in this design, and hope to break it.

Abroad, the war with Spain was in full progress; and after, in September 1656, the spoils of the Spanish treasure-fleet captured by Blake and Montague had put all London in good spirits, the destruction of a second Plate fleet by Blake at Vera Cruz in April 1657 was, like the former event, made the occasion for a public thanksgiving. The firm and prudent policy of the Protector, while contriving to avert an outbreak of war with the United Provinces, despite all the efforts made to provoke it, maintained the alliance with France by means of which he had achieved the great moral victory (for as such it is justly regarded) of staying the persecution of the Waldenses. One of the curiosities in the volume before us is the account of the sums paid at the collection for the Piedmontese Protestants, made apparently early in 1656 in the different towns of England and Wales. It is a pity that Mrs. Green should not have printed the list in extenso, as it would have had a certain statistical value. The London total, which must have amounted to some thousands, is not given; while Norwich appears with nearly 158*l.* in thirteen churches; Manchester contributes a little over 32*l.*; and Liverpool (for which better times were near at hand) 10*l.* 3*s.* By the side of this liberal expenditure may be noted the meagre allowance of 329*l.* odd for the expenses of the funeral of King Charles I. Mrs. Green considers that the account proves that "there was no disrespect shown towards his remains"; but it certainly proves nothing further, except that the bill was left unpaid for the better part of eight years. Rather later we have a touching petition from divers poor servants of the late King, left, according to their own statement, in utter destitution.

To the vigorous activity of the Government in these eleven months the spasmodic efforts of the Royal family and of their adherents in exile present a pitiable contrast. There was, as observed, no money to pay for anything—not even, it was feared, for mourning on behalf of the Emperor Ferdinand III., whose death, in Hyde's opinion, would be "agreeable to none but the Cardinal and Cromwell." And yet means were in some way found to pay for "intelligence"; in one instance, at all events, according to a very respectable rate. The system of political spies is amply illustrated in these pages; and a pretty twofold picture of injured, though not uncomplaining, innocence might be composed out of the adventures of Sir Robert Walsh and Colonel Bampfield. A very uncertain source of income was the extraction of money, humorously called "milk," from disaffected Englishmen by the friendly authorities in the Spanish Netherlands; indeed, it was not till 1657 that the Governor, Don John of Austria, invited Charles and his brothers to Brussels. The "King of Scots at Bruges" and his brother the Duke of York had hitherto chiefly depended on the good offices of their sister the Princess of Orange; but she was really powerless since the Act of Seclusion, and Cromwell would probably, but for the unwillingness of France, have included the States-General in the anti-Spanish alliance. The hopes which were founded by the Royalists upon the loyal sympathies of the fleet were probably exaggerated; though it is clear, from the measures taken by the Government against the circulation among the crews of "abusive and derisive" pamphlets, that it felt some uneasiness on the subject. But at all events there could have been no grounds for the notion that it might be advantageous to "probe Blake." He was naturally of an independent character, and as a sailor, of course, had his grievances against the Admiralty Commissioners and the head of the Government; but there was no likelihood of his playing a double game, such as that which the petty officers of the ship the Adventure expected from their captain. (This latter worthy's opinion of Oliver Cromwell perhaps hardly deserved quoting by Mrs. Green in her preface.) Early in 1657 a difference broke out between Charles and his brother concerning Sir John Berkeley, one of the King's followers, which seems to have spread, or to have been reported to have spread, its disintegrating influence as far as England. While at the Hague it was attempted to arrange a marriage for the Duke of York, Charles proposed to the Council at Brussels a consolidation with his levies of all the English, Scotch, and Irish troops in the Spanish service, so that a force might be formed which he might in person lead across the Channel. But the further prosecution of this design belongs to a later point of time than that reached by the present volume.

Among matters of miscellaneous interest to which reference is made in it, one or two may be mentioned in conclusion. The revision of the Authorized Version, which a Committee was in January 1657 appointed to consider, is occasionally alluded to in the correspondence calendared by Mrs. Green; but, unless we mistake, she neither mentions the subject in her preface, nor directs attention to it by any special heading in the index. By the way, the index heading "Bible, quotations from, 70," fails to exhaust the number of ornamental Scripture phrases and names which occur in the text. The language of a letter from Charles Longland to Vice-Admiral Baddiley is particularly refreshing, though in substance it is mundane enough, inveighing against Portugal with the vigour of manufacturing censors of the Congo Treaty, suggesting the annexation of Oran, and commending a shipment of old Saragossa wine, "a cup of which, in raw cold weather, will not be amiss." Of literary or quasi-literary names we have in this volume only come across (besides Hyde's) that of the Marquis of Newcastle, the language of whose letter concerning the marriage of "an old friend and neighbour" is truly deplorable. University intelligence is mainly furnished by Joseph Williamson's correspondents at Queen's College, Oxford, who find themselves, under the Commissioners for the Reformation of the Universities, fallen upon dry and supperless times. One of them reports Dr. Wilkins to be "the rising sun since his marriage with the Protector's sister." There are, however, a few other items of academical information. Dr. Horton is to be allowed to hold his Divinity Professorship and Public Readership at Gresham College, "his marriage notwithstanding." The University of Glasgow obtains a new charter, with an increase of revenue to meet the expense of new buildings which have since gone the way of the old. From Scotland, too, a number of Doctors of Physic petition for the establishment of a College of Physicians in Edinburgh, such as about a generation later was to be actually accomplished. Lastly, the "new College" at Durham is mentioned more than once; the patent which established it as a University was, however, not granted till the month with which this Calendar closes. But not the least interesting, although involuntary, contribution to the history of education in this volume will be found in the letters of Lady Lowther to her son's tutor Joseph Williamson, who was conducting, or seeking to conduct, her son's education abroad. She writes with much good sense, though in no sanguine spirit. And herein she was well advised, as a letter to the tutor from his pupil himself, with an extract from which we conclude, may seem to signify:—

The past I shall bury in oblivion, but I have heard from friends every word that you have written to my father, which is not what I should have thought; I hope you will lay by past oversights, and send me, with other things, something worthy my father's acceptance, which I may send him next term. I am going into chambers in the Temple. Do not make me incur my father's displeasure further. You know what lies upon it, which is no slight business.

HEALTH EXHIBITION HANDBOOKS.*

AMONG the actual results of the opening of the Health Exhibition not the least important is the issue of a series of official handbooks, now in course of publication, that practically illustrate the science of health in all its manifold aspects. Not alone is the public health of great cities, or the hygienic view of the subject, considered; other cognate subjects, such as the water supply, the fire brigade, the art of cookery, the chemistry and dietetic value of the various drinks and food, the management of the sick, ambulance organization, athletics and dress, are embraced in the official scheme. The general excellence of the first instalment of these handbooks promises well for the value and completeness of the series; while the price at which they are issued, varying from one to two shillings, should assure the success they merit. In Health in the Village Dr. Acland unfolds some of the results of his large experience of the progress of sanitation in country villages during the past thirty years, and in an interesting narrative contrasts, with dramatic skill, the sanitary condition of a village community of the past and present. His picture of Lowmarsh possesses the great merit of being free from the high colour of sensational touches, and the practical lesson he inculcates is admirably forcible and lucid. Such cases of fever epidemics in villages as desolated Terling in Essex and Marnton in Devon are illustrated afresh in Dr. Acland's account of his inspection of Horwood in 1858. The chief attraction of the handbook lies, however, in the value of the remedial suggestions offered, the observations on the construction and drainage of cottages, the water supply, the education and recreation of the inhabitants—all of which are characterized by sound sense and shrewd observation, and accompanied by excellent illustrative plans.

Mr. Berdmore treats the subject of cooking with discrimination and independence, obviously holding individual views of some matters, e.g. the making of a salad, where unanimity of procedure is neither possible nor desirable. The arrangement of his book is commendable and novel, being a grammar of the art, the principia of which are defined with precision and finish; so that no cook who follows Mr. Berdmore's practical directions can wander from the clear path of orthodoxy.

None of the handbooks before us surpasses in value, or more fully meets a current demand, than Miss Wood's observations on the food and nurture of infants and the dietary of invalids. While her work especially appeals to mothers and the rearing of their offspring, it is full of timely counsel to invalids, and particularly to dyspeptics, who would undoubtedly benefit by adhering to the simple and sensible rules here laid down. The fruits of Miss Wood's experience in the superintendence of the Children's Hospital in Ormond Street are very fully and practically manifested in this excellent little book, to which Dr. Cheadle has contributed an introduction on the digestive powers of infants and the chemical constituents of their fitting food.

All visitors to the Health Exhibition must have been struck by the display made by the Water Companies, and the many interesting features in connexion with it. Professor Attfield's brochure is an admirable guide to the subject, and treats exhaustively the important question of the water supply, besides dealing with the various aërated waters and unfermented beverages that are so popular. In discussing the virtues of tea and coffee the writer affirms that the consumption of the latter has decreased to one-half within the past thirty years in Great Britain. Notorious as it is that this country is more addicted to tea than coffee, we should have welcomed statistics in support of this statement. Professor Attfield also observes, "A mixture of tea is generally desirable; a grocer who knows his business can be trusted to properly 'blend' his teas." Few drinkers of what are called fine teas will, we think, assent to the first proposition, and we fear, from considerable experience, that not many grocers produce irreproachable blends.

In dealing with the subject of "Healthy Schools" Mr. Paget has not over-estimated its importance among sanitary questions, and it is to be hoped that the practical illustration of the question by buildings in the Exhibition will yet be effected. The chief elements of health in schools are fully and succinctly considered by Mr. Paget, and not the construction, ventilation, and general arrangements merely, but also the nature and equipment of the playgrounds and the administration of school infirmaries.

Wanderers in Old London, as reproduced at South Kensington, may have observed specimens of the primitive appliances for extinguishing fires in vogue two centuries ago; these curious devices are not more suggestive when compared with a modern engine than Captain Eyre Shaw's account of the formation of the London Fire Brigade is illustrative of the last half-century's progress. Captain Shaw's handbook displays great breadth of view and comprehensive grasp, and is eminently readable for the clearness of its style and the interest of the subject. His remarks on the fallacy of fire-proof structures, on the insubstantial nature of modern buildings, and on the dangers of iron and stone, should receive careful attention.

Ambulance organization, military and naval, is the subject of an excellent handbook by Surgeon-Major Evatt, the real value of which is but little indicated in the author's diffident preface. It is something more than a mere guide to the casual visitor to the Exhibition, and though only a compilation, is skilfully compacted and well written; it is fully illustrated throughout by woodcuts reproduced, and in some cases reduced, from various sources. The history of the movement that found its full expression in the Geneva Convention and the institution of the various Red Cross Societies is briefly told by way of preface to the main subject of the book, which omits no detail in the vast organization of the National Aid Society and the elaborate machinery of equipment and transport used in the field. The handbook is a valuable addition to the literature of the Health Exhibition and of no transient interest.

GARDEN LORE.*

THERE are few pleasures to be named more healthy, more refining, or more perennial than that of flower-gardening. It supplies culture to the most delicate of the senses; it gives exercise to the faculties of curiosity, imagination, and wonder, and, as Mr. Darwin has abundantly shown us, it opens up a field of infinite expansion even for the higher powers of the intellect. Not a few of the greatest minds have found their chief solace and never-failing delight in the society of flowers. How characteristic of Bacon's whole genius is the quaint saying that God Almighty first planted a garden—"and indeed it is the purest of human pleasures." The perfect laying out of a garden is, in truth, among the noblest efforts of genius. Merely to scatter seeds, or to plant trees and shrubs haphazard, whatever their variety, rarity, or individual beauty, is as far removed from the true principles of floriculture as to parcel out the ground with rule and compass into the conventional patterns and mathematical monstrosities known as carpet-bedding. We are glad to see a wholesome reaction setting in against the pedantic extravagances for some years past in fashion, and a recurrence to the simpler, more natural, and therefore purer and more satisfying arrangement of the old English garden.

Foremost amongst those who have helped to bring about this happy renascence of a natural style of gardening has been for years Mr. W. Robinson, the keynote of whose teaching is the simple principle that every district should have flower-gardens characteristic of itself, adapted to its soil, climate, and position. No stereotyped rule or form of arrangement can be laid down for indiscriminate application. What constitutes the special fitness of the layer-out of gardens is a kind of opportunism, the gift which gave Capability Brown his title to celebrity—a quick eye to the possibilities of any given site, a happy audacity in seizing every salient feature in the landscape, a crag here or a knoll there, a sunny slope, a meandering brook, a shoot of falling water, bringing in the resources of art not to supersede, but to enhance, the loveliness of nature. Mr. Robinson's latest volume, The English Flower Garden, in the compilation of which he acknowledges the aid of some threescore experts or connoisseurs in the practice of horticulture, has for its aim to reduce to system the means of making the flower-garden a reflex, as he puts it, of the world of beautiful plant life, in harmony with the local surroundings, and varied in succession so as to fall in with the exigencies or the capabilities of spring, summer, autumn, and winter. The greater portion of his book is devoted to setting forth the abounding wealth of flowers suited to the embellishment of our open-air spaces. An exhaustive list is given of all available flowering plants, arranged in the alphabetical order of their botanical names, illustrated by woodcuts liberal in point of number and drawn with correctness and elegance, the characteristics of each plant and flower being brought out as well to the eye as to the intelligence of the reader. We should have been glad to see a corresponding alphabetical catalogue of the vernacular names, for the use of the less scientific classes of the public, who are the most likely to consult the book. Preliminary to making use of the exhaustless store of floral treasures thus opened to the floriculturist comes the fundamental principle of selection and arrangement, to which Mr. Robinson applies himself in his introductory pages. For the essential quality of style in gardening the basis is to be found, he rightly insists, not in the fleeting and indefinable quality called taste, but in a certain fitness arising out of definite natural law. And nature in this, as in every other department of art, in her laws which form the irrefragable canons for our guidance, far from binding us with weary fetters, has the tenderness of a true mother. Within her rule there is the truest liberty and the most genuine enjoyment. After all the discussion upon the several styles of laying out gardens, the ultimate types to which we are brought face to face are two in number. One of these is to be described as the formal, strait-laced, and mechanical, projected from the designer's mind, drawn out by rule and line, with much of grandiose composition in marble, stone, or terra-cotta, with palatial terraces, waterfalls, sea-monsters, and soaring jets. The other starts with nature as a guide, relying upon her boundless wealth of floral resources, the hand of the artist or constructor as little as possible obtruding itself into the aspect of the landscape. There are, of course, positions, as our author fully allows, where the intrusion of architecture or embankments into the garden is justifiable, nay, necessary. In the typical examples he brings forward there are instances in which noble effects are produced by the tasteful employment of such accessories. Still, on the whole, the impression produced in most cases is that of regret at so much outlay of labour and racking of brain, the eye turning with a sense of relief to the simpler pictures in which nature has been left more free to work her will. Who will nowadays dispute the force with which our author speaks of the dismal effect produced by the formalistic theatrical scheme of the great fountains and terraces at Sydenham, the greatest modern example of the waste of enormous means in making hideous a noble stretch of natural scenery? At the same time he shows himself quite alive to the propriety and the beauty that can be produced where artificial adjuncts of this kind are introduced in judicious adaptation to the nature of the ground and with harmonious adjustment to the architecture of the mansion which they serve to embellish. In fact, we can hardly picture to ourselves any great palatial house which would not be shorn of half its effect if bereft of the appliances which are due to the genius of the architect and the sculptor. In the case of Thoresby Hall, our author's first example, as typical of the great houses of the present day, we are shown how the elaborate terrace hides whilst it is designed to protect the best view of the house, the artist to get a more pleasing sketch of it having been driven to the riverside below. Though it is not always desirable to choose the crest of a hill for a site, yet it seems to him doubtful if building the house partly into the slope as at Thoresby is the best way. Highclere, occupying a similar situation as to ground, forms an example, we agree with him, of the better fashion of having a quiet, open vista in front with ample room for every phase of gardening or tree-planting in the grounds spreading out on either side, or behind the house. Greenlands, by the Thames-side near Henley, the principal front a simple lawn sloping down to the water, comes, he thinks, nearer to our possibly perfect English flower-garden than any example he has to mention. At Clumber the view is cut off at many points by the formal pile of Sir C. Barry's architectural work. In Pendell Court, a beautiful old house ivy-clad and wreathed with roses, and unencumbered with terrace, fountain, or statue, we are invited to see the pattern of the English country mansion, a poem in building and in lawn. To this we should be inclined, for our part, to add as an alternative model Endeleigh Cottage, the lovely Devonshire seat of the Duke of Bedford, in which time has smoothed away whatever seemed artificial under Brown's designing hand; every jutting rock or fall of feathery spray seeming to fulfil its natural function in the pervading harmony. On a slighter scale we are shown the typical English cottage with garden and lawn in Gilbert White's characteristic retreat at Selborne, sketched in 1880, not essentially modified since the time of the distinguished naturalist. A glance at Charles Kingsley's Rectory at Eversley shows us a modest and charming, and simple as charming, type of garden, where house and grounds had been as unsatisfactory as was from a spiritual point of view the rest of the parish; the incoming rector in 1844 becoming his own engineer and landscape gardener. Professor Owen's garden at Sheen Lodge, Richmond, is finally cited as proving that the most attractive gardens are by no means the largest or the most pretentious.

Now it is not everybody who has the call, the ambition, or the purse to lay out grounds on the princely scale of Trentham, Eaton, or Witley Court. It is as a guide and helper to those whose modest wants have their limits within a few acres at the most that Mr. Robinson comes forward with his experience and his critical taste. The main point in practice is how the garden designer is to make the most of the inexhaustible treasure that nature places at his command. We have here in effect an illustrated catalogue of the British flora, acclimatized as well as indigenous. Since in this country the flower-garden must rely upon the vegetation that will stand rude vicissitudes of climate and temperature, precedence is here given to hardy plants, with rules for their arrangement, succession, and protection. The garden of sweet-smelling flowers, the garden of beautiful ferns, and the wild garden, have each a chapter full of useful hints and attractive illustrations. "Economy and wasted effort" forms a heading to much sensible advice specially suitable to amateurs in horticulture. Each separate season naturally calls for artistic and economic study of the flora adapted to it; but to the judicious and far-seeing florist the round of the whole year will be a matter for systematic contemplation, and both summer and winter bedding will be combined in his provision for keeping up in the garden a perennial current of life. Now that there is such a wealth of material in the shape of plants suited to the furnishing of flower-beds in winter, there can be no excuse for blank and barren patches after the summer bedding-plants have been cleared away. To neutralize the prevailing dulness of the winter season there is all the more need for making our gardens as bright and cheerful as possible. This has led to our practical botanists searching out and using as summer bedders many hardy plants which otherwise might have been passed over, but which are just as efficacious as tender exotics, nay, in some cases, as Mr. Robinson has found, more so, and which when planted in the spring serve till the spring following, when they are taken up, divided, and replanted for another year. If we can combine, as he contends we easily can, summer and winter bedding, then much of the opposition to formal parterre planting will cease, nor will any sensible florist grudge the labour and expense. The trouble indeed in this case should be a pleasure. What is here advocated is a sort of compromise between the claims of the seasons, a kind of giving and taking, a tender and a hardy system of bedding. A sketch of such a scheme as Mr. Robinson has in view will show what variety and abundance of material is at hand for the purpose:—

> For instance, in summer planting a goodly number of the more handsome and showier growing Conifers and other shrubs should be brought into use for the filling of vases, centres of beds, and as dot plants in the larger beds. Amongst the best plants for this purpose are Retinosporas, Thujas, Junipers, Cypresses, Biotas, Yuccas, standard Golden Yews, standard Cotoneasters, variegated Hollies, and Euonymuses. For lines and groundwork the following are most suitable, viz., Sedums of many kinds, Saxifrages, Sempervivums, Cerastium arvense, Mentha Pulegium gibraltarica, Veronica repens, V. incana, variegated Thyme, variegated Arabis, and others. These hardy plants being worked in with the summer arrangements, and, so far as my own experience goes, with evident improvement to the tenderer subjects, give so much the less labour when the time for the winter arrangement arrives, a few days at the most suffering for the clearing out of tender plants and replacing them with hardy ones. Amongst the best for taking the place of Pelargoniums, &c., are hardy Heaths, variegated Ivies, variegated Periwinkles, Cotoneasters, Berberis, Aucubas, variegated Box, variegated Euonymus, Lavender, common and variegated Thyme, Perusttyas, &c.

Under the veil of the initials "E. V. B.," which her dedication renders easily penetrable by those who are curious in the matter, a lady to whom we believe our young folks to be indebted for not a few of the most delightful of recent stories has brought together from the Gardener's Chronicle a series of charming articles, forming a kind of floral chronicle of the year. Akin both in conception and spirit to Colin Clout's Calendar, this little volume, instead of leading us on the ramble through the merry greenwood, amid the sights and sounds of uncultivated nature, bids us take our pleasure in trim gardens, and feast our senses upon the beauties and the scents which a few years of skilled and loving toil have enabled the writer to bring together as by magic out of what seemed but a barren and profitless wilderness. To the pleasant Year in a Lancashire Garden, or Milner's Country Pleasures, as we rather think the true title to have run, is due, we are told, the suggestion of recording in this alternative shape the triumphs and disappointments of another garden, growing in a more genial climate, which we shrewdly suspect to be that of Somersetshire, the site being identified by a reference to it in Evelyn's Diary, "as a very pretty seate in the forest, on a flat, with gardens exquisitely kept, though large, and the house a staunch old building," then tenanted by George Evelyn, cousin to the diarist. Remains of conventual buildings then existed on a considerable scale, and are spoken of as still traceable in part, though the house and grounds seem to have fallen into deplorable neglect and decay. Nothing of a garden at all events, we are told, survived here when our author, in 1871, took the place in hand as a playground, and with the help of a skilful gardener, and a love for flowers, of which she modestly speaks as unscientific, transformed the scene into the comparative paradise that her graphic pen portrays for our delectation and profit. Tastefully got up, in Queen Anne type, with hand-made paper, creamy vellum binding, rough edges, and daintily cut head and tail pieces, the little volume forms an ornament for the drawing-room or library table. Full of sympathy with the subject, E. V. B. throws the charm of personal association round her notices of flowers, shrubs, trees, and birds. Why October should be chosen by her as the opening point in her cycle of the year we are at a loss to conceive. But we gladly yield ourselves to her guidance as she takes us to the "Fantaisie," a tiny plantation with a breadth of flowers and young evergreen trees intermixed, gay with a profusion of her autumn favourites, girdled with close trimmed "yewen" hedges, to revive Spenser's delightful phrase, the three eastern gables of the old house all aflame with Virginian creeper. With November we pass on to chrysanthemums of varied hue and convolution, or make up a nosegay of crimson summer roses or gladiolus, auratum lily, a Welsh poppy, and a wondrous spray of flexuous honeysuckle that fills the room with its fragrance. If December yields us little save the Christmas rose to enliven the prevalent dulness or subdued verdure, nature fully makes up her tale of beauty with the silvery veil that the hoar frost spreads over gossamer webs and feathery foliage. We are surprised to find no heaths to break the green background of Deodara, Sequoia or Abies smithii, a lovely pine, whose robe of grey-blue tufted foliage wraps her feet and trails upon the grass. With the first burst of spring the garden wakes up to newness of life. Grand arums uprear their thick tall stems, crowned by spathes in spiral lines of perfect grace. The mystic roots of the briony, having lain hidden all the winter, respond to the call of the sun from heaven. "Is the white briony really the true mandrake?" our author wonders. The primrose and violet, crocus and hyacinth, chequer the beds and the sward with their manifold hues. The rooks, which have been at length tempted to make a home here, are busy with their nests, and the thrushes enliven the woods with their music. And so for hours, days, and months our kindly hostess or guide conducts us through a round of sights and sounds and scents, ever varying, yet ever fresh and pleasant. Justly proud of this Arcadia of her own creating, she deserves the warmest thanks of her readers for admitting them into literary companionship with her plans, her meditations, and her enjoyments.

OLDE FFRENDES WITH NEWE FACES.*

THIS is a successor to the Chap-Book Chaplets, with more of those "sutable sculptures," which we have recently noticed, by Mr. Crawhall. It contains nine "olde ffrendes," some of whom may prove on examination to be new friends. The story of the "Long Pack," for instance, which is not a ballad, but a narrative told in plain modern English, is excellent, and will no doubt be new to some readers. It is the tale of a pedlar who brings to a lonely country house left in charge of servants the most monstrous pack ever seen. Other packs the maid Alice had seen as long and others as broad, but none at once so long and so broad. The pedlar asks permission to leave the pack, since he is denied his request for a bed in the house. This is granted, and he goes away. Presently Alice, coming back to the room unheard, observes, with terror and amazement, the pack walking about, still apparently packed up. How she gives the alarm, how the gamekeeper fires into the pack and kills a stout fellow concealed in it, how the servants stand a siege of the house by the robber's companions, must be read. The ballad of "Lord Bateman" is illustrated in Mr. Crawhall's happiest style; the portrait of the Skipper, especially, is excellent, and we have seldom seen a better ship than that which he commands; the fidelity of the anchor and the ship's bell is alone worth the whole price of the book. The "Apparition of Mrs. Veal" may be commended for the illustrations, though we protest vehemently against the spoiling of Mrs. Bargrave's admirable portrait by a vulgar modern ejaculation written beneath. The "Morning" and "Evening" of the unfortunate poet John Cunningham, with his ode on "Newcastle Beer," are prefixed by a welcome notice of his life. The quality of the verse may be judged from the following specimen:—

'Twas Stingo like this made Alcides so bold,
It braced up his nerves and enlivened his pow'rs;
And his mystical club that did wonders of old
Was nothing, my lads, but such liquor as our's.
The horrible crew
That Hercules slew
Were Poverty, Calumny, Trouble and Fear;
Such a club would you borrow,
To drive away sorrow,
Apply for a Jorum of Newcastle Beer.

The story of "Ducks and Green Peas," which is not only told in verse but also dramatized, is of a kind which has by this time long since lost whatever fun it may once have possessed. But the history which follows—that of "Andrew Robinson Stoney Bowes, Esq."—is certainly strange, and worthy of reproduction. It may be observed that no novelist has ever yet dared to present a villain who comes anywhere near this remarkable monster of wickedness. Thackeray made an attempt at portraying this very personage in fiction; but Barry Lyndon is virtuous compared with Andrew Robinson Stoney Bowes, who soared to heights of wickedness beyond the reach of Thackeray. There are yet fields unexplored for the adventurous writer of fiction. And if Mr. Crawhall has any other stories as interesting as the "Long Pack" and the life and exploits of Mr. Bowes, we shall be glad to welcome another volume of "Olde Ffrendes" from him.

GERMAN LITERATURE.

THE Life of Mohammed (1) is no doubt destined to be frequently investigated ere East and West are thoroughly in accordance respecting it. A general approximation of opinion is however visible, and it is a great merit in Herr Krehl's modest volume to express this with precision and conciseness. The world of Orientalism has come to the view formulated by one who perhaps could not read a word of any Oriental language. Genius, insight, a fellow-feeling with greatness, and consistent adherence to the sound maxim that guided Carlyle long ago to the conclusion now enforced by Herr Krehl and accepted by most dispassionate persons. Mohammed was no impostor. He believed in his mission, and his belief was not unfounded. As a great religious reformer—the Luther of his age and race—he is entitled to sincere veneration; as a religious visionary he was upright and sincere. But he was also a prince and a warrior, and in these capacities he almost inevitably succumbed to the temptation of making his revelation an engine of policy. This is a stain upon the purity of his character, but it would be most unjust to try him by the standard of those teachers who have kept aloof from public life. The more exclusively his character and doctrine are judged by a Semitic standard, the fairer they appear; but this is only another way of saying that the latter has no universal character, and that the former comes very short of the ideal of humanity. It may be hoped that the diffusion of Western culture in the East, by acquainting Orientals with a different standard, will gradually open their eyes to the partial and imperfect character of Mohammedanism, even as a better acquaintance with Oriental literature and modes of thought has relieved Europeans of many of their ancient prejudices. The eighteenth century, with its fixed disbelief in the genuineness of enthusiastic sentiment, treated Mohammed no better than it treated Moses; just and impartial views are an acquisition of our own day. Herr Krehl has been to the traditional sources of anecdote and legend respecting Mohammed, and acknowledges that his conception of the prophet's character is largely derived from them. His own narrative is distinguished by perfect simplicity and lucidity, it commands assent by the author's evident mastery over his materials, and charms by the absence of affectation and pretentiousness. It condenses a vast amount of information into a narrow compass, and yet never reads like a mere epitome. The author's rigid restriction of his composition to his theme is so far a disadvantage that his predecessors are never alluded to. We should have been glad to have known his opinion of Muir and Sprengel. A succeeding volume is to contain his exposition of Mohammed's teaching.

Never from lips of cunning fell
The thrilling Delphic oracle—

It might have been deemed impossible to produce another really original book of travel in so tourist-ridden a country as Norway (2). Herr Passarge, however, has shown that something remained to be noted by a discriminating observer of man and nature. His book is excellent, bright, racy, entertaining, and at the same time one from which the reader seems to be continually learning. Without pretence of fine writing or over-elaborated word-painting, his pictures convey a clear and lively impression of the characteristics of Norwegian natural scenery, especially when its marine aspects are in question. As an observer of manners and an inquirer into the resources of the country he is suggestive and instructive. He predicts a great future for Norway as a cattle-rearing country when agricultural science shall have so far progressed there as to allow of cattle being fed throughout the winter, but doubts whether the necessary capital will be forthcoming so long as the fisheries continue as lucrative as at present.

The title of Dr. Krebs's publication on the practical applications of physical science (3) is hardly sufficiently expressive of its extremely useful character. It is, in fact, a collection of thirteen treatises by distinguished specialists on the most important recent applications of scientific discovery to practical ends. Among the most interesting subjects treated are photography, the spectroscope, electro-motive power, and the galvano-plastic art; while especial importance attaches to discussions of the future of the telephone and the probable issue of the battle between gas and electricity. The volume should be particularly interesting to English men of science on account of the numerous descriptions of German inventions it contains.

A third edition of Friedrich von Hellwald's history of civilization is called for (4), and the writer has shown a laudable diligence in bringing it up to the level of contemporary requirements. It is not unnatural that he should cherish the fond expectation of being found among those who will be recorded as having opened new paths for modern thought, and even hint that perhaps his name will be found not very remote from Darwin's. Such an expectation appears to us most chimerical. Not only is Herr von Hellwald's philosophical creed a gloomy pessimism, the general acceptance of which, if attended by its logical results, would bring the march of culture which he chronicles to a speedy termination; but his advocacy of his views has neither the argumentative power nor the piquancy of expression needful to render them convincing or popular. As a thinker he has neither force nor originality. The merits of his book are of quite another order; the praise we refuse to the speculator we can accord to the compiler. He possesses a remarkable talent for marshalling and co-ordinating facts; he carries his reader swiftly over extensive historical periods, and leaves him possessed of accurate and serviceable knowledge, well digested and well arranged. As a compendium of facts bearing upon the history of culture the work is entitled to high praise, and would have been still better if it had been less ambitious.

"The History of the Family," by Julius Lippert (5), is a well-arranged compendium of a subject on which volumes might be written. It is certainly by no means exhaustive, but aims at conveying the essence of the matter. The particular point of view under which the subject has presented itself to Herr Lippert is the various aspects in which family continuity has been regarded at different epochs of civilization. In primitive times, mainly from the idea common to uncivilized races that the blood is the man, the mother was regarded as the pivot of the family and transmitter of hereditary right. Traces of this idea are found in some English legal customs at this day, and the Ottoman Sultan is still succeeded by his nephews. The development of the paternal idea is the subject of the second section of Herr Lippert's treatise; and in the third he examines the actual condition of the family as an institution among the Germanic races. He points out convincingly that all prospect of further progress depends upon adherence to the German principle of individualism, and how fatal would be the mistake of retrograding to the collectivism which even Slavonic communities are beginning to outgrow.

The first part of a treatise on woman, social and physiological (6), contains ample details from both points of view, and as seven more parts are to follow, the treatment of the subject promises to be exhaustive. The opinions of the best authorities respecting the special characteristics of woman, such as the weight and texture of the brain, and the inferences to be deduced from them, are discussed at considerable length; many curious physiological facts are stated on the authority of travellers, and the writer has even ventured upon the delicate undertaking of appreciating the comparative female beauty of the various regions of the earth, omitting, however, both our countrywomen and his own.

Dr. Spir (7) candidly confesses in the preface to his collected works that these writings have as yet failed to excite the attention of the public. The fault, he thinks, is not his, and with true philosophical dignity and composure he addresses himself to a new attempt. For this he has, at all events, the justification of having something to say. His views are frequently original, and his style, though quite unaffected and unostentatious, is highly individual, and as lucid as the abstract character of his theme permits. He has several acute and penetrating criticisms, as when he opposes the notion that our inability to discern more than the succession of phenomena warrants disbelief in causality. So far as we can follow him, his system would appear to be a kind of Dualism. He strongly denies that the Unconditioned is the sole cause of the conditioned, and must therefore assert the existence of some other ground of phenomena.

Dr. von Gizycki (8), the author of an esteemed work on the philosophy of Shaftesbury, has gained the prize for the best essay on the principles of ethics proposed by the Lessing Society, and adjudged by no less distinguished arbiters than Herman Grimm, Lasker, and W. Scherer. Sixty-five essays were submitted to these eminent men, and we trust were duly read by them. Dr. Gizycki's will be quite enough for the public. He has wisely preferred commonplace to paradox, and conducts his readers by beaten paths to self-approval and the summum bonum.

The earlier and more interesting half of Franz Grillparzer's life (9) has been attractively and faithfully recorded by himself, but there was still sufficient room for Heinrich Laube's simple and concise biography. Not only was Grillparzer's existence prolonged for thirty-five years beyond the date at which his autobiography concludes, but his manuscripts have been found to include diaries, notes of occurrences, self-appreciations, and other biographical memoranda of importance. These, carefully preserved by his cousin, Baron von Rizo, have been placed in the hands of Herr Laube, who has displayed sound judgment and discrimination in his manner of dealing with them, leaving the poet as much as possible to speak for himself, while his own observations are always to the point. Grillparzer's latter years were uneventful, and the most important additions to his autobiography are his journal of a tour in Turkey and Greece in 1843, and the account of the pleasant Indian summer of his fame after the disturbances of 1848; when a patriotic song made him as much the favourite of the ruling classes as he had previously been their aversion; and his forgotten dramas were revived one after the other with unfailing success. The records of his early years are enriched with several new traits, and we obtain on the whole a vivid picture of the contrasts of magnanimity and peevishness, true humanity and timid selfishness, intellectual vigour and old bachelor-like whimsies that characterized the chief dramatic poet of Austrian Hungary.

"Fourteen Years with Adelina Patti" (10) is appropriate to the subject in exterior elegance and prettiness, but belongs to the wholly condemnable class of literary manufacture which works up the intimate details of private life into a mass of savourless or scandalous gossip for the gratification of the vulgar. There is just enough of the element of scandal to prove that the publication of this stuff is not countenanced by Mme. Patti herself, and thus refute the only surmise which could seriously affect her reputation. For the rest, it can only be regretted that such demand should exist for the tattle of discarded retainers as to render it worth any publisher's while to dress it up so handsomely for the market.

Salomon Hirzel's bibliography of Goethe (11) was last published in 1874. Since this period abundance of new matter has accumulated, the scope of the work including not merely Goethe's own writings, but the mass of critical matter relating to him, and the endless publications of newly-discovered letters, forgotten reviews, and personal and literary souvenirs of all sorts. The last years have been peculiarly prolific in this kind of addition to Goethe literature; and, although strictly confined to Germany, the Hirzel bibliography extends over 215 pages, an extent due not only to the number of publications catalogued, but to the fulness and minuteness of description in the case of even the most insignificant articles.

Dr. Ebering's bibliographical advertiser of books and articles relating to the languages and literature of the Latin nations (12) is an exceedingly valuable publication. The list comprises everything that has appeared, from extensive works down to letters and paragraphs in periodicals; and will be found indispensable by students of the rich literature of this class of languages.

F. Hirsch's history of German literature (13) has progressed to the time of the Minnesingers.

The un-Teutonic appellation of M. E. delle Grazie (14) denotes or disguises a writer of really Teutonic spirit, who has chosen a subject dear to German patriotic feeling as the theme of a vigorous epic. The writer's language and versification are full of energy; but the thoughts are in general commonplace, and too much of the poem is either conventional description or hollow though sonorous declamation. This writer's thorough belief in herself and her hero is the chief redeeming point; the glorification of everything German is not unbecoming in a national epic, but by dint of constant reiteration becomes tedious.

Of three attractive little volumes added to the Bibliothek für Ost und West (15) only one has any special pretensions to literary merit. This is Alfred Friedmann's "Legends of Life," slight productions, but for the most part pretty, graceful, and clever. "By the Way" and "Leaves in the Wind" are very fair light reading, but have the aspect of reprints from Household Words or Chambers's Journal.

Ossip Schubin's excellent novel, Among Ourselves, is concluded in the Rundschau (16). It deserves to rank among the best examples of the cosmopolitan style of fiction of which Mr. James's novels perhaps afford the most typical examples in our language, while in the early chapters there is enough delineation of national manners to show that the author may become a representative Slavonic novelist if he chooses. The contemporary of Major Schill, who comes forward to give the intimate history of his celebrated partisan campaign, appears almost like a spirit from the grave. He is, in fact, an old Prussian officer who died in 1868 at upwards of fourscore. Herman Grimm describes the great Berlin edition of the works of Albert Dürer now in progress; Professor Seuffert sketches the leading points of the codification of Justinian; and Professor Jolly recounts his interviews with pundits and conveys his general impressions of the sacred city of Benares. All European grammars, except Bühler's, he says, mislead the student as to the pronunciation of Sanscrit.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE eighth and last volume of the Memoirs of Prince Metternich has appeared (1). It begins in the midst of the disturbances of 1848, when Metternich had to take refuge in England, and ends with his death eleven years later. As before, there is much that is instructive, and even not a little that is amusing, in the book. But it is impossible not to feel that its publication on such a gigantic scale has been a mistake. Five or six thousand unusually large and closely-printed pages are more than the world will willingly allow even to a man so industrious, so distinguished, and concerned in so many important transactions as Metternich. If his own copious diary had been subjected to a process of selection, if the Princess Mélanie's amiable, but somewhat garrulous, journal had been compressed (for instance, such statements as "Ma santé commence à s'altérer. J'ai dû m'adresser à plusieurs médecins anglais. Malheureusement je ne puis pas dire qu'ils m'inspirent confiance" are surely not very important at this time of day), and if in place of printing all the voluminous State papers and minutes which, long after he had been driven from power, the aged statesman pleased himself by drawing up almost daily, the more weighty only had been given, and the rest dealt with by way of extract or précis, a manageable book would have resulted. As it is, not many but professed historical students are likely to get through it or turn to it later.

M. de Baillon's useful and creditable volumes on Henrietta Maria (2), which are for different reasons equally interesting to English and to French readers, have reached a second edition.

(1) Mémoires du Prince de Metternich. Par le Prince Richard de Metternich et M. A. de Klinkowström. Tome VIII. Paris: Plon.

(2) Henriette Marie de France, reine d'Angleterre—Lettres inédites de Henriette Marie de France. Par le Comte de Baillon. Paris: Didier.

M. Hippeau's indefatigable labours on the history of State-regulated education in France and elsewhere have resulted in the publication of yet another volume dealing with the debates on the subject in the Constituent and Legislative Assemblies (3). The book is done with much care, and the combination of extract and abstract is well managed. There is also a good appendix of biographical notices (far from unnecessary in the case of the less famous députies) and an excellent index. It is, perhaps, treason to suggest that the subject is scarcely worth the expenditure of such good gifts.

If anybody wishes to see the very latest thing in "advanced" reviews, he may gratify himself by reading La revue indépendante (4), started last month in Paris. Here an unknown person glorifies materialism, and M. Edmond de Goncourt gives a little story, and M. Edgar Monteil shows to his own satisfaction that there is no room in Europe for a religious nation, and M. J. K. Huysmans writes about painters (we have known him write about many worse things), and M. Henry Céard (all our old friends!) writes a chronique, and there is an odd little appendix, giving lists of persons who drive "mails coaches" and other "high life" details. It is a funny little periodical, and, truth compels us to add, a very badly printed one.

If we notice M. Leroy's Guide du duelliste indélicat (5) it is not on account of M. Leroy. To be frank, he has spoiled a good subject by an excessive extravagance of the kind which "extravagues" (as his countrymen would say) into sheer dulness, and by much perfectly unnecessary vulgarity. We do not mean the peculiar license of phrase and subject which French opinion allows, though English opinion does not; but a coarseness which has no excuse. But the illustrations are very good now and then, and rarely otherwise than good. "Uzès" has drawn his tiny figures (they are, as a rule, about an inch long) with a correctness and at the same time a fancy and a spirit which are very far from common; and the amount of composition he has got into designs often not bigger than a penny piece is remarkable.

M. Daudet wishes his sons to read Sapho (6) when they are twenty. It will certainly do them no harm to wait so long; it will not do them much if they wait a little longer. The book is the history of the irregular, but for a time constant and after a fashion passionate, affection of a young man for a courtesan years older than himself, who for a long time is frantically attached to him, but at last leaves him in the lurch. That it is written with power, and that it avoids the grosser faults of the Naturalist school, need hardly be said; but it may be more necessary to say that M. Daudet, despite some apparent liberties with real persons, has not sinned so flagrantly in point of personality as he has sometimes done. As a novel of purpose, which from the above-quoted wish it seems to be, it is not very clear that Sapho will do much good; as a work of art it fails because the hero is left very much of a lay figure, and the heroine is drawn from the outside. Both the moral and the work of art are better represented in some passages of Gavarni's writing quoted in MM. de Goncourt's Life of him. We have seen a comparison of the book to Manon Lescaut, which, if it had appeared elsewhere than where it did appear, would have convinced us that the critic had never read Manon. As a contrast, not a comparison, it may not be uninstructive to read the two together. Few critics will have much difficulty in deciding that Prévost's work is one of genius; M. Daudet's one of talent merely; and the reason of the distinction is quite clear. The voluminous Abbé in that immortal book struck deep down to the realities of human nature; M. Daudet has at best observed its outside, and has mingled not a little convention with his observation.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

THE Lues Boswelliana is an excellent thing in a biographer, but not too much of it. Now in Mr. Macgeorge, author of a memoir of the late Mr. Leitch (Blackie & Son), this infirmity, if it is an infirmity, of the biographer is at times too obvious. He applies the adjective "great" to his hero somewhat lavishly, and in one passage he runs a comparison between him and Turner which might make the scoffer to chuckle. Allowing for these signs of excessive zeal, his life of the Scotch landscape painter is commendable. If it will not persuade anybody that Mr. Leitch was more than a clever sketcher, and a charming person for an amateur to learn drawing from, it does show that he was an honourable and lovable man. There is something very healthy in the history of Mr. Leitch's early fight with poverty and every kind of obstacle as a scene painter to bankrupt Scotch theatres. His work was certainly none the worse because he and his wife lived for years on fifteen shillings a week, very irregularly earned, with the determination never to owe a penny, and never to eat a meal till they had earned it. A high standard of probity in money matters is not necessarily a cause of good work in art; but then there are persons who seem to think that the converse of the proposition is true.

We have met Mr. Evans before as a translator of Heine's prose, and in that character we entertain a considerable respect for him. As a biographer and critic he is less admirable. His introductory essay to The Memoirs of Heinrich Heine (Bell & Sons), which takes up the larger half of this book, might well have been spared. It tells us nothing to the purpose about the poet, but a good deal about Mr. Evans's point of view. This is the view of many estimable persons, who cannot accept the hard truth that a man of letters is great by the artistic quality of his writing and because of his literary probity, not by his moral character. He cannot acknowledge that, though Heine wrote prose and verse which will live for ever, yet there was in him much of the natural man, who is a sinful creature. Consequently he is always trying to show that the poet was really a man of many domestic virtues. This method leads Mr. Evans astray in two ways. In the first it causes him to utter certain opinions on matters of conduct which are at least eccentric. He is quite piously angry with Heine's cousins, who were base enough to dislike being made a laughing-stock to all Europe. Now even obscure persons who are not poets and satirists are still our fellow-men, and may reasonably defend themselves. On the whole, too, he is, for so moral a critic, singularly ready to show that his man lied on occasion. Mr. Evans is, besides, so busy in making Heine a reputable citizen that he quite forgets to try and judge his literary workmanship; and that is, after all, not the least of a critic's duties.

In the Tennessee Mountains, by C. C. Craddock (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin, & Co. London: Trübner & Co.), is a collection of tales of American life very full of an uncouth local dialect. As stories they have no interest to speak of, and the dialect is very destitute of grace and colour. Mr. Craddock writes in a feminine spirit. He seems mostly concerned to show that women are much the best half of humanity, which no man will be ungallant enough to deny, and then to prove that forgiveness of those who trespass against us is a virtuous thing. So it is, but not when it is carried to the length of encouraging brutes of various kinds. Mr. Craddock teaching by example carries it to that length.

Mr. R. Pike's Railway Adventures and Anecdotes (Hamilton, Adams, & Co.) is a very fatiguing kind of book. It is a collection of cuttings from newspapers, books, and speeches which have any connexion direct or indirect with railways.

We will honestly confess that we have not read Mr. M. L. O'Byrne's novel, Ill-Won Peerages; or, an Unhallowed Union (Dublin: Gill & Son). On dipping into it we found Irish patriotism, Irish rant about the Irish Parliament and independence, and Irish rave against England. This sort of thing does not need to be read before being judged.

The fourth volume of Present Day Tracts (The Religious Tract Society) contains six essays by religious writers of more or less mark. One of them is of course a criticism of Renan.

The Rev. J. Edmond Long publishes another pamphlet on outcast London. This time it is The Hopeful Cry (Skeffington & Son). Mr. Long gives his notion how we ought to try and modify the inevitable consequences of over-population and human weakness.

The tenth number of the Trinity College, Dublin, learned magazine, Hermathena (Dublin: Hodges, Figgis, & Co. London: Longmans & Co.) is full of papers on classical literary subjects. Vol. VII. of the Transactions of the Cumberland and Westmoreland Antiquarian and Archæological Society (Kendal: T. Wilson) contains, among other things, a paper of interesting extracts from the "Paine Book" of the parish of Watermillock during the seventeenth century which illustrate the local government of England under the Stuarts. The Fifth Annual Report of the "Archæological Institute of America" (Cambridge: Wilson & Son) is a well-printed account of what the institution has done to further both classical and American archæology in late years. It contains a very curious account of the strange Indian civilization of Arizona and New Mexico. The English Dialect Society publish two glossaries, one of English Words of the Eighteenth Century, and one of Hampshire Words and Phrases (Trübner & Co.) Mr. Axon edits the first, the second is edited and compiled by the Rev. Sir William Cope. We have received No. 3 of the fourth volume of a very prettily illustrated magazine called The Outing (London: Iliffe & Son. Boston: The Wheelman Co.); and also numbers of the Manhattan (New York and London), an American magazine with a curiously thin specimen of American engraving as its frontispiece. And finally, the Andover Magazine (Ward, Lock, & Co.), a religious and theological monthly. The speechifying, processions, and so forth at the Edinburgh University Tercentenary are collected for the admiration of posterity by Mr. R. Sydney Marsden (Blackwood & Sons).

LONDON GOVERNMENT BILL.—CHARTER for W...
MINSTER At a MEETING held at the Town Hall, Westminster, on Friday, ... 1884 H BOWMAN STINK, Esq., in the Chair, it was proposed by L. BRAWN, seconded by the Right Hon W. H SMITH, M.P., supported by CHARLES MUSGROVE, the Lord ALGERNON PERCY, M.P. and the Lord GEORGE HAMILTON M.P., and Resolved "That in the opinion of this Meeting of the Ratepayers of Westminster, the London Government Bill would, if passed into law, prove fatal to local independence by creating a huge system of centralisation highly detrimental to the interests and liberties of the people; and further, that the history, wealth and requirements of this City afford a just ground for claiming a charter of incorporation as a safeguard of its municipal liberties
It was also proposed by O. E COOPER, Esq., M.P., seconded by W. E. M TOMLINSON, Esq., M.P. and Resolved—
That the necessary steps be taken to give effect to the foregoing Resolution and that the Chairman be empowered to sign a petition to Parliament against the Bill"

LONDON GOVERNMENT BILL.—At a PUBLIC MEETING of the RATEPAYERS of ST MARYLEBONE, duly convened and held at the new Hall Lower Seymour street on Tuesday June 17, 1884 PHILIP WILKINSON, Esq., Churchwarden, in the Chair, it was proposed by the Rev Professor MARKS, seconded by Mr INDAN and Resolved
That this meeting of Ratepayers of the Parish of St Marylebone, having met to consider the Bill introduced into Parliament for the better government of London, and for other purposes connected therewith, hereby expresses its decided disapproval of a measure which practically abolishes Local Self-Government, and invests a Central Board with enormous powers, which would be likely to engender much abuse, and be impracticable for the proper government of a population of upwards of four millions of persons
That this Meeting is of opinion that the governing principle of the Bill involves the virtual annihilation of Local Self Government and considers that if brought into operation it would cause great increase in the rates and expenditure, and decrease in the personal care and supervision on the part of those who have hitherto as local authorities occupied themselves in the local government of the metropolis"

LONDON GOVERNMENT BILL.—At a PUBLIC MEETING of RATEPAYERS held at the Myddelton Hall, Islington on Friday June 13, 1884, to consider the London Government Bill, J. B PRIOR Esq J.P. in the chair, it was moved by Mr J. M MOTE, seconded by Mr J. F OSWALD, and Resolved by an overwhelming majority:—
That the Government of London Bill, if passed, will vest in a Central Council of 240 members the government of the whole Metropolis will be destructive of the principle of Local Self Government and will tend to extravagance in Expenditure, and that the Chairman be requested to sign a petition against the Bill"

LONDON GOVERNMENT BILL.—At a crowded PUBLIC MEETING held at the Royal Park Lecture Hall Camden Town, on Saturday, June 14 1884 to consider the provisions of the London Government Bill, Mr Churchwarden WESTMACOTT in the Chair, the following Resolution was adopted:—
That this Meeting while acknowledging the necessity of reform in municipal administration, is of opinion that the best mode of promoting the same is by the development of Local Self Government which the London Government Bill practically destroys; that the Metropolis is far too large and its interests of its inhabitants much too varied to admit of any one body of 240 men exercising efficient and economic supervision over the requirements and administration of every parish"

Accumulated Funds	£2,800,000

NORTHERN FIRE and LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY.
ESTABLISHED 1836.
ABERDEEN—3 KING STREET. LONDON—1 MOORGATE STREET.
Accumulated Funds, £3,800,000.

The Forty-eighth Annual General Meeting of the Company was held within their house at Aberdeen, on Friday, June 13, 1884, when the Directors' Report was adopted, and a Dividend of £1 per share, free of Income-tax, was declared.

The following are extracts from the Report submitted :—

FIRE DEPARTMENT.

The Premiums received last year amounted to £320,202 16s. 8d., which, compared with £468,196 6s. 10 the previous year, show the substantial increase of £50,056 12s. 9d. A noteworthy feature of this increase is that it is spread in satisfactory proportions over all the main sections of the Company's business.

The Losses, though not so heavy as in 1882, were again above the average, and amounted to £236,186 17s. 3d., or 69·67 per cent. of the Premiums. The general average of the Company's experience from the beginning is now 59·39 per cent.

The Expenses of Management (including commission to agents and charges of every kind) came to £100,477 8s. 10d., or 30·43 per cent. of the premiums. This is an increase of 1·21 per cent. compared with the previous year, and is principally due to the introduction of certain important changes, from which beneficial results are ultimately expected, in the management of the business in the United States.

The result is that, after reserving the usual 33 per cent. of the premiums to cover liabilities under current policies, a profit was earned of £9,115 16s., which sum has been transferred to the credit of the General Account of Profit and Loss.

LIFE DEPARTMENT.

Assurance Branch.—The new Assurances during the year, after deduction of re-assurances, reached in the aggregate the sum of £177,700, of which £91,775 was for endowment or arrears payable at death or on the attainment of a specified age. These new assurances yielded annual premiums amounting to £12,690 9s. 9d., and single premiums amounting to £1,077 15s. 11d.

The total Income of the year (including interest) was £251,572 19s. 9d.

The Claims amounted to £111,615 3s. 7d., of which the sum of £2,046 5s. 8d. was for endowments and endowment assurances payable during life.

The Expenses of Management (including commission) were limited to 10 per cent. of the premiums received.

Annuity Branch.—The sum of £6,296 1s. 4d. was received for annuities granted during the year.

The whole Funds of the Life Department now amount to £1,778,239 6s. 8d., showing an increase for the year of £107,580 13s. 7d.

DIVIDEND.

The balance at the credit of Profit and Loss (including the sum brought forward from the previous year, and the profit on the fire account of past amounts, after charging the interim dividend of £1 per share paid in December last, to £48,401 15s. 2d. Out of this sum the Directors recommend that a further dividend of £1 per share be now declared, making a total distribution of profits for the year of £100,000, and leaving £58,169 15s. 2d. to be carried forward.

"Adelaide Wynter is a very pleasant woman to read about. She is the 'one who does not count' in a horribly shabby-genteel family, gibbeted with more than the exaggeration of Dickens, but with most of his force and liveliness. Lily, the consumptive heroine, Missy, the 'distinguished mimic,' and the shameless man-hunting mother, their frivolity, gentility, vulgarity, and sordid poverty, form a ghastly picture. The discordant presence of this dove in the vulture's nest is adroitly accounted for by her education by an aunt, who had disgraced the family by keeping a school. Whenever Addie refuses to join in the husband-stalking expeditions, or blushes for the degradation of her sisters, Mrs. Wynter pathetically owns that 'it serves her right,' it is just punishment upon her for delegating a mother's trust, and handing over her child to be brought up by strangers. Could Dickens have made her say more? In fact this book abounds in clever things, and is strewn with pearls of reflection and original humour. In many of the characters there are touches quite admirable."—Academy.

"Together with a deeply interesting plot there is to be found in the romance the further attraction of some clever character studies, and of a style which is at once bright and terse. In every sense this is an excellent novel."—Morning Post.

"It is no mere commonplace to say that this is a novel of powerful interest. The several stories which make up the plot are carefully worked, and are told in a taking style. The romance is full of good work, and contains the material for a score of ordinary stories."—Globe.

MISS MONTGOMERY'S STORIES.

Just ready, a Second Edition of

THE BLUE VEIL. 1 vol. crown, 5s.

"Miss Montgomery's book excites only pleasurable expectations, for her name guarantees at any rate refined feeling and cultivated language. She tells us in the preface to this charming story that its purpose is to enforce lessons of tolerance and self-restraint. It is not to be expected that the children who have the pleasure of reading 'The Blue Veil' will carry away its moral in this abstract form, but they will not soon forget Archie and Nell and Phyllis, and what it was that marred or beautified the character of each. Phyllis is perhaps a little too perfect, and Archie's powers of imagination are rather wonderful, but we like them both too well to wish them otherwise than they are. The mystery of the Blue Veil is almost as exciting as that of the Iron Mask.....Good feeling, good English, and good humour make this emphatically a good book."—Academy.

By Mrs. A. PHILLIPS, Author of "Benedicta."

"It is quite refreshing and delightful to come across such a book as this, and we must accord a hearty welcome to the author. In point of conception and execution it is far above the average of the present-day novel; the author's style is vigorous and entirely free from affectation."—Whitehall Review.

"Mrs. Phillips' new story is simple enough in its subject and construction to be deservedly called idyllic, and her power as a writer is shown by the manner in which the interest and action are slightly subordinated to the selected theme. The incidents are natural and affecting. Hagar's is a fine character, and its merits is tried and refined by a series of tests, which cannot fail to secure for her the sympathy of all who make her acquaintance."—Athenæum.

"The book gives proof of conscientious work."—Morning Post.

BACON. By the Very Rev. R. W. CHURCH, Dean of St. Paul's. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

"This admirable sketch of Bacon. The Dean of St. Paul's has done nothing better than his picture of what Bacon did and what he did not do for the enlargement of knowledge,—the ideal end of Bacon's life and love.....The book is a perfect model of what such a book should be, and the charm of its style is at least as great as the lucidness and closeness of its matter."—Spectator.

PROFESSOR SEELEY'S NEW BOOK.

THE EXPANSION of ENGLAND: Two Courses of Lectures. By J. R. SEELEY, M.A., Regius Professor of Modern History in the University of Cambridge, Fellow of Gonville and Caius College, Fellow of the Royal Historical Society, and Honorary Member of the Historical Society of Massachusetts. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.

"The lectures deserve the closest and most intelligent attention.....Nothing is more striking, nor more vital to its objects, than the luminous vigour with which he explodes certain deeply-rooted fallacies. ... The proposed object of the lectures is to enlighten us as to those events in our recent history which may have even greater effect upon our future than on our past. The little volume is well worth careful study, were it only in the view of suggesting intelligent objections, and so ventilating questions of the most vital importance."—Times.

THE ANGLO-FRENCH UNDERSTANDING.

THAT the details of such of the proposals of HER MAJESTY'S Government in reference to Egypt as that Government has thought fit to lay before Parliament deserve the most careful examination is almost a platitude; but it is saved from the platitudinous by the consideration it suggests that, in order to this careful examination, these details must be discussed apart from the singular and exciting circumstances which attended the disclosure. Whether Mr. GLADSTONE carried out or evaded his pledge of frankness; what the attitude of his party towards his proposals really is and means, are very important questions. But the more they are kept apart from the question of the merits of the proposed arrangement itself the better. In discussing that arrangement there is of course the drawback that the financial details are still unknown. But it is possible (though the plan gives the arrangement a somewhat undue advantage) to leave them out of sight. Let it be supposed that no further burden is imposed on England than the communications with France disclose; the particulars of those communications will still give ample room for comment.

It is admitted that the only way of understanding the understanding is to compare the accounts of it supplied by the four persons, Mr. GLADSTONE, Lord GRANVILLE, M. FERRY, and M. WADDINGTON, who have given authoritative statements on the subject. In maintaining the perfectly judicial attitude which has been marked out here, it is necessary of course to discard what may be called the rhetorical peculiarities of the various expositions, though here again the agreement or arrangement or understanding receives perhaps even more than its due amount of "law." Let Mr. GLADSTONE'S care for the interests and susceptibilities of France, M. FERRY'S admiration for the magnanimity of the present English Ministry, and the efforts of both to make the most of the bargain, each from his own side, be dismissed from the memory. We have then at least one startling discrepancy between the English and the French accounts, and a good many points of agreement. France has, it seems, made two, if not three, great concessions—there is no need to quibble about the word concession—the recognition that the Dual Control is abolished; the promise not, at or after the English evacuation, to occupy Egypt with an armed force; and, more vaguely, the resignation of specifically French claims into the hands of Europe generally. England agrees to leave Egypt at the end of 1887, unless she obtains, in consequence of continued or renewed anarchy, a fresh mandate. But on the question how that mandate is to be given the authorities differ hopelessly. Lord GRANVILLE says that united action on the part of the Powers would be necessary to turn out England against her own judgment; Mr. GLADSTONE avoids pronouncing a definite opinion on the point; M. FERRY contradicts Lord GRANVILLE flatly, and says that his view is "ridiculous." Let this important point join the others excluded, that the agreement may have the fairest possible chance. It is admitted then that, except in the ambiguous event just referred to, England is to go before New Year's Day, 1888. Meanwhile the Caisse de la Dette, composed of members of different nationalities (the President being English, with a casting vote), will advise on the ordinary Egyptian Budget, and have a veto on all extraordinary expenses. After 1887, all going well, Egypt and the Suez Canal, in different degrees and manners, are to be neutralized or internationalized, the details of this process not concerning the present arrangement. But the internationalizing intentions of England form part of that arrangement, and are to be formally recorded, provided only (a proviso to be extended to the other stipulations) that the Conference meeting to-day succeeds in coming to a financial settlement on the pressing questions of the moment. This statement the most ardent Ministerialist cannot object to as biassed or garbled; and the most ardent Ministerialist, if he be possessed of any judicial faculty himself, will admit that the points excluded from consideration—the disagreement between Lord GRANVILLE and M. FERRY, if not between M. FERRY and Mr. GLADSTONE, the circumstances of the presentation of the proposals to Parliament as a tale half told and to be completed later, and so forth—are points on which a good deal might be said against his side. With regard, further, to the reception of the arrangement in France nothing shall be said here. For the question of importance is not whether French desires, reasonable or unreasonable, are met, but whether English interests and duties are consulted. It is impossible to imagine a more childish argument than that England ought to be satisfied because France is dissatisfied.

The case thus stated and the ground cleared, the formation of opinion as to this agreement or understanding may be best guided by putting a few plain questions. England has by common consent failed to put Egypt into a satisfactory way of self-government or of any government during two years in which her hands have been, nominally at least, entirely free, while no limit whatever has been set to her occupation. Is it probable or even possible that she should be more successful with her occupation limited in the first place to three years and a half more, with a prolongation at the best (that is, from Lord GRANVILLE'S point of view) doubtful and difficult, and with a definite prospect held out that if the prolongation is refused, or when it terminates, England will cease to have any paramount influence in Egypt whatever? That is the simple question as regards the immediate or near welfare of Egypt. Again, France, it is urged, must be met half way in return for her important concessions. Supposing these concessions to be ratified by the Chambers, is there much intrinsic value in the renunciation of a Control which, by French admission, has been for two years a dead letter, impossible to revive, in an engagement as to future French action in Egypt, which, as history and common sense show, will be valuable or valueless according to the circumstances of the moment, and in a resignation in favour of Europe of certain vague claims to influence in Egypt which are certainly not in force at present? That is the simple question as regards the action of France. As regards the proposed Control, the matter can be put quite as briefly. We have found the most serious difficulties in dealing with Egyptian matters when the opposition of the representatives of other Powers has been covert, partial, and unaided by any recognized machinery. Are those difficulties likely to be aggravated or reduced by the institution of a Board of Financial Control in which, though England may occasionally profit by the disagreement of the non-English members, she will not have a normal majority? The expression Board of Financial Control should be noted, for it is a very generous one to the Government. With regard to the neutralizing of Egypt and the Canal after the fashion of Belgium, it need only be asked whether the experience of the past two years and the admitted necessity of the present extraordinary arrangement does or does not confirm the views of those who affirmed long ago that none of the elements of an Oriental Belgium are present, or for long years can be made present in Egypt, and that elements of weakness and of international dissension are present in Egypt which are not, and never have been, present in Belgium? Last, but by no means least, comes the question, Is the position assigned to England a brief and troublesome stay in Egypt, with or without pecuniary sacrifices, followed by a permanent exclusion from any authority in the country greater than that of other European Powers—an adequate equivalent for the part England has recently taken in Egyptian affairs, and is it consistent with the expressed determination of all English parties, except the extremest Left, that, come what may, England must be paramount on the Nile and the Canal?

These questions and the preceding statement have been framed without the slightest passion or partiality, and with the utmost care. They will bear the minutest investigation as a putting of the case to the political jury, and no Englishman of average sense and acquaintance with recent events ought to have any difficulty in giving his verdict upon them. Whether the answer is best given in the form and under the circumstances of Mr. Bates's motion may be a question admitting of very different answers. It would probably be said by those responsible for it that some such motion was necessary, whether it be pushed home or not, to deprive the Government of the right of saying that their preliminary proposals passed unchallenged. But this need not affect the larger case which has been here put. No more important problem has been laid before Englishmen during the present generation; nor has there been any on which it was so desirable that, laying aside the idle partisan squabbles of the moment, Englishmen should decide as Englishmen, without fear and without favour.

LORD ROSEBERY AND THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

LORD ROSEBERY is probably superior to the temptation of sacrificing great public interests to personal display; and his reputation as an eloquent speaker is sufficiently established; yet it is difficult to understand the object of his motion for altering the character and constitution of the House of Lords. No Select Committee could discover any mode of removing the defect of power which is the only drawback to its efficiency. It would be absurd to expect that the House of Commons would concede to the Peers a larger share in government or legislation if a few Colonial Governors and Indian Commissioners were admitted to seats for life. The three or four life-peers who were introduced into the House a few years ago seldom interfere in the general business of the House. It is true that, as Lord ROSEBERY said, the Senate of the United States is more powerful than the House of Lords; but no such superiority can be claimed by any other Second Chamber. No device which has been at any time proposed would increase the ability of those members of the House of Lords who take a principal part in its deliberations. On almost all great occasions the debates are elevated and exhaustive, and they are always confined within reasonable limits. The greatest lawyers and a majority of the most experienced statesmen are found in the Upper House; and it supplies some of the ablest members of every successive Cabinet. It is in the highest degree inexpedient to dig up such an institution that it may be ascertained from an examination of the roots how it lives and thrives. Lord ROSEBERY can scarcely have been serious in some of the recommendations which he offered for promoting its vigour. The saying, Sint ut sunt, aut non sint, is attributed to a judicious General of the Jesuits. A supporter of the English Constitution might, with equal confidence, affirm of the Peers the proposition Erunt ut sunt, aut non erunt. Another branch of the Legislature might be formally established, but it would have none of the characteristic qualities of the House of Lords.

For the ordinary mass of peers no more ambitious claim can be advanced than that they are generally equal in ability and political accomplishment to the corresponding majority of the House of Commons. If they are necessarily devoid of the powers which are in modern times almost exclusively conferred by popular election, their local and social influence is, notwithstanding the changes which have occurred, still indefinitely great. In almost every part of England peers are by general consent placed at the head of public institutions, and preferred for administrative and honorary offices, and the House of Lords faithfully represents the feelings and opinions of the upper classes of society. The collective weight of the whole body depends largely on the traditional respect which is paid to the order; and no artificial props which could be contrived would act as substitutes for the old foundations. Lord ROSEBERY's readiness to tamper with the fundamental principles of the Constitution indicates an excessive confidence in the stability of the edifice. He actually professes to think that the House ought to include a certain number of workmen, although only two or three representatives of the class have up to the present time found their way into the House of Commons. It may be doubted whether an artisan could be found to accept a peerage in the face of the universal ridicule which he would provoke from his equals. The abolition of the House of Lords would be a simpler and more rational measure than an inversion of its relations with the rest of the community. If Lord ROSEBERY were a plebeian demagogue, his proposals for the improvement of the House would be intelligible. He is probably too serious a politician to share the selfish desire of making the best of both worlds or the poor ambition of combining the advantages of high station with the popularity which attends democratic agitation. He might probably by this time have raised himself from a much humbler condition; but his speeches and his political conduct now attract attention in a great degree on account of his rank.

The plausible theory that a creation of life-peers would strengthen the House of Lords is not confined to mere propounders of brilliant paradoxes. It might not be difficult to provide the security which Lord SALISBURY requires against abuses of prerogative; but the innovation, while it would produce no considerable benefit, would be a long step towards the abolition of the hereditary peerage. If a machinery were once provided by which all distinguished personages could be easily admitted into the Upper House, the question would be plausibly asked why their equals, or perhaps less eminent claimants, should receive the higher honour of the hereditary peerage. The instances in which peerages have been refused on the ground of insufficient means are comparatively few. The unconstitutional attempt of Lord PALMERSTON, Lord RUSSELL, and Lord CRANWORTH to revive an obsolete exercise of the Royal Prerogative was made in the case of an elderly dignitary of ample private fortune who had no male issue. When the life-peer Lord WENSLEYDALE was prevented from taking his seat, the dignity was made hereditary without any pretence of inconvenience. The last ex-judge who has been elevated to the House of Lords was made a hereditary peer probably because the number of Law Lords sitting during tenure of office was already full. The aspirations of Lord ROSEBERY and some of his supporters for the addition to the House of Lords of successful capitalists and traders might be gratified without any deviation from ancient custom. A successful banker or merchant is necessarily rich enough to provide for the foundation of a family. It would be difficult to insist on making him a peer for life, except on the assumption that he was in some way inferior to the great body of his intended colleagues. The same remark would generally apply, though not in the same degree, to physicians at the head of their profession. Many of them have willingly accepted an inferior title which is nevertheless hereditary.

The promotion to the peerage of persons eminent in literature, art, or science, has not been unpopular in the few instances which have occurred. Lord MACAULAY, Lord LYTTON, and Lord HOUGHTON owed their elevation chiefly to their literary distinction, though two of them had held Cabinet office, and the third, a veteran member of the House of Commons, belonged to the class from which new peers have generally been taken. Lord TENNYSON's peerage is the first purely literary addition to the House of Lords, but the precedent may probably be followed. It may be admitted that the admission of life peers might provide a few retired administrators with honourable and useful employment; and perhaps room might be advantageously found for some of the many capable commoners who will probably fail to secure the suffrage of the new constituencies. The House of Lords already includes not only ex-Ministers and retired politicians, but former members of the Civil Service who have been able to accept peerages without imprudence. Every society of able and cultivated men would for some purposes be improved by an extension of the number of its members; but the character of the House of Lords would not be materially affected by the creation of a few life-peers belonging to a class which is already represented on its benches. If the experiment were to have no indirect operation, it might be tried without risk of serious inconvenience. By an Act of Parliament, or perhaps by an Address to the Crown, the objection which rightly prevailed in the case of Lord WENSLEYDALE might be effectually avoided. Life-peers might perhaps find that they were regarded by their hereditary colleagues as a slightly inferior order, and their descendants might possibly regret their exclusion from honorary title and precedence; but after a time the newcomers would partake the equanimity with which bishops endure the same disabilities.

The strong and indeed conclusive argument against proposals of the kind is that they tend to unsettle that part of the Constitution which is most dependent on custom and tradition. Lord ROSEBERY may, perhaps, not have intended to raise the question whether the House of Lords should continue to exist; but no smaller issue would necessarily have been involved in the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the means of rendering the House more efficient. The limited project of introducing life-peers is scarcely less dangerous, though it may have a more plausible appearance. The report of a Committee to the effect that peerages ought no longer to be inherited would furnish a formidable argument for a grave political revolution. A vote of the House in favour of a creation of life-peers would not improbably have the same effect. Agitators would ask with much plausibility why it was necessary to ennoble whole families that their chiefs might discharge duties which could be entrusted with equal confidence to life-tenants of the peerage. The authority which still attaches to permanent wealth and hereditary rank cannot, as the experience of many foreign countries proves, be communicated to nominees of a Minister; but considerations of this kind would be neither intelligible nor acceptable to the popular mind. Whatever may be the case with ordinary disputants, the House of Lords must be supposed to assume that an aristocratic element ought to form an important part of the Constitution. The Roman Senate would scarcely have referred to a Council the duty of inquiring whether the qualifications of its members should be fundamentally altered. At the present rate of downward progress, it is not impossible that the present generation may witness serious attacks on the House of Lords, with results which cannot be calculated beforehand. The defenders of the institution will be ill advised if they change front in the presence of the enemy. It is not because the House of Lords is, even in the estimation of its detractors, inefficient that Lord ROSEBERY threatens it with an undefined change. Its prepossessions would scarcely cease to be Conservative, even if it were swamped by new creations. Life-peers would soon show themselves the most resolute of Tories.

THE RECEPTION OF THE SURRENDER.

THE remarkable crookedness which distinguishes the ways of the present Government has never been more apparent than in the Ministerial statements on Monday night. Few men who know that it is as impossible for Mr. GLADSTONE to be frank as it is for Lord GRANVILLE to be rude—that is to say, few capable politicians of either political party—were greatly comforted by the assurances under which Parliament separated for the Whitsuntide holidays. A Ministry which has rarely given a promise in Parliament without breaking it to the sense, if not to the ear, was hardly likely to turn over a new leaf at such a crisis as the present. But, though it was tolerably safe to anticipate that the pea would not be found under the thimble, it was not easy to foretell the precise form of escamotage which would be adopted by the astute table-keeper. It may be owned with great frankness that Mr. GLADSTONE has surpassed himself on this occasion. By giving particulars of the agreement with France, the non-rejection of which is, in the circumstances, a sort of condition preliminary of the Conference, and by refusing to give any account of the propositions which are to be laid before the Conference itself, he has made it awkward for his opponents to interfere, he has given an excuse for his lukewarm friends to suspend at least their disapproval, and he has spread a net (into which some persons have made haste to tumble) for those who are neither declared friends nor declared enemies. That the agreement (the provisions of which are examined carefully elsewhere) is in itself objectionable enough to justify—in fact, to demand—a prompt disapproval is pretty certain. But, at the same time, the fact that its provisions are in a sense dependent on the results of the Conference; that it has been presented to the Powers as such a preliminary, and that their final view of it has not been announced; that the Conference itself is fixed for so early a day, make up exactly the kind of pretext which waverers between two opinions are certain to grasp, which not very acute opponents are very likely to be staggered by, and which even opponents who have some regard for decency and the attitude of their country towards foreign Powers may be somewhat puzzled how to deal with. Mr. GLADSTONE has in a manner imitated those heroic Irish mobs who advance to the attack of the Constabulary with women in front. His present proposals must be attacked at disadvantage unless his future proposals are known; and he declines to make known his future proposals, alleging the respect owed to the Powers. Some admiration is due to this proceeding—admiration of the same kind which on a celebrated occasion was paid to the astuteness of Messrs. DODSON and FOGG.

The peculiarity, however, of that kind of cleverness which, by a metaphor very unjustly disrespectful to a respectable profession, is called attorneyism is that it frequently overreaches itself. It is not certain that Mr. GLADSTONE's fresh exhibition of his abilities may not still have this fate. Only the amiable shortness of sight which is excusable in partisans can justify the enthusiasm with which some supporters of the Government have spoken of the reception of the measure throughout the country. It has not been favourably received; excluding from consideration entirely the expressions of partisan opposition. If the chorus of disapproval among Liberals has not been so loud and open as in the case of the Canal agreement, that is due to the fact that in the Canal case the party screw was at first not put on at all, while in the present case it has been turned to the last convolution of the thread. Even so, however, the tone of approval has been vague, general, and based on irrelevant considerations, while from Manchester, from Leeds, from Newcastle, from South Wales, from the West of England, the most independent, the ablest, and the most influential organs of the Liberal opinion of the provinces either intimate indistinct dissatisfaction or qualify their acceptance in anything but an enthusiastic spirit. In London there is absolutely no voice of approval except from some persons who, after long maintaining a more independent attitude, have recently declared their adhesion to the doctrine of "Mr. GLADSTONE, right or wrong." As an instance of the character of this support, it may be observed that one London newspaper has claimed the vote of Thursday as a "formal approval" for M. FERRY on the very same page on which it quotes M. FERRY's own description of that vote as "a semi-vote of want of confidence." And it is particularly noticeable that not a few of the exponents of provincial opinion just referred to can have had no time to make the damning comparison of Mr. GLADSTONE's speech with M. FERRY's, which in the minds of all impartial judges dispelled any lingering doubt as to the agreement. The details of that comparison need not be dwelt on here. It is sufficient to say that the too-famous incident of the White and Red Treaties seems to have been revived for the benefit of the French and English Parliaments. But Mr. GLADSTONE seems to have forgotten that his OMICHUND must necessarily have cognizance of both.

Still more remarkable than anything yet noticed in the expressed opinion of Liberals on this remarkable collection of speeches and State papers is the maintenance on all sides of the argument to the passions, which has been so frequently commented on. For one genuine expression of satisfaction a score of descants on the terrible results of turning out Mr. GLADSTONE, the alarming character of a Conservative Government, and the like meet the careful examiner. Very few voices echo, though no doubt thousands, if not millions, of hearts agree with, the candid declaration of Mr. J. D. LEWIS, that when he said he was too ill to stand for South Hants the other day, he meant that he could not possibly support Mr. GLADSTONE'S Egyptian policy. It does not seem to have occurred to Mr. LEWIS that a Liberal is not necessarily a man who is willing to sacrifice country to party, and that until these modern times candidates for Parliament were supposed to represent their own opinions and those of their constituents, not the opinions of a single statesman. But Mr. LEWIS's delusion, if not his frankness, seems to be almost universal in his party. They know the agreement to be bad. They have before them the extraordinary confession of an English Minister that he has made it because he did not know what on earth else to do, and because his attempt to govern Egypt has broken down hopelessly. They have before them also the sentences of contemptuous commendation in which Prince BISMARCK, commenting on the Angra Pequeña affair, has intimated that England is always ready now to stand out of the way for anybody and to give the wall discreetly. They see that the French Ministry claim the agreement as a concession on England's part, and they can hardly be deluded by the fact that French Chauvinism, convinced of Mr. GLADSTONE'S readiness to yield anything, clamours for more. They perceive that, whatever be the exact nature of the financial proposals, England at the end of a very short period will lose all political control over Egypt, and that the blood, the money, the opportunities, the efforts of the last two years will be irretrievably thrown away. They are (some of them) frank enough to confess themselves at a loss to conceive what possible relation to the trouble which England is pledging herself to take there can be in the advantages which England is pledging herself to resign. But they say still, "Mr. GLADSTONE, right or wrong; no Tory Ministry, "wrong or right." Once upon a time there was in the remoter regions of this realm a noble lord, whose son, promising enough in other respects, showed a fearful tendency to apostatize from the Liberal faith, and become a Tory. The calamity was averted; thanks, it was supposed, to the ingenious companionship and monitions of a certain person. This certain person was appointed secretary, major-domo, and general factotum to Lord —— himself, and his discharge of these functions was so notoriously unsatisfactory that Lord ——'s friends frequently expressed their wonder at his toleration of it. But he invariably replied, "Ah, yes; sad fellow! sad fellow! but he kept —— "straight, you know, he kept —— straight." Even so, the voices of these singular Liberals declare that in this respect Mr. GLADSTONE'S stewardship is unsatisfactory and unintelligible to them, that his measures are doubtful, if not mischievous, that their consequences will, in all probability, be more mischievous still. But he keeps the party straight and together, he leads it to victory, and a quarrel with him would be to let the other party in. The parallel is as things go sufficiently exact, but perhaps too bad a compliment is paid by it to the memory of Lord ——. For, after all, his political enthusiasm only induced him to connive at the mismanagement of his own private affairs. The Liberals who lay stress now on the impossibility of letting in a Conservative Government are conniving at the mismanagement of the affairs of England.

THE PRINCE OF ORANGE.

THE death of the Prince of ORANGE has served to remind the world of the complicated nature of the relations between the different States of Europe. Little seems to have been known of the PRINCE himself, even in his own country. He was a man of a retiring disposition, and supposed to have scientific tastes. It is so much the rule that a Prince who lives a quiet life should be credited with the most remarkable scientific, artistic, or literary genius, that the stories told about the heir to the Crown of the Netherlands may possibly have been nothing but gossip. We have, however, M. RENAN'S word for it that the scientific curiosity of the late Prince of ORANGE was something more than what is commonly called by that name—a kindly taste for animal pets, and a certain readiness to pick up such kinds of useful information as can be learnt at secondhand without trouble, and with occasional help from the milder forms of magic in the shape of experiments. Beyond this vague reputation for intelligence and love of knowledge, the PRINCE has been made the subject of a good deal of personal and scandalous tittle-tattle with which healthy-minded people will have as little as possible to do. This gossip has, however, never contained anything which reflected either upon his honour or his kindliness. If there was no reason to suppose that the PRINCE would have become a ruler of any vigour, neither was there anything to show that he would have failed in the discharge of the duties of a constitutional sovereign.

The death of the Prince of ORANGE has attracted particular attention because he was the last male of the ORANGE line of the house of NASSAU. It will become extinct with his father, the present King of the NETHERLANDS. The present Royal family of Holland are not indeed the direct representatives of the great Princes of ORANGE of the family of NASSAU who did such wonderful things in war and politics for more than a century and a half. It is even only by a family custom that they continued to use the name of ORANGE at all. The principality was resumed by LOUIS XIV., and the title passed legally to the first King of PRUSSIA. Nevertheless the Dutch branch of the NASSAUS were in a general way the representatives of WILLIAM the SILENT, if not by strict descent, at least in public opinion, and no other branch of the family will ever again be able to call itself by the famous name of ORANGE NASSAU.

Although, however, there is a very respectable kind of regret felt among people of any knowledge and intelligence when a great family comes to an end, it was not only because he was the last of his house that the death of the Prince of ORANGE was a political event. There was a general feeling that the want of a male heir to the King of the NETHERLANDS might possibly cause a dispute over the succession. The Kingdom of the Netherlands was created by an arrangement among the Great Powers of Europe after the abdication of the Emperor NAPOLEON at Fontainebleau, with the intention that it should be a barrier against any future attempt of the French to resume his policy, if an insane love of war and personal aggrandizement can be called by that name. With this object the Powers made an artificial Kingdom of the Netherlands, including Belgium, which fell to pieces within twenty years. But although the Powers were compelled to see their handiwork destroyed, they were far from consenting to give up their right of control over the fragments of the barrier raised against France. The position both of Belgium and the Netherlands has consequently been settled by treaty, and cannot be modified without common consent. In the case of the latter the question is complicated by the fact that the different States now ruled by the same KING descend by a different rule of inheritance. In the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg the Salic Law prevails, and it must be separated from the Crown of Holland on the death of the present KING, whose only surviving child is a daughter. There will then be considerable difficulty in deciding as to who is really entitled to the Duchy, and with the help of a little good will a very pretty quarrel on the subject may be got up between France and Germany. Neither is the way very clear as regards Holland itself. It is true that, as the Salic law does not exist there, the throne will descend quietly enough to the present KING'S daughter. But if she should die young, a very considerable difficulty will present itself for settlement. Failing a direct representative of the KING, his heir must either be the Count of NASSAU, the representative of the elder and German line of the family who was deprived of his territory by Prussia in 1866, or else a gentleman at present Colonel in the German army who descends from the Princes of ORANGE by marriage. If it were perfectly certain that the Dutch would be left to settle the matter for themselves no anxiety need be felt on the subject. They would choose one of the two candidates, or perhaps they would choose neither, but simply fall back on the old Republican form of government, or some imitation of it. There is, however, a possibility that the Dutch might not be left to settle it for themselves. Since the publication of the shameless proposals for the robbery of Belgium made in the name of NAPOLEON III. to Prussia there has always been a fear that some fine day Germany and France might settle their little differences at the expense of a third party. That third party would naturally be the Low Countries, Belgian and Dutch; and then England at least would find its position in Europe materially altered. With a disputed succession in Holland, the temptation to make some brigand-like arrangement would, it is supposed, become very strong—so strong as to be irresistible.

It would be rash to assert that anything is impossible in European politics; but a person must be afflicted with nerves of a most painful sensibility if he is disturbed by a prospect of this sort. Nothing can be more certain than that no kind of sentimentality or moral sublime will be allowed to stand in the way of the interests of Germany by Prince BISMARCK, or by any statesman trained in his school. He knows that sentimentality leads to desertions of garrisons and then to needless slaughter, and that the moral sublime commonly ends in sending round the hat. If, therefore, the interests of Germany ever become incompatible with the independence of Holland, there is no need to point out what is likely to be the consequence. There is no reason to suppose that any such incompatibility will be discovered, and until it is Germany will be a little likely to attack Holland as any other Power. The history of the last thirteen years shows that the man who governs the German Empire is not likely to be guilty of the folly of encouraging war for war's sake. He has gained whatever was essential by fighting, and can now afford to seek peace and ensue it; and, if Germany does not attack Holland, who will? The Dutch will certainly not be disturbed at the mostly imaginary dangers before them, and they must be very destitute of a sense of the ridiculous if they do not laugh at the solemn tone of the Parisian papers, which condole with them on the risks run by the freedom of their country. They know very well who it was who offered to divide the Low Countries by way of general settlement, and with whom. They also know what has happened to Tonquin, Tunis, Madagascar, and Morocco since then; and, lastly, they know well that Germany has not touched a square inch of anybody's land since its victory.

THE GERMAN INSURANCE BILL.

THE Bill to insure workmen against accidents has now reached a stage which renders it almost certain that it will pass into law before the end of the present Session of the Reichstag. Several changes have been made by the Special Committee in the original draft, and it is possible that on the third reading others may be insisted on which the Government will find it impossible to accept; but in the present state of public opinion, and under the existing relations of the various political parties, this is extremely unlikely. The fusion of the Secessionists with the Party of Progress some months ago awakened the Conservatives of all shades to the necessity of drawing nearer together; and when the Special Committee met, the Liberals found to their surprise that their opponents had come to an understanding with each other. The united Left had founded its hopes of defeating the Bill on a tendency that has hitherto been too characteristic of German politicians. They are not easily affected by sonorous declamation or by theatrical outbursts of passion, and a foreigner who reads or listens to a debate in the Reichstag or the Landtag is generally struck by the businesslike character of the discussion and the care with which it is confined to the matter before the House. We are speaking, of course, of the present only, not of the leaders who were popular before 1866. But these excellent Parliamentary qualities have frequently been marred by the tenacity with which single groups and members have clung to their own opinions on matters of detail. Much as they might approve of the general principles of a Government proposal, they would not let it pass if it seemed faulty in any respect. Their objections were generally founded on careful study and long consideration; but their insistence upon them has often frustrated important reforms; indeed, it has gone far to render a healthy party life impossible.

A measure so large, so novel, and so complex as the Insurance Bill could not but contain a number of regulations upon which those who most heartily approved of it as a whole might well differ; and it was to this fact that its opponents trusted. The Liberals and the Social Democrats were, though for different reasons, equally unwilling that it should become law. The former object to it as an encroachment upon individual liberty; the latter, while professing to desire that society should be reformed and labour organized by the State, are convinced that the task cannot be safely entrusted to any form of government except a democratic republic. It is shrewdly suspected, however, that many of the voters who have hitherto supported these parties think differently on the matter, and the elections are near. It was, therefore, judged more advisable to attack the details than to oppose the principles of the Bill. This was done with considerable skill; but the Conservatives of all shades, the Clericals, and the National Liberals, had perceived the danger; and, by making mutual concessions and voting as one united body, they have borne down all resistance, and will in all probability triumphantly carry the third reading.

The first Liberal move on the second reading was exceedingly clever, on account of the influence it is likely to have on the constituencies; as to its fairness, we offer no opinion. The measure, as we pointed out when the draft was first made public, is an attempt to organize the larger industries of Germany in a way that has never been attempted in any country. It is confessedly an experiment; to many of those who are most desirous to see it tried it seems a doubtful, and even a dangerous, one. But, to give it a chance of success, the range of its operation must at first be limited. With the trustworthy statistical information it knows so well how to obtain the German Government has found it possible to form a plan as to the creation of associations for the great industry of the country, and to estimate the risk of accidents in mines, manufactories, &c.; but it is evident that it is impossible at once to include the whole handicraft of the nation in such an organization. Not only the supporters of the measure, but the Government and Prince BISMARCK himself, have declared that they desire to extend its benefits to those who are at present excluded from them as soon as it seems practicable to do so; yet proposal after proposal was made first to include one profession and then another. With admirable patience and a full knowledge of his subject, Herr VON BOETTICHER, the Minister in charge of the Bill, rose time after time to explain why this could not be done, and showed that the acceptance of the amendment would wreck the measure, and he was frankly supported by the majority. Yet by this means the Liberals and Social Democrats will be able to appear before their constituents as advocates for an extension of a reform they have done everything in their power to prevent.

We need not follow their tactics further. If the Insurance Bill is passed, the second halting-place in the CHANCELLOR'S great crusade against undeserved poverty will have been reached. By means of the Krankenkassen every German labourer is now insured against the pecuniary difficulties arising from temporary illness. The present Bill will secure him against accidents; it provides a State guarantee that as long as he is either partially or entirely disabled a certain percentage of his normal wages will be regularly paid him; in case of his death a similar provision will be made for his widow and children. With a wise foresight the compensation is not to be made in a lump sum, the possession of which so often tempts the poor to extravagance, but as a pension to prevent entire destitution. The Government is already pledged to introduce a measure for the assistance of those who are incapacitated for work either by age or infirmity. When that is passed, the only occasion for undeserved poverty that will remain will be a want of work by those who are both able and willing to do it, and with this too, to judge from some of his recent speeches, Prince BISMARCK is prepared to deal when the proper moment has arrived. We regret to say that it seems to us exceedingly doubtful whether his great plan will succeed, though the more its details are examined the more carefully considered they appear. But this effort to prevent the honest workman from sinking into helpless poverty by no fault of his own, without subjecting him to the disgrace of receiving public alms, is at least a noble one, and that part of the scheme that has already been discussed is worthy of the head of the greatest statesman, as well as the heart of one of the most benevolent monarchs of the age.

THE LATEST PENGE CASE.

PROBABLY most of us, if asked to mention the wickedest thing we had ever done, would at once go back in thought to the days of our infancy. There is a thoroughgoing, unmitigated heinousness about puerile crime which can rarely be detected in the more sophisticated and self-conscious performances of later years. Happily the designs of boyhood can rarely be carried out. They usually depend for their success upon some suspension of the laws of nature not to be procured by human agency, or at least upon apparatus beyond the means of the small schemer. But for these difficulties the world would be startled to find that it knew little of its naughtiest boys. As it is, STEPHEN MURPHY and GEORGE STEEDEN, whose united ages just amount to the age of a freshman, are entitled to a high place in the Newgate Calendar. If they did not commit murder, that was their misfortune, and not their fault. That they intended to commit it there can be no doubt whatever, as one of them was good enough to explain to a friend. It seems that these precious youths, who must have a great deal of spare time on their hands, had heard of rewards being offered for the recovery of dead bodies. This set them thinking, and they appear to have communed with themselves after the following ungodly sort. Rewards are very pleasant things, and mean any amount of raspberry tarts. The surest way of finding a dead body is to hide it. But corpses are difficult to get. It is a fine day. Let us kill some one. So they took poor little HENRY DOUGLASS, aged three, and put him in a dustbin. The dustbin belonged to an unoccupied house, where there was no chance of cries being heard. They covered the unfortunate child with bricks, shut down the lid of the bin, and left him. DOUGLASS remained there without food or drink from five o'clock in the afternoon till one o'clock the following day, when he was rescued, his parents having heard the story from a boy to whom STEEDEN divulged it. It is useless to dilate upon the horrible cruelty of this proceeding. The mind of man can conceive nothing more heartless or more devilish. But it would be a mistake to suppose that MURPHY and STEEDEN will necessarily become worse as they grow older.

How they will be punished we cannot pretend to say. Mr. CHANCE, as a safe beginning, remanded them for further inquiries. The law is that a child under seven cannot be convicted of crime. Above seven and below fourteen he is assumed to be incapable of a criminal intent, unless the contrary be proved by positive evidence. In that case malitia supplet ætatem, as the legal maxim tersely puts it. The wickedness of MURPHY and STEEDEN is quite equal to supplying any deficiency of age, and there seems no reason why they should not be found guilty. Common sense rejects the notion that they put DOUGLASS into the dustbin for the purpose of doing him good, or indeed with any other object than that of taking his life. But we think it would be a mistake to assume that these abandoned little wretches, as they certainly now are, must be good for nothing, and destined to go continually downhill. For one thing—they could not get much lower. "He that is down need fear no fall"; and whose is homicidal at nine may be considered free from all danger of deterioration. Moreover, there is hope from the arrival of the faculty of imagination. For, though MURPHY and STEEDEN intended to kill DOUGLASS, they probably did not in the least realize to themselves what a baby would suffer who was confined in a box and left to die. It may be that they must be taught what pain is, and that when they know they will be wiser as well as sadder little boys. Want of imagination is at the bottom of half the cruelty done in this world, more especially of the pain inflicted by words. The greatest satirist may very well cause less misery than a thoroughly stupid person, innocent of malice as of wit. The things which boys will do to each other at school would be incredibly horrible if those who did them were exactly aware of what they were about. Knowledge comes, but imagination lingers, and knowledge without imagination is a deadly weapon. Meanwhile, there are one or two more commonplace, everyday aspects of this case on which a little enlightenment would be desirable. Is it the practice in Penge that a child of three should be allowed to roam about by himself, a prey to commoner dangers than that which overtook HENRY DOUGLASS? Are there no schools in Penge, or is attendance at them by chance not enforced? Are the youths of that neighbourhood free to follow their own devices, including a little infanticide now and then, without any parent or guardian being so impolite as to interfere? Do they always find an unoccupied house as accessible as the hero of Called Back did? These are questions which may perhaps receive some answer in the further progress of this case. Concerning the future of the culprits, without being hopeful, we need not despair.

CHOLERA AT TOULON.

THERE seems fortunately to be some reason to hope that the outbreak of cholera at Toulon will not prove very severe. It is early as yet to form an opinion as to the character or violence of the epidemic, and the evidence is certainly very conflicting; but there are some points on which the various reports agree in the main. The very fact that a conflict of evidence does exist is itself hopeful. When a dangerous epidemic of pronounced character breaks out anywhere, there is no possibility of doubt as to what is happening. At Toulon the doctors do not seem to be able to make up their minds as to what they have to deal with; and as cholera is an extremely well-known disease, this may be taken by laymen as a proof that it has not really attacked the town, at least in a pronounced form. No particular importance need be attached to the soothing formulas used by the authorities at Paris. They have every reason to make as little as possible of the epidemic, and it has always been the custom of French officials to try to conquer a danger by denying its existence. The campaign in Tunis, if a march over can be called anything so warlike, showed how bravely they can say the thing which is not. Even independent reports from the spot, however, go to show that the danger may not be very great. It seems proved that some even of the first cases were mild, and that there has been a fair proportion of recoveries, which is said not to be the case when a really serious outbreak of cholera occurs. The character of some of these independent reports also suggests a suspicion that the witnesses were somewhat in want of something to write about. Their letters are filled up with contradictory stories about the behaviour of the inhabitants and the authorities. It seems as difficult to decide whether or not there is a panic as to settle the nature of the epidemic. That there has been a good deal of undignified flurry seems clear enough. A minority of the Town Council has been so surprised at the heroism shown by M. ROMERAGE, the Mayor, in not bolting at once that they have voted him an address of thanks, which has been refused, "with question-able taste," according to the inimitable person who represents the Times. Unless it is to be taken for granted that a French official is to be effusively thanked every time he shows ordinary courage in the discharge of his duty, there would seem to be no doubt at all about the good taste shown in the rejection.

The final outcome of the stories comes to this—that there is a choleraic epidemic of some sort in Toulon which has already done some harm, and may do more both to the town and its neighbourhood. If this has come as a surprise to anybody, he or she must be singularly ill acquainted with the condition of Mediterranean coast towns. The wonder is that some such outbreak does not occur every summer. As Toulon is a great naval arsenal and important garrison town, it might be supposed that it would be in a rather better condition than most of the others. As a matter of fact, it is worse off; for the intelligent military and naval authorities have found nothing better to do with some of the docks than to allow them to become open cesspools. They also, it seems, persist in using floating hospitals, in spite of the universal experience of their dangers. If half the stories about the sanitary condition of Toulon have any foundation, it may be taken as proved that the local and naval authorities have been guilty of every possible form of carelessness and stupidity. The contemplation of this state of things and its consequences is calculated to give a certain cynical satisfaction to those of us who care to remember how much abuse was lavished on this country while the cholera was raging in Egypt. At that time we were commonly accused of selfishly endangering the health of Europe by our neglect of quarantine. With the reservation that it is well not to shout till we are out of the wood, we may fairly claim that the appearance of cholera at Toulon is an adequate answer to our critics. They can now see how much the quarantine has done for France. That is, perhaps, a rather small and personal point of view to take. It is more profitable to insist that the experience of the late and the present epidemics proves again the good old moral that if you want to be healthy you must keep clean. The researches of German physiologists have perhaps put the medical profession in possession of knowledge which may lead to the discovery of an effectual protection against cholera; but as yet the only known defences are good drains and good water. Perhaps when this truth has been well driven home into their heads by a lively personal experience, the Southern natives of Europe will begin to recognize the fact that they must clean the inside of the platter, and that quarantine is not very much more useful than the traditional wall built to imprison the cuckoo. It would perhaps be useless to ask either Spaniards or Italians to show ordinary decency and intelligence in sanitary matters, but Frenchmen are not destitute of scientific knowledge and capacity to learn. Since the municipalities, however, have had more independence, it seems that even Paris has been allowed to sink back into a state which invites cholera.

RECENT ELECTIONS.

THE political significance of occasional elections is impaired by the approaching change in the representation. The next appeal to the country may be addressed to three possible constituencies, of which only one has now from time to time opportunities of expressing its opinions. It is not improbable that an election under the existing law might differ widely from the result of the Franchise Bill in its simple form. The suffrage in boroughs would in that case be but slightly modified, while the county constituencies would include in addition to the present voters two to three millions of small householders living in villages, in unrepresented towns, and in farm cottages. Unless the framers of the Franchise Bill are signally disappointed, the solid mass of rural Conservatism will have been broken into fragments. The urban and suburban portion of the new constituencies will resemble in character the rest of the town population; and it is impossible to anticipate the course which may be taken by the agricultural labourers. Perhaps two or three general elections may occur before the consequences of Mr. GLADSTONE's experiment are accurately known. The most notorious of the demagogues who have hitherto promoted agitation among the farm-labourers has repeatedly announced vague schemes of agrarian confiscation as the immediate consequences of household suffrage in counties. Offers of this kind may be more tempting to those who know the value and the use of land than to city artisans, who, if they owned little rural freeholds, would be unable to turn them to account except by letting or selling. The relation of agricultural labourers to their employers varies greatly with the circumstances of each district, and especially with the general size of farms. In some parts of the country there is little social distinction between farmers and their workmen. Elsewhere capital and labour are associated or contrasted almost on the same terms as in manufacturing industries.

That part of the electoral Constitution which may be left standing by the Franchise Bill will be fundamentally disturbed, if it is not wholly destroyed, by the subsequent process of redistribution. Mr. GLADSTONE's statement of his intentions delivered on the second reading of the Franchise Bill was studiously indefinite; and it left the party at liberty to repudiate the few securities which it purported to contain. If Mr. GLADSTONE is still in power, he may possibly adhere, notwithstanding the lapse of a year, to his rejection of the scheme of equal electoral districts; but he will have no difficulty in explaining away any supposed promise of moderation, and he has given full notice that his successors will not be hampered by any kind of pledge. The most active of Mr. GLADSTONE's colleagues have openly announced their intention of dividing the country as soon as possible into equal electoral districts. In the meantime any plan of redistribution which is likely to be proposed will increase the representation of London, of Lancashire, the West Riding, and of the Midland and Northern manufacturing and mining districts. Perhaps it may also transfer to the Nationalists any Irish seat which may have escaped the operation of the Franchise Bill. The Government will for obvious reasons, unless its hand is unexpectedly forced, postpone the dissolution till the supremacy of the Radical party is finally assured. In a general election by the present constituency they would probably lose much of their actual strength, even if they were not absolutely defeated. The second alternative of an election under the Franchise Bill cannot occur for more than a year; and all classes would object to so anomalous a test of the comparative strength of parties. Redistribution will effectually invalidate any conclusions which may be drawn from the result of present or future bye-elections. Even in ordinary times, when no electoral change was impending, the indications afforded by casual contests have not always been followed by corresponding results. In 1880 Lord BEACONSFIELD was induced to dissolve prematurely by victories in Southwark and in Liverpool which, as it afterwards proved, had no general or permanent significance.

The real public opinion of the country, as it is represented by existing constituencies, may perhaps still retain a certain practical importance, and at least it is a subject of rational curiosity. The elections of last week seem to prove that the antagonism between the counties and the boroughs is becoming more pronounced as the householders of the towns become more anxious for the exclusive predominance of the class to which they belong. The Liberal majority of a thousand at Lincoln has to be set off against the equally decisive victories of the Conservative party in South Hampshire and Mid-Surrey. Both the candidates at Lincoln are said to have been locally popular; but all the principal employers of labour happen to belong to the Radical party, and in that direction the workmen are not unwilling to follow their guidance. There is unfortunately too much reason to believe that the working class, which already forms the most powerful section of the electorate, cares little or nothing for the international policy which it is about absolutely to control. Parliamentary speakers and writers have of late loudly boasted, almost in the words of Mr. GLADSTONE, that Egyptian questions matter little in comparison with the passing of the Franchise Bill. In other words, the honour and the future prosperity of England are to be unhesitatingly postponed to the interests of a faction. The democracy on the point of assuming supreme power publicly proclaims its ignorance of the traditions and responsibilities of the Empire. The dereliction of its duties is provided with a detailed apology in the mischievous pamphlet which Mr. GLADSTONE has, opportunely for his purposes, republished. The enfranchised householder will learn from his favourite teacher that the possession of India is an unprofitable burden, and that national honour is an obsolete illusion. The lesson appears scarcely to have been needed by the Lincoln electors. If there were a DEMOSTHENES in England to expose dangers and loss closely analogous to those which were denounced by the great Athenian orator, the timid and ruinous inaction recommended by the PHOCION or the ÆSCHINES of the day would be more acceptable to the average borough elector.

The two county elections tell a different story. In other circumstances Liberal partisans might be alarmed by the discovery that, in spite of allurements and bribes, the farmers have returned to their habitual allegiance. No election debt condemned by the Corrupt Practices Act was at any time more promptly paid than the price of the partial support transferred by the tenant-farmers to the Liberal party at the last general election. The Ground Game Act took precedence in the broken Session of 1880 over even the first instalment of the agrarian revolution in Ireland. The Tenants' Compensation Act was another acknowledgment of value received; and it was hoped that the Irish Land Act might excite anticipations of still further benefits to be conferred on county electors in exchange for their votes. The Farmers' Alliance in England and Scotland responded to the invitation; but the great body of county voters has resolutely held aloof from the movement. The Conservative majority of nearly fifteen hundred in South Hampshire was obtained after the local Farmers' Alliance had ostentatiously announced its support of the Liberal candidate. Throughout England the farmers care more for the suppression of the foot-and-mouth disease than for the spoliation of their landlords, which is the object of the Alliance. Many of them now vainly regret their former share in the return of a Liberal majority. There may have been some excuse for their ill-judged use of the power which had been conferred upon them by the Ballot Act. The effect of that measure was to transfer the control of the county representation from the landholders to the tenant-farmers. It was natural they should desire to exercise their novel privileges, and even that they should feel a certain gratitude to their Liberal benefactors. They now perceive that their local supremacy is short-lived, and that in almost all counties they will be outvoted by the tradesmen and artisans of the smaller towns, and by their own labourers. It is too late to resist the proposed revolution; but there may be some satisfaction in recording for the last time a vote which is in the nature of a protest.

The great Conservative majority in Mid-Surrey, though it includes many farmers, is in a great measure composed of different elements. Retired tradesmen, small capitalists, and residents who are engaged in business in the City, fairly represent the opinions of the best portion of the middle classes. Mr. GLADSTONE, who denounced as incompetent the citizens of London because they amassed wealth, and the electors of Westminster on account of their large expenditure, would probably regard the constituency of Mid-Surrey with the contempt which Radicals affect for general intelligence and diffused competence. It may be inferred, from the comparatively small number of actual voters, that the late election caused no extraordinary excitement. The result, notwithstanding the bluster of platform orators, was confidently anticipated, and busy men may not have thought it worth while to exert themselves for the increase of a majority which was known to be overwhelming. The metropolitan counties have not for many years wavered in their attachment to moderate and constitutional doctrines. It is possible that the projected deterioration of the franchise may there as well as elsewhere reduce the middle class to political impotence; but house-rent in the neighbourhood of London is so high that very modest tenements already confer county votes. Unless the lodgers swamp the genuine householders, such constituencies as that of Mid Surrey may perhaps, even under the Franchise Bill, retain their present character. On the other hand, there is reason to fear that adroit schemes of redistribution may furnish the means of silencing independent opinion. There is much need of security against the rapid progress of revolutionary agitation. The Radical candidate for Leicester bids for the favour of the rabble by asserting the extreme Communistic doctrine that the land belongs, not to its owners, but to the nation. Liberals of character and position cannot, as experience shows, be trusted to repel the most outrageous proposals.

THE CEMETERIES BILL.

THERE is some study necessary in order to comprehend the exact object of the Bill brought in by Mr. RICHARD on Wednesday evening. Mr. RICHARD, in a speech which was modelled as closely as possible after one of those which Captain MARRYAT has reported among the utterances of Mr. CHUCKS, "begged to observe, in the kindest and most "polite way in the world, in fact just to hint," without the slightest idea of giving pain or offence, that the incumbents of the Church of England are persons capable of violating all law and decency, and so forth, though he would be the last to think of saying a word against the mental and moral qualities of such excellent and reverend persons. There was rather too much of this kind of thing in his speech and that of Mr. H. FOWLER, and too much also of a desire to conceal the meaning of the measure from the docile Radical majority. Mr. RICHARD is not Mr. GLADSTONE, and some of his followers, had they understood the drift of his remarks, might have been induced to vote according to their consciences. As it is, though the amendment of Mr. BERESFORD HOPE was rejected by a small majority, the further progress of the Bill was stayed.

The question of building over disused cemeteries, to which we adverted last week, had its bearing on Mr. RICHARD'S proposals. He is anxious, though he did not divulge any tangible reason why, that cemeteries should not be consecrated. The state of things revealed by the evidence taken before Mr. HANNAY as to the Peel Grove case has no horrors for him. He thinks episcopal consecration, by which the desecration of the ground is prevented, is a desecration in itself, and prefers all the greater evils that may ensue to the lesser one of wounding the tender feelings of a Nonconformist. In questions of this kind it is common to talk as if all Dissenters are at one. We have sometimes been told that in matters relating to cemeteries, and such like, the wishes of Dissenters should be respected, as they are almost, if not quite, as numerous as Church people. But those who argue like this, and Mr. RICHARD is one of them, forget that, though the Church is one, the whole body of Dissenters—if it is possible to talk of a whole body which consists of a hundred different sects and creeds, who only hate the Church less than they hate each other—is disunited, has many different and antagonistic aims, and yet professes to want the Church to be reduced to the same position as itself, though the result must be disastrous beyond measure to sectarianism. In short, Mr. RICHARD'S speech, with its mockery of moderation, simply came to this:—"We have got all we really "want, and most of what we are likely to get; but "let us lose no opportunity of worrying those who "differ with us, even on such unsubstantial and illusory "issues as are presented by the Cemeteries Bill." Mr. BERESFORD HOPE swept away Mr. RICHARD'S cobwebs at once, with the unintended help of Mr. RATHBONE, who, unfortunately for his case, told the House that it was desirable to vote for the Bill "because it would remove a subject "of dispute," a reason which would apply with double force to, say, Mr. GLADSTONE or Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT. If Mr. RATHBONE'S argument is of any value, the PREMIER and the HOME SECRETARY should be sent to keep Mr. BRADLAUGH company in the lobby. "To remove subjects of dispute," it was pointed out, is the creed of the so-called Liberation Society, a society formed of "Calvinists, Agnostics, and "persons of almost all forms of belief, or absence of belief," to do for the Church of England what the Dissenting sects have done for themselves. They have got rid of Church-rates, of ecclesiastical influence in Universities, of the Irish Church, and of the old Burial Laws. On that last occasion it was said that nothing more was wanted or would be asked for—a favourite Radical pledge. Mr. RICHARD has Mr. GLADSTONE'S good example for breaking it, and so takes a second leaf out of his leader's book. When the members of the Liberation Society found that they were no longer able to pose as martyrs, they sought about for another "injurious subject of dispute." They have found it in a beneficent and ancient law, which, while it inflicts hardship on no one, is a blessing directly or indirectly to millions. The old law and custom which presumes every one to be a Churchman is a sad thorn in the side of such Dissenters as Mr. RICHARD. When Methodist and Congregationalist desert thee, it says to the poor, the Church is still thy mother. The new cemeteries have a portion set apart for those who conscientiously object to lying in consecrated ground; but Mr. RICHARD is not content with a slice. He must have all. The settlement of 1880 was exceedingly distasteful to a majority of Churchmen, but they have, with exceptions which only prove the rule, submitted to it without grumbling. As Mr. DAVENPORT reminded the House, the assurances of Mr. RICHARD and his friends that the Act of 1880 settled the matter were worthless, like other promises from the Ministerial side. They will bring this proposal, or another like it, up again and again, whenever they can get an opportunity, and it is only to be hoped that the Bills they present will always be of the vague and fantastic character of that practically talked out on Wednesday. Nibbling, as a policy, is not worthy of a party which pretends to such dignity as that led by Mr. RICHARD. Yet it cannot be said to have any other. There is nothing bold, open, or aboveboard in their attacks on the Church they do so desperately envy. On the contrary, they bring in year by year little higgling measures like the present one—measures which, were they passed, might slightly impoverish a few Churchmen, but could not make any Dissenter a penny the richer or a degree less spiritually proud.

MONACO.

THE subject of Monaco has been for some time past put prominently before the public. Recent letters published in the newspapers have repeated the annual complaints of some who pass the winter or spring on the Riviera, and who are scandalized at the gambling which goes on at Monaco. The great majority of these letters describe Monaco as simply a public nuisance—as a gambling hell where characters of the worst description congregate from all parts of Europe, and to which no respectable man can take his wife or daughters. There is often not a little exaggeration in these complaints, but it must be admitted that in the main they are not without some foundation. The question has been lately raised in the French Senate, and M. FERRY, with the concurrence of Lord LYONS and Signor MANCINI, the Italian Minister for Foreign Affairs, declares himself ready to take such steps as may seem necessary in the matter. What these steps may be it is not stated. Supposing that the reigning Prince should simply refuse to act on the advice given him to suppress the gaming-tables, by what means and by what Powers is he to be coerced? Lord ASHBURNHAM, in a recent letter to the Times, clearly puts the dilemma in which France and Italy will severally be placed. It cannot, of course, be denied that public gaming-tables do much mischief; but it is equally true that the management of the gaming establishment at Monaco reduces the mischief as far as it can be reduced. In the first place, there is "a maximum stake, which is a check "on the extravagance of the rich; and a minimum stake, "which is a check on the imprudence of the poor." There are further checks on improvidence in the facts that the stake must be laid in cash on the table at the time of playing; that, without special permission, no inhabitant of the neighbourhood of Monaco is admitted; and that no person under age and no domestic servants are admitted at all. Now with what face can either the French or the Italian Government interfere? It is perfectly notorious that at the French watering-places these are recreative institutions practically open to everybody with a decent coat on his back which differ only in name, but not one whit in purpose, from the establishment at Monaco; and that the opportunities for being fleeced are much greater and the safeguards fewer in the latter than in the former. The case in Paris, as stated by the Débats, is as bad, or worse. Till these hells are put down, with what justice can France demand of the little Principality of Monaco, which is still legally semi-independent, the suppression of the tables? The case of Italy is still worse. For there the lottery is a public and national institution, conducted by the Government itself, which makes a large profit out of it. The mischief done at Monaco is slight compared with the artificial taste for gambling which the Governmental lottery carries into the poorest Italian homes. A man of ample means may legitimately spend a small portion of his income on the pleasure and recreation which is often derived from games of chance; though he cannot, with public approval, spend more than a small portion on amusements of such a kind. But the sure tendency of the Italian lottery is to lead the whole mass of the poor to trust to luck rather than to regular work. To both France and Italy the Prince of MONACO has thus an easy answer. To both he can say:—"Granting the sin, "you are worse sinners than I am. Put your own house "in order first, and then I shall be glad to hear what you "have to say about mine, which, if it be in a bad state, is "still in a better state than yours."

Mischievous as either reckless or professional gambling always is, it may happen that by suppressing such an establishment as that of Monaco the evils that we attempt to cure may be intensified. The circumstances in this case are somewhat peculiar. Stretching along the Riviera from Hyères to beyond Genoa, a series of watering-places have sprung up of late years, frequented in great part by people who are idle and wealthy. Even if they work in their own countries they go to the Riviera for their spring or winter holiday. Among such a class gambling is sure to be a favourite amusement. How little, after all, the public tables at Monaco have to do with the promotion of gambling in that region is shown by the fact that there is, as every one familiar with that region knows, more high play, unregulated, at Nice than, regulated, at Monaco. And all along the Riviera anybody who wishes to get rid of his money by gambling can find a dozen places where he can do so with greater ease and less publicity than at Monaco, and where he is much more at the mercy of the professional rook. As to the mischievous class of persons who always hang about a public gaming-table, it is by no means clear that it is not better that they should be concentrated in one or two places rather than scattered over the whole of the Riviera. The most inexperienced pigeon is more on his guard at Monaco than if he were sitting between the English chaplain and a blackleg at San Remo, and invited by the agreeable stranger to have a quiet game of cards after dinner. It is not at all certain that the abolition of the public tables at Monaco would not thus diffuse and increase what we all admit to be an evil. The recent case of the Park Club shows that the worst evils of a public hell may be reproduced in a private establishment. And while such private establishments are tolerated (although they are well known and can be legally suppressed) in large numbers in France, and while in Italy the Government itself is the manager of a gigantic system of gambling, we cannot see that either country has the right to say a word on the subject to the Principality of Monaco.

"ADVICE" TO THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

THE Franchise Bill has been read a third time nemine contradicente, as Mr. GLADSTONE proudly requested the SPEAKER to record; and no doubt, after a debate in which the PRIME MINISTER has taken part, the fact is one worthy to be held in remembrance. Among the many remarkable properties of his oratory, that of conciliating opposition, or of reconciling his adversaries to defeat, has never, so far as we are aware, been numbered. Most assuredly no one would have been disposed to attribute it to the speech in which he moved the third reading of his tricky measure the other night. The Bill having reached its last stage in the Lower House, the need of artifice and subterfuge was past, and the time he seemed to feel had come for putting a little heart into his somewhat languid followers. An excellent occasion was at hand; for had not the leader of the Opposition in the House of Lords had the audacity to express his opinion as to the reception likely to be accorded by that assembly to a measure which "they had not seen, and the "contents of which," as the ATTORNEY-GENERAL's positive genius for hyperbole induced him to add, "they could not "know"? The moment had evidently arrived for exhorting the impenitent peer, and for proving to the swashbucklers below the gangway that their leader could ruffle it with the best. "Beware of entrance to a quarrel" was the motto selected by Mr. GLADSTONE for the speech of a characteristically arrogant and unseemly menace which he fired off last night at Lord SALISBURY and the Upper House. Some of us, however, may be of opinion that the PREMIER might have made a better choice of text. His ostentatious pretences of moderation, his exaggerated eulogies of his love of peace, the thin disguises of one kind and another through which the truculent import of his utterances looked so plainly forth, are less suggestive of POLONIUS than of BORADIL. If a current phrase, dating also from the Elizabethan period, must necessarily be sought for it, we commend to Mr. GLADSTONE's consideration the often-quoted apostrophe of the tavern-hero to his weapon:—"Lie thou there, good sword! Heaven "send I may have no need of thee!" For it was in the truly becoming and dignified spirit of this utterance that the PRIME MINISTER approached the House of Lords. He will not assume that they could do so monstrous a thing as to exercise their constitutional right of rejecting his Bill, and, having thus flung his sword for a moment on the table, he immediately snatched it up again, to show the trembling peers how it will fare with them if indeed he "shall have need of it." If the Lords should dare to throw out the Franchise Bill, and thus bring about a conflict between the two Houses, the PRIME MINISTER "would not "undertake to put a limit to the mischief and difficulties "which might result." "Most grave, he is confident—too "painfully confident—they will be," but "what the ultimate "issue would be he has no doubt." With which mysterious threat, subsequently interpreted by Mr. ARTHUR BALFOUR to mean that the Constitution should be revised in such a way as to prevent the repetition of such conduct by an independent branch of the Legislature, Mr. GLADSTONE left Lord SALISBURY and his party in the Upper House to their agitated reflections.

It was reserved for the ATTORNEY-GENERAL to undertake the task of reconciling his chief's utterances with the obligations of Ministerial decorum; and this he essayed to do by protesting against its being said that "the words "used by the PRIME MINISTER constituted a threat, when "they were simply words of advice." Threat and advice, however, are not mutually exclusive terms. The formula of "your money or your life" might be expressly accompanied by—and, indeed, in the mouth of any humane highwayman would tacitly convey—most earnest advice to the traveller to adopt the former alternative. The distinction which Sir HENRY JAMES intended to draw was probably one between "threat" and "warning"; and we are quite willing to admit that this, at any rate, is substantial. A threat, unlike a warning, does undoubtedly involve the idea of contemplated action on the part of the threatener. We threaten a man with legal proceedings, not warn him of them. We warn him of the approach of a railway train, not threaten him with it. And it is, no doubt, open to Sir HENRY JAMES to contend that Mr. GLADSTONE's admonition to the Lords was an example of the latter kind. Unfortunately, however, for this contention it is notoriously opposed to the facts. Everybody knows that Radical warnings to the House of Lords against the consequences of doing their duty have in almost every, and certainly in this, instance no meaning whatever, except as indicating an intention on the Radical's part to endeavour to create the dangers against which he professes to warn. Everybody knows, from the most timid of Conservatives to the most blusterous of Gladstonians, that "the country" if left to itself would accept the rejection of the Franchise Bill with perfect equanimity. What is really meant when the contrary is asserted is that Mr. CHAMBERLAIN and the Caucuses, Mr. SCHNADHORST and Mr. SCHNADHORST's merry men, are not on their part prepared to accept such an event in the same placid spirit, that they will throw themselves into a stage-fury over it; and that they will set at work the whole machinery of opinion-manufacture to persuade the constituencies that they themselves are equally indignant. This, we say, is the perfectly well-understood meaning of Mr. GLADSTONE's "advice" to the House of Lords, and, with all respect to Sir HENRY JAMES, we must, at least until the PRIME MINISTER himself takes the distinction in hand, continue to regard it as a threat. We shall further permit ourselves to say that it is a threat of a peculiarly audacious character, proceeding as it does upon an assumption which is itself almost as coolly defiant of the truth as any that has ever yet served the purposes of electioneering bounce. For the assumption, of course, is that, in rejecting the Franchise Bill upon the grounds on which they meditate its rejection, the Lords would be opposing themselves to the explicitly or implicitly declared will of the country; and this involves a no less monstrous proposition than that the constituencies in 1880 not only answered a question which was never put to them, but answered it "with a circumstance." The technical issue submitted to them was one of foreign policy; but the Radical theory now is that the electorate, upon being asked whether they preferred Mr. GLADSTONE's foreign policy to that of Lord BEACONSFIELD, replied:—"Yes, a Franchise Bill by all means; and, hark ye, let it "be an imperfect one. We particularly insist that enfran-"chisement shall be separated from redistribution, so that "we may not know, as indeed we have never wished to "know, where we are going." This, and nothing less than this, is the proposition which Mr. GLADSTONE would have to maintain in order to make out that he is really "warning" the Lords and not threatening them. Upon anything short of this assumption the answer to his "advice" would be obvious. It would be that, even if he were right in assuming that the country has a natural preference for imperfect Reform Bills, no just and reasonable nation would resent opposition to its undeclared wishes; while if, on the other hand, Mr. GLADSTONE's assumption were incorrect, the Lords would earn the gratitude of the country by rejecting the Bill.

As to the PREMIER's plea of the "impossibility" of passing a perfect measure, that is essentially matter of opinion, and not of fact; and even Mr. GLADSTONE himself can hardly imagine that an indignant people would rise and sweep away the House of Lords for not being convinced by reasoning with which he has contrived to [illegible] himself. Apart from the severity of the punishment, they would, for well-known reasons, be an extremely [illegible] one to inflict upon such grounds. For the contingency of Mr. GLADSTONE's converting himself from his convictions has always to be taken into account; and a House of Lords once abolished for dissenting from his opinions could hardly be restored on his recantation. The mere contention, therefore, that enfranchisement "could not pos-"sibly" have been united with redistribution, if the whole United Kingdom were to be dealt with in one Bill, is not sufficient to justify these rude menacings of the House of Lords. For, in the first place, non constat that the whole United Kingdom, and notably Ireland, ought to have been included in one Bill; and, secondly, the precedents of the only two Reform Bills previously passed in this country have proved not only that enfranchisement and redistribution can be coupled in the same measure, but that Parliaments less subservient than the present have refused to permit their separation. And, lastly, if Mr. GLADSTONE's contention on this point were absolutely sound, it would be irrelevant. For it would not justify his refusal to postpone the operation of the Bill until redistribution has been effected. There is, in short, no warrant either of fact or argument for the tone which he has thought fit to assume towards the House of Lords. That House, we trust, will do its duty on the Franchise Bill; and it is, we suppose, a stroke of the PRIME MINISTER's much-vaunted tactics to have supplied those peers who may have been hesitating about their votes with an additional motive for vindicating their constitutional independence.

COACHING.

AMONG the popular sights of the London season the meets of the Four-in-Hand Club and of its somewhat less distinguished brother, the Coaching Club, rank high. These are festivities to which "people go," and where people go—that is to say, the right people—others who approach more or less nearly to the right people desire it to be assumed that they are forced to go likewise. A seat on a popular coach is the seat of distinction. Often a Royal personage shares the box with some well-known member of the Four-in-Hand, and on the coaches that follow after fair women and brave men are usually to be seen. The meet is a very pretty sight. The horses are beautifully groomed, the harness is something more than merely cleaned, every vestige of metal-work shines resplendent, and the coach is as good as new. Every one is well dressed, for Englishwomen dress admirably in spite of criticisms from the Continent; and certainly in no country is a servant who has to do with horses so neatly turned out as in England. If such a whip as the Duke of Beaufort is at the head of affairs the start is a particularly interesting spectacle. Well-trained teams follow on. The whole business is creditable, because it is simple; if it were not simple, in some cases it would be all the more creditable, because good men would show how obstacles are to be overcome. But here we arrive at the fact around which we have been cautiously hovering—there are a great many men who climb on to the box of a coach nowadays, who hold their reins beautifully and their whip as a whip should be held, while the horses are standing still; but who get into serious difficulties when everything ceases to go quite smoothly. It is the simple faith of the coachman proper that a beneficent Nature supplied humanity with a left hand in order that the reins might be held therein, and with a right hand as a socket for holding the whip in repose, and as an apparatus or machine for aiding its application to the horses. Nothing could be simpler in theory; in practice the simplicity is not by any means so marked for the inexpert—which is much the same as saying for the inexperienced—driver of a team. "I am the owner, I wish I could say the master, of the four best hunters I ever had in my life," a horseman known to poor Whyte-Melville once wrote to a friend. To acquire four of the best coach-horses any man need desire is not so difficult a business; the driving of them when acquired is quite another thing.

The reason why men do not drive nowadays with the skill which used to characterize the gentleman dragsman is easily found. They have not the practice, and what practice they do have is rarely of the serviceable sort. Sometimes men go still to one of the two or three professional drivers who keep scratch teams as well as perfect ones, and permit their pupils to pull the animals' mouths about in Battersea Park; but the coachman of the present year of grace usually has a team "made" for him, he chooses his own road, and he goes his own pace. Our fathers learned to drive in a rougher school. They secured a seat on the box of a stage-coach by the side of a sound coachman, they took the reins—other passengers no doubt regarded the proceeding with varying sentiments—and they learned from their mentor the way they should go. Anything that could gallop a bit and could be persuaded to pull—and there were few that could not—was thought good enough for a team on many of the old roads. "Three blind 'uns and a bolter" was often the change from a confirmed kicker, a leader that pulled your arms off, a wheeler that would not start, and a fourth with an assortment of vices, any of which might come uppermost at any moment. Time had to be kept or trouble ensued; and it was behind such teams as this that the art of driving was to be mastered. The student acquired a good seat on the box, because the better the seat the more command a man has over his animals. He found out how to hold his horses together without pulling them, because the less they were interfered with when going freely and well together the faster they travelled. He did not endeavour to start the coach by the leaders, because he discovered that such a proceeding was likely to break the bars; and he found out that when he wanted to stop, a hint to that effect must be first conveyed to the wheelers. The art of hitting his horses he also picked up. "Why, bless you, sir, there's some of 'em as never could hit a horse; and as for hitting a near-side leader, why they sit a picking at 'em as if they were trying to pick a penny out of a pint pot, instead of turning their wrists under and letting their thong go." Such was the criticism of a professional coachman on amateur driving a good many years back; and since then things have certainly not improved. Courage is rarely wanting in the modern coachman. That credit may be given him; but when he uses his whip he is very prone to use it at the wrong time and in the wrong place. To hit a leader above the bars is bad, particularly if the whip catch, as it is apt to do, especially if the lash be wet; but in using their whips not a few members of the two leading Clubs are at fault, always presuming that they hit their horses where they intend to hit them. Another most important piece of knowledge which the coachman of a former day acquired was how to harness his team. After driving all sorts of animals, he could not fail to note how much difference a comparatively slight change in the harness, the loosening of a curb, the alteration of a coupling rein, or some such trifle, made to the ease and comfort of driver and driven. It is a common fault at the present time to pole horses up too tightly; but this was seldom the case years ago, for when horses were poled up too severely, or in any way badly put to, their capacity for work was constrained. This is all very well when a man is taking his load to Richmond, and having allowed himself ample time, is not particular to half an hour. It was different when being a minute late meant paying a fine. Very few amateur whips could go into their stables and, with the harness taken to pieces and thrown in a heap, put their teams to; but no one is a real coachman till he can do this, or show how it should be done.

By the side of a thorough coachman, or, far better still, in command of a well-horsed coach, few pleasures are more delightful than bowling along a well-made English road. Dr. Johnson preferred to be inside a post-chaise with a pretty woman; but, then, the Doctor was not a sportsman, and would doubtless have apprehended that disturbance of the centre of gravity which would not impossibly have led to the overturning of the vehicle. The railway is well enough. One sees delightfully rustic landscapes from the carriage-window, but they are not immediately around one. The blossoming boughs do not brush against one's shoulder in the train as they do on the box, the odour of the cottage gardens is not wafted into the railway-carriage windows. In the train there is no greeting to be exchanged with the passing rustic, no cheery word with the farmer jogging along on his cob; and between the hospitality of the way-side tavern where the coach stops and the untempting display at the railway refreshment-room there is no comparison, or, to put it otherwise, there is a very marked comparison of the sort which is odious. The stroke of the horses' feet on the road has a cheery sound, and for music let any one say which is preferable, the shriek of the whistle or the coach-horn, the alternation of tonic and dominant in the key of C major, which, simple as it is, has a significance of its own, telling as it does—if the suggestion be not overcharged with sentimentality—of a day when Englishmen were kindlier and heartier; when better feeling prevailed between different classes; when, if elections were keenly fought and hardly won, the sturdy foes of one day would be ready to shake hands and be friends the next, or, at any rate, did not lose all respect for each other in the course of the contest.

There was doubtless another side to the matter. The traveller by train who can pull up the window against which the rain dashes and down which it streams, who is safe and snug in the corner of his carriage with a rug round his knees and a good light thrown upon his book or paper, may have his doubts as to the infinite superiority of a coach over a railway-train; and as the guard opens the carriage-door with his "Tickets, if you please, sir!" and the cold wind whistles in, these doubts may be momentarily confirmed. Artists who illustrate books on coaching never fail to represent one team up to their hocks in snow, with perhaps some sturdy animals from a farmer's cart harnessed on more or less adroitly to pull the coach out of some stiff place from which its own horses are unable to move it. But these are the exceptions. If the coach in the snow-storm is to be emphasized, so must the railway-train in the dog days. We pity the man on the box down whose neck a stream of melted snow is trickling; he would be better in the train. On the other hand, the railway traveller who vainly seeks to exclude the burning rays of the sun by drawing the curtains over the window of a stuffy carriage that very little imagination would convert into an oven, would be far more comfortably placed on the box-seat of a coach, passing rapidly over the breezy downs, into a tunnel beneath which the train is about to rush with a horrible screech.

It is by no means our object to deter fairly good coachmen from pursuing the sport, and it is for the most part only fairly good men that criticism will touch; because the good drivers know that they are at home on the box, and the bad drivers persuade themselves that they are. Modern coaching has its uses. It gives interest, amusement, and exercise to gentlemen, much employment to servants, and benefits many trades. But—a few noteworthy exceptions apart—the standard of amateur coachmanship is far from high. A man often likes to keep a drag, but does not like to devote the necessary time to learning to drive it, not believing that what is worth doing at all is worth doing well. If such a man would consent to be driven, we will not say by his own coachman, but by a friend who is a master of the art, there would remain little to be said. The owner, however, thinks that this would not look well, and so he tries to do what is beyond his skill; which looks worse. What he should do is to engage the services of one of the first-class professional drivers who may be seen any day at Hatchett's Hotel, and with his assistance put together and drive as many scratch teams as he can obtain the use of. Nothing but practice can give a man an even feel on his team; and as few things are more delightful than to see four good horses going within themselves under their driver's command, few things are more distressing than to see one leader pulling, one boring, one wheeler hanging away from the pole, and the other hugging it, while the driver does not know how to hit any of them, and would not dare to do so, if he could keep his temper, were his knowledge more extended. At last by a sort of fluke he catches the off-side leader a cut on the inside of the thigh; the response is a kick which results in a leg over the trace, and the apprehensions of the men on the coach who have been nervously watching their host's proceedings—we will hope that there are no ladies on that dangerous eminence—are in danger of being verified.

THE AGE OF BLAGUE.

AT the end of a month the beginning of which was flattered by the excitement arising from the now historical "G." article, it is not ill timed to sing of blague. The article in question is the smartest thing yet done by any English journalist in the quality of blagueur; and the fact that it did not take in the wiser of that journalist's fellows does not detract from its smartness. But it is not of "G." that we propose to touch the lyre—an appropriate instrument enough. It is of the tendency of the day which made "G." possible—as an actual fact, instead of as an unborn letter waiting in limbo for the hour and the man. Of course blague is no new thing. Man is an animal blaguabile blaguis rite blaguatis at least as much as he is animal rationale. But every age has its particular form of blague, and the particular form of the present day appears to be the blague personal. The beauty of "G." consisted not in his matter, which was very vile matter, or in his style, which was almost bad enough from the literary point to be the work—but it is not necessary to finish that sentence. It consisted in the really brilliant note of personal suggestion conveyed in the use of the single letter imposing no responsibilities whatever on the suggester, who may have got a housemaid named Georgina or a literary friend who is a grocer. Personality, and personality only, was the bait, as it is the bait nearly always now. Not the least agreeable result of this is the delightful audacity which has come to characterize the blagueur. Not very long ago a person of mature age and respectable appearance was heard in a crowded club dining-room to inform his neighbour that he, the person of mature age and respectable appearance, was a constant contributor to a certain periodical and that a certain well-known man of letters was the editor thereof. The second statement proved the falsity of the first, for the person named had not, and never had, anything to do with the said editorship. But the agreeable audacity of the person of mature age consisted in the facts—first, that the man of letters he spoke of was a member of the club, and known to most of its other members, in any gathering of whom it was also all but certain that some actual contributors to the said periodical would be found. In a country-house smoking-room, a railway carriage, or elsewhere, the blague would have been very ordinary blague; in the place and circumstances it was nearly sublime. It was, though on a smaller scale, almost better blague than "G." Yet to "G." shall due commendation not be wanting, and, it may be said in the words of the parrot when the conjurer happened to blow up the ship's magazine, "That's first rate! What'll he do next?" These were the last words of the sagacious bird as with the rest of the crew it conjugated the verb ire ad astra. In less trying circumstances, now that his month of brief but lively fame has expired, the same words may be pronounced on "G."

It is, however, as has been pointed out, rather of "G.'s" victims than of "G" that we proposed to speak, rather of Bertrand (taken in his character of victim rather than in that of accomplice) than of Robert Macaire. The race of Bertrand is numerous in the land nowadays, and appears in innumerable varieties. Now he is gulled by theories of the Georgian and Hyndmanic kind, in which case it is observed that the mention of a gallows is very painful to his ears, and causes him to exhibit even more emotion than that congregation of birds to whom our dear Alice innocently unfolded the merits of her cat Dinah. Now (and very often) he believes in Mr. Gladstone, and is quite certain that, if Mr. Gladstone were turned out, the stars would mingle with the ocean and a general cataclysm would result. Now he is found listening to a political Dissenter, and quite convinced that the political Dissenter's one burning idea is to do good to the Church of England, and to free her from the disabilities and inconveniences inflicted by her unworthy sons. Bertrand believes that Mr. Gladstone did not ever mention the connexion between Clerkenwell and the clumsiness of Sergeant Brett in, as Mr. McCarthy has it, "getting in the way of a bullet" on the one hand, and the Disestablishment of the Irish Church on the other. He is sure that, if Lord Salisbury were in Downing Street, the butchers' shops would positively swarm with large blue flies. But it is chiefly in one particular aspect that we look at Bertrand to-day, the weakness which made him swallow "G."—great "G."—and which continually makes him swallow little G.'s, and indeed little letters all through the alphabet from A to Z.

There is—Bertrand may be surprised to hear—no more colossal blague in the world than the affectation of personal and private information which in politics, as in far minor matters, distinguishes certain newspapers at the present day. To begin with, the information is nearly always inaccurate; and, in the second place, if it were ever accurate, it would be nearly always unimportant. There was a time not so very long ago when private information was important in all things, and especially important in politics. There were no telegraphs—at least, none in general use—there was a comparatively limited and a very slow check of popular opinion, wise or foolish, on persons who were directly responsible for the conduct of events, and the number of those persons was small and confined in its constituents to a strictly defined class. Therefore political "tips" were then really valuable; at the present time they are nearly valueless. Every one who has any connexion with the press, and at the same time with political life, knows this perfectly well; but the public does not know it, and so paragraph-mongering journalism succeeds. Until very recently this journalism was chiefly confined to the provincial papers, but it has now spread to London, and though its results are an amusing spectacle to those who know the ropes, they are misleading and mischievous, because they interfere with any attempt on Bertrand's part to form his own opinion. The old tyranny of the leading article was bad enough, and every one who can remember dinner-tables even ten or fifteen years back can remember the man (he is rare now, and that is the only good of the paragraph system) who solemnly discoursed to the hapless guest nearest him at dinner the contents of a newspaper article which the said guest had read, and very likely seen to be rubbish, eight or nine hours before. The paragraph-mongers and the evening papers have killed this good man, but they have put a worse in his stead. The new bore "has reason to think" (that is, he has seen, as every one else has, a statement by the London Correspondent of the Bungay Blazer, or a paragraph at the end of the leaders of the Daily Flagpost) that such and such is the case about such and such a matter. The old bore pretended to reason, though he reasoned with another man's logic; the new bore pretends to have heard, and listens with another man's trumpet. And what he hears is mostly, if not wholly, blague. Let any man call to mind recent anticipations of recent important decisions or plans. Either they have been widely wrong, or they have been such as any shrewd person might guess, or they have been deliberate ballons d'essai, thrown up more or less in collusion with the persons concerned to see how much the public would stand. In the very few cases in which of late years really important information has been published exclusively by any newspaper, it has been a case of corruption or other misbehaviour—cases which naturally may be left out of account.

Therefore Bertrand, if he is an intelligent Bertrand (and he has occasionally some glimmerings of intelligence, though "on the whole he is Not intelligent"), may be very strongly advised not to put his trust in paragraphs, or in newspapers that deal in paragraphs, or in newspapers that deal in personal information of any kind whatever. It is blague, good Bertrand, and it is blague by which, whatever your friend Robert may represent to you, you, and not anybody else, are to be taken in. Space and time would fail to tell of the ways in which this blague is manufactured. Much of it comes from hangers about the House of Commons who put leading questions to long-suffering members, and whom the said members pay in their own coin on the model of "Thou sayest it." A good deal more is sheer invention—having no foundation in fact, stronger than the "flimsy" (very greasy and nasty tissue paper for manifolding, if Bertrand wants to know what "flimsy" is) on which it is often written. Other items come from what somebody says who has met somebody who dined last night with somebody else. Others from some obliging person who sends to his particular friend as a particular favour intelligence which he also sends at the same time to five hundred other particular friends, with a discreet insinuation that no one but the particular receiver has it at all. But whatever it is, and whatever its origin, it is blague, Bertrand, blague.

The enormous supply of persons nowadays who would like to be knowing, and who don't know, alone keeps up this profitable business. They don't know, for instance, that when a man calls a silver-grey goat coal-black, it argues a slight want of acquaintance with the agreeable original. It is quite safe to put off on them almost any bit of personal blague, for the fact of the personality tickles them, and they have not the means of checking its correctness. Very often they do not read a great number of newspapers (an infallible though a laborious corrective of blague), and take what their favourite print says for gospel. Of such is the kingdom of blague, and, it may be added, the premiership of certain Prime Ministers who need not be more particularly mentioned. Probably the most colossal piece of blague ever put off on a country of dupes was the assertion now to be met in every Radical newspaper that the time of the last Government was a time of rebuke [illegible] abolished, and of shuddering not to be thought of without madness. The time of the last Government, that is to say, the last four years, was a time of remarkable commercial and atmospheric misfortune, of gross political faction on the part of the Opposition, of some unnecessary and discreditable blunders on the part of the Government, but on the whole the most prosperous and honourable time that England as a nation (not as a congeries of traders) has known for a full quarter of a century. That is the fact: the other account is blague. Our friend Bertrand, good soul, swallows the blague in this as in other matters, and never troubles himself about the fact. And he helps his friend Robert to perpetuate the reign of blague, and shudders at the idea of its being over, and at the wicked men who want him to put an end to it and to think for himself, and see for himself, and take nothing on trust, and not ask himself (like an incomparable and impayable parson of the name of Banks the other day), "How it came that the best of Governments had any difficulties at all?" but "How it came that a Government which had such a remarkable amount of difficulties came to be considered the best of Governments?" But the contemplation of the Rev. Bertrand Banks (they called him "E. G." in the reports, but that is clearly mistaken) would lead us too far. Explicit de blagueis for the time.

EMMANUEL COLLEGE.

THE tercentenary of Emmanuel College has been a great success. Former members of the College testified their affection to the old House by coming up in large numbers; and America showed that she had not forgotten the place of Harvard's education by the presence of her Minister and of Professor Norton, who had come over as a special envoy from the Transatlantic Emmanuel. It is a commonplace that after-dinner speeches must be criticized with gentleness; but on this occasion there was little room for anything but cordial praise. The speakers had evidently prepared their utterances with much thoughtfulness, and said what they had to say in appropriate sentences, which had the rare merit of hearty sincerity. We could have wished to have heard a little more about Emmanuel, and a little less about Harvard; for we were assembled to celebrate the tercentenary of the mother, not that of the child. But, in the presence of such distinguished guests, it was natural that the speeches should take the turn they did; and to have altered a word of Professor Norton's oration would have been to have altered it for the worse. Still, we venture to assert, Emmanuel has a past of her own, a past which may not be one of great academic brilliancy, but is of very distinctive character, of which not only all Emmanuel men, but the University at large, may well be proud. As the Master happily pointed out, it was at one time a force and an influence in itself, a centre of the University, compelling all those who were students within it, not to uniformity of action, but to activity, intelligence, and thought. We are glad to be able to say now, what we hoped to have heard said by some of the speakers who followed him, that these traditions have been by no means forgotten by the present Society, and that the Emmanuel of to-day, though its studies have been widened, and keep pace with the intellectual development of the University, does no discredit to the Puritan founder who, portrayed by a contemporary of no mean skill, looks down upon visitors from one end of the long gallery, with a stern and somewhat forbidding expression, as though wondering why they come there to disturb his pious meditations.

The cause of the original distinctiveness of Emmanuel will be readily understood when it is remembered that it is really the first post-Reformation College in either Oxford or Cambridge; for Jesus College, Oxford, founded in 1571, was a special institution, restricted to natives of Wales; and Trinity College, Cambridge, founded in 1546, was, after all, only an expansion of King's Hall; and the traditions of that College, and of the other foundations which Henry VIII. united to it, would naturally be carried on in the new institution which he endowed so liberally, and whose statutes he or his advisers framed on such a remarkably broad basis. Sir Walter Mildmay had very different intentions in founding Emmanuel College. King Henry directed his students to make themselves familiar with literature, languages, and science; Sir Walter declares that he has proposed to himself one sole object, the training up of the largest possible number of persons in such a way that they may be made fit for the sacred ministry of the Divine Word and Sacraments. A new College will at all times be greatly influenced by the Master who presides over it at its birth; but this was still more the case three centuries ago, when the Master frequently held a number of offices in addition to the Mastership, and associated with the Fellows in far closer intercourse than is at present either customary or possible. Mildmay selected as his first Master a man who had been his intimate friend when they were both students at Christ's College, Laurence Chaderton. He had deliberately renounced the old faith, and, as we are told in an interesting Latin Life of him by Dr. Dillingham, one of his successors in the Mastership, of which an excellent and timely translation has just been published by a late Fellow of Emmanuel College, Mr. Shuckburgh, had suffered severely in consequence. His father, on learning his meditated change of creed, is said to have written him the following brutal letter:—

DEAR LAURENCE,

If you will renounce the new sect which you have joined, you may expect all the happiness which the care of an indulgent father can secure you; otherwise I enclose in this letter a shilling to buy a wallet with. Go and beg for your living. Farewell!

A lad of spirit was not likely to be changed by such a missive as this; he persevered, struggling successfully against great pecuniary difficulties, and achieved considerable academic distinction. His firmness and sincerity may have been the qualities which determined Mildmay to entrust his College to his guidance, for he is reported to have said, when Chaderton was offered a valuable benefice at the very time when he was asking him to accept a poor Mastership:—"If you won't be Master, I certainly am not going to be founder of a College." Whereupon Chaderton refused the living and entered upon his new duties. His strong Protestantism had become notorious in the University, and it is not unlikely that the choice of him as Master may have prompted Queen Elizabeth's remark to Sir Walter, when he next appeared at Court:—"Sir Walter, I hear you have erected a Puritan foundation." "No, Madam," he replied, "far be it from me to countenance anything contrary to your established laws, but I have set an acorn, which, when it becomes an oak, God alone knows what will be the fruit thereof." Thus far the conversation has been often repeated, but the sequel is, we believe, not known beyond the traditions of the Mildmay family. The Queen made inquiries into the objects of the new foundation, and, finding them satisfactory, gave Sir Walter a ring, still preserved by his descendants, to signify her approval. The charter is dated January 11, 1584; the statutes were given in October of the following year; and on the last day of May, 1589, the founder died. He had therefore but little opportunity of developing his College, and the eminence to which it rose almost immediately must have been wholly due to the energy and devotion of the Master. Puritan doctrines were at that time beginning to be popular at Cambridge; and a new College, unfettered by tradition, would be likely to adopt them. The statutes, however, did not render such adoption imperative, and the strong Puritan tone which distinguished the College must unquestionably have been set by Chaderton. Rumours of the peculiar observances in fashion at Emmanuel reached the ears of Archbishop Laud, and he seems to have made fruitless efforts to reform them. They are said to have received the Holy Communion in a sitting posture; to have refused to observe Fridays and other fasting days; to have used a form of prayer of their own; and generally to have permitted "disorders," as they are termed, of all sorts. The reputation of the College in these matters has been preserved in a contemporary ballad, called The Distracted Puritan, by Richard Corbett, Bishop of Oxford, and afterwards of Norwich. This very un-episcopal ditty has supplied an epithet to the College which Chaderton, if he ever read it, was probably not loth to accept. The Puritan is made to sing:—

In the house of pure Emanuel
I had my education,
Where my friends surmise
I dazzl'd my eyes
With the sight of revelation.

Boldly I preach, hate a cross, hate a surplice,
Mitres, copes, and rochets;
Come hear me pray nine times a day
And fill your heads with crotchets!

When Chaderton had held the Mastership for thirty-eight years, he gave an additional proof of the wisdom of Mildmay's choice of him by bravely determining to resign it in favour of a younger man. His reasons are stated as follows by Dr. Dillingham:—

He was unwilling that the Mastership should fall into contempt in his person. He knew that one generation presses hard on the heels of the other, and, as it were, tries to shoulder it out. It was wisest, then, he thought, to resign his office in good time. A younger man might perhaps govern the younger men, and restrain them better by his authority and example as being nearer their own time of life, and having more sympathy in their pursuits, while his own experience would not cease to be of service to the College, though he were separated from it. Perhaps he wished to see his own character surviving in the persons of his successors. If so, his prescience did not deceive him. He found immense pleasure in observing his College flourishing and triumphant under the rule of his successors—Preston, Sancroft, and Holdsworth, men of wide acquaintance, high honour and industry, and of liberal and munificent disposition.

Chaderton lived for eighteen years after his resignation, dying in November 1640. When his age was spoken of, he was fond of telling people that he was eight years old when Boulogne was taken by King Henry, September 14, 1544. According to his computation he would have been 104 years old when he died. His biographer, however, gives good reasons for assigning his birthday to 1539, which would make him two years younger. He retained his faculties to the last, and beheld his College prosperous in a way which may well be called triumphant. The admissions were at one time greater than those of any College in the University except Trinity College, rising in the ten years between 1627 and 1637 to an average of 65 in each year; and when the Commonwealth came, and twelve Masters of Colleges were dispossessed for their refusal to accept the new state of things, as many as eleven headships were filled by Emmanuel men. Their theological views may be gathered from the fact that eight of them sat in the Westminster Assembly; where it is pleasant to be able to record that some at least were on the side of toleration. By this time, however, the College had become, what Elizabeth feared it would become, a Puritan foundation; and not a few of the first settlers in New England were educated there. One of these was John Harvard. He is known to have been at Emmanuel in 1627 and 1628; in 1635 he proceeded to the degree of Master of Arts, directly after which he must have gone abroad, for in 1637 he was admitted a freeman of the Colony of Massachusetts, and in 1638 he died. Beyond this nothing is known about him, save that in New England's First Fruits, a brief tract published in London in 1643, we are told that "it pleased God to stir up the heart of one Mr. Harvard (a godly gentleman, and a lover of learning, there living amongst us), to give one-half of his estate (it being in all about 1,700*l.*) towards the erecting of a College, and all his library. The College was, by common consent, appointed to be at Cambridge (a place very pleasant and accommodate), and is called (according to the name of the first founder) Harvard College."

The sudden rise of Emmanuel College was, however, succeeded at no distant date by almost as sudden a collapse. The toleration which had guided the advisers of Elizabeth at the Reformation was remarkable for its absence in those who were in power during the Commonwealth and at the Restoration. The Engagement of 1649 and the Act of Uniformity of 1662 were equally fatal to the prosperity of the University. At Emmanuel Dr. Dillingham was ejected from the Mastership, and Sancroft, afterwards the non-juring Archbishop of Canterbury, was brought back to Cambridge to fill his place. Instead of the united College of former days, we find discord and divisions. "Half the Society," we are told, "were for the Liturgy and half against it, so it is read one week and the directory another"; and Sancroft himself, though he spoke complacently of the "general outward conformity to what is established by law, and I hope true principles of duty and obedience laid within, and a cheerful readiness to take off all the instances of that former singularity which rendered us heretofore so unhappily remarkable," was compelled to admit that the number of students had become wofully small, and that it was difficult to fill the vacant Fellowships even by importation from other Colleges. Yet such was the force of theological prejudice that he could bring himself to write to his former Tutor in a tone of exultation, June 17, 1663:—

I complain not that the throng is not so great about us as it was (especially reflecting what it was that drew the many hither). Blessed is the barren and miscarrying womb rather than she that is always teeming and drawing forth her breasts to the children of disobedience. May we be desert and wilderness all over, rather than send forth such unhappy swarms and colonies as we did in this age of sorrow; which were so many and so numerous that the stock is decayed at home, and we have none in the College capable of succeeding to our vacant Fellowships.

The gloom of this dismal picture is deepened in a subsequent passage, where he deplores the decay of Greek and Hebrew learning, not merely in Emmanuel, but in other Colleges also. Nor would it be difficult to show that the University had to wait for many a long year before the evil effects of the theological dissensions of the seventeenth century were overcome. The task was easier in the large Colleges, where competition for Fellowships must be always keen; but in the smaller, where such inducements to intellectual activity are wanting, it is only at rare intervals that the personal influence of some more than usually energetic Master or Tutor attracts brilliant men, and raises the reputation of the House to a foremost place. This happy result it has not, as yet, been the fortune of Emmanuel to achieve. The College can boast of having been the cradle of the Cambridge Platonists—Whichcote, Smith, Cudworth, More, and Culverwell, were all originally educated there; and during the 1.st century the names of many persons eminent in politics, theology, and literature might be cited; but it has never been able again to establish for itself a distinctive character, a special stamp of individuality. It is curious to note that it gradually became what Mr. Shuckburgh calls "the acknowledged home of Tory orthodoxy." Such it certainly was during the jovial Mastership of Richard Farmer (1775-97), whose essay On the Learning of Shakespeare, now probably but little read, marks a new departure in Shakspearian criticism, and might, had it fallen on an age when such studies were appreciated in the University, have inaugurated a new period of intellectual activity in the College. A few years later the prevailing political tone is amusingly illustrated in a letter from Dr. Samuel Parr (also an Emmanuel man), written to the Master, Dr. Cory, in 1819. He was giving to the College a copy of the editio princeps of Aristophanes which had belonged to Sir Samuel Romilly. "I cannot help smiling," he says, "when I recollect that your Tory-Rory College is to have a Present tainted in its progress to you by the Politics of two such naughty Whigs as Sir Samuel Romilly and Samuel Parr."

The original arrangement of the College buildings, notwithstanding a more than usual amount of alteration, can still be traced without much difficulty. Sir Walter Mildmay had got possession of the site of a Dominican convent before the buildings had been wholly destroyed. The church and the refectory, at least, were still complete, and he is said to have intentionally made manifest his contempt for ancient tradition by turning the former into the Hall and the latter into the Chapel. Loggan's view, taken in 1688, shows distinctly the outline of the great west window in the gable of the Hall, and in 1762 the ruins of the high altar were discovered near the fire-place of the Combination Room, which then, as now, was placed at the east end of the Hall. The necessary alterations in the conventual buildings, with the construction of a range of chambers, called The Founder's Range, on the south side of the court, were carried out by Ralph Symonds, an architect of talent, who afterwards built Sidney Sussex College, the Second Court of St. John's College and the Great Court of Trinity College. These buildings were ranged round the north, west, and south sides of the quadrangle, which then had no entrance from the principal street. The College was entered from a side street, through a picturesque archway, which opened into a small subsidiary court, on the north side of the former. These arrangements, with the exception of the construction of a range of chambers called "The Brick Building," at the south-east corner of the south range of the principal court, subsisted until 1662, when Dr. Sancroft determined to do away with "that great Mark of Singularity," the Chapel. His removal to the Deanery of St. Paul's prevented him from carrying out this change in person; but his successors, Dr. Breton and Dr. Holbech, consulted him on all points connected with it so regularly that it may be regarded as his work, and Sir Christopher Wren was probably induced to become the architect by his influence. The Chapel, evidently copied from that of Peterhouse, is skilfully placed on the east side of the quadrangle, and connected with the previously existing ranges of building by an open cloister with a gallery above. This work having been completed, the old Chapel was fitted up as a library; and had the alterations proceeded no further the ancient aspect of the College would not have been greatly impaired. At the beginning of the last century, however, the buildings began to show signs of decay, and in 1719 the Founder's Range was pulled down and rebuilt in the classical style then fashionable. The Hall underwent a similar treatment in 1760, when "the ingenious Mr. Essex" cased its walls in stone, and concealed the fine open roof by a flat plaster ceiling. Lastly, in 1769, the same architect pulled down the old west building, and constructed a new classical façade with an entrance from the main street into the principal quadrangle. But though the picturesque gabled buildings, the aspect of which Loggan has preserved for us, have all disappeared, the more modern structures occupy nearly the same site, and may possibly contain some part of the old walls. The gardens, however, surrounded by old clunch walls which go back to the days of the Dominicans, are still much as Loggan drew them. The tennis-court, it is true, has been taken away, but the old fishpond still exists, and so does the bath, surrounded by beautiful trees, of which the rarest are said to have been planted by John Martyn, Professor of Botany from 1733 to 1761. Among all the delightful gardens of Cambridge there is none so delightful as this.

We have been led to reflect on the past history of Emmanuel College by the very sober and decorous entertainment of last week. We cannot refrain from quoting, by way of contrast, Mr. Gunning's description of the bicentenary festival:—

On the 29th of September, 1784, Emmanuel College celebrated the two hundredth anniversary of its foundation. Its entertainment was of the most superb description. Several lively turtles were to be seen in tubs of water at the Master's Lodge, where the people were allowed for some days to gratify their curiosity with a sight so novel in Cambridge. One old lady, who had been looking at them very attentively, inquired, "Pray, sir, are them real turtles or mock turtles?" Upon this occasion (and which was ordinarily the custom in those days) there were many amateur singers among the members of the University. Dr. Randall, Professor of Music, who shone as much in convivial as in musical talent, was called upon for his celebrated song in the character of a drunken man. The representation was so faithfully given that Mr. Pitt—himself the life and soul of the party—was completely deceived, and, thinking him to be actually the "Great Sublime" he drew, expressed much anxiety lest the worthy Professor should meet with some accident when leaving the College.

ART SALES.

THE best known picture that found its way into the sale-rooms this spring was Sir Edwin Landseer's "Monarch of the Glen." There was much speculation as to the price that would be given for this work, which, after being "returned with thanks" by the Committee appointed to choose pictures to decorate the panels of the House of Lords, had been sold to Lord Londesborough for 350 guineas. Three works by Landseer had, at different times, been sold for more than 5,000*l.* a-piece, two had fetched more than 6,000*l.*, and it was understood that one had been privately disposed of for 7,000*l.* The "Monarch of the Glen" now went for 6,510*l.* Another Landseer, in the Skipper sale, that sold for 1,312*l.* 10*s.*, had been purchased for 1,680*l.* eleven years ago, and a small river scene, by the same artist, that had cost 173*l.* 5*s.* ten years ago, dropped to 110*l.* 5*s.* in the Potter sale. But the works of other great masters besides Landseer met with rebuffs. Turner's famous "Dunstanborough Castle—Morning after a Storm," which had realized 2,200*l.* the last time it had appeared at Christie's, was knocked down the other day at 945*l.*, a price at which it was supposed to have been bought in; and in the Skipper sale, the "Rosenau," by Turner, which had fetched 1,850 guineas in the great Gillott sale, went for only 830 guineas. Where and oh where was Mr. Ruskin? Turning to David Cox, we find "The Skirts of the Wood," that had brought 2,315*l.* 5*s.* in the Gillott sale, only producing 1,417*l.* 10*s.*, while "Changing Pastures," which had fetched 1,470*l.* a couple of years ago in the Hermon sale, was sold the other day for 1,260*l.*, and "Going to the Hayfield," which had cost 2,425*l.* 10*s.* so lately as last year, now brought in but 2,047*l.* 10*s.* A picture by Sir Charles Eastlake met with a worse fate still, for after selling in the Bicknell sale for 619*l.* 10*s.*, it only brought in 99*l.* 10*s.* this season. A Ruysdael which had fetched 1,470*l.* in the Novar sale, only realized 793*l.* in a sale at Christie's this summer. A couple of works by John Philip, which had cost 315*l.* 5*s.* and 215*l.* 5*s.*, only made 84*l.* and 91*l.* 7*s.* this year; and an Ary Scheffer which had been purchased at Baron Grant's sale for 1,458*l.* 10*s.*, was lately sold at auction for 556*l.* 10*s.* Nor has the depreciation been entirely among the works of deceased artists. There is no need to mention names; but two pictures, for each of which the artist who painted them declined to take 1,200 guineas five years ago, were knocked down at Christie's the other day at 304*l.* 10*s.* A picture by another well-known artist which was said to have been sold for 840 guineas four years ago, now went for 147*l.* But while some pictures have fallen very seriously in value, it must not be supposed that the depreciation has been universal. For instance, David Cox's "The Church at Bettws y Coed" realized 2,550 guineas, or nearly five hundred pounds more than it had fetched at Mr. Levy's sale a few years ago; and a Briton Rivière, which has been sold several times within the last few years, has been parted with at a profit on each occasion, the last price being 2,625*l.* Still, we fear there can be no doubt that upon the whole pictures have been selling this season at a depreciation.

Admirers of old prints had a treat this spring in the sale of the Dent collection at Sotheby & Wilkinson's, which far surpassed that of the Griffith collection last year in the total realized; but there was nothing in the Dent collection to equal the Van Thol, by Rembrandt, in the Griffith collection, which was sold for 1,510*l.* The best Dent print was Botticelli's "Assumption of the Virgin," which brought in 860*l.*, and went to the splendid collection of Mr. Malcolm, of Poltalloch. This print only fetched 22*l.* at the Ottley sale, 33*l.* 10*s.* in the Lloyd sale, and 42*l.* in Sir Martin Sykes's sale. A tiny print, by Franz von Bocholt, only 8 inches by 6, went for 350*l.* in the Dent sale. It was interesting to observe the difference between the value of a good and a poor impression from the same plate, when a print of the "Hundred Guilder" piece was put up; for last year a fine impression of this very print had reached 305*l.*, whereas only 16*l.* 10*s.* could now be obtained for the Dent impression. The Dent collection brought in altogether more than nine thousand pounds, and it is said to have cost only a third of that amount.

The Cesnola collection of antiquities from Cyprus, which was sold at Sotheby & Wilkinson's, contained a number of graceful glass vessels, many of them some two thousand years old; yet they did not "take" among British connoisseurs, who only gave from a few shillings to a few pounds for each lot. Indeed, when the beauty, the curiosity, and the antiquity of many of the objects is considered, the sale may be said to have been a failure.

Old Sèvres has been keeping its value. At the sale of the late Lady Sandwich's porcelain, at Christie's, a pair of gros-bleu vases, 16½ inches high, went for 850 guineas; and a pair of rose Du Barri jardinières, with painted medallions, from another collection, realized 1,627*l.* 10*s.* Other pieces, having gros-bleu or rose Du Barri grounds, also fetched high prices. But by far the most interesting sale of decorative objects was that of the Narford Hall or Fountaine collection. The Times goes so far as to say that this collection surpassed "all to be seen in the Hôtel Cluny, the Dresden Green Vaults, and our own British Museum and South Kensington," a statement which should, perhaps, be accepted with a certain amount of reserve. Messrs. Christie, Manson, & Woods brought out one of their beautiful illustrated catalogues in honour of the occasion, and although half the price, less than half the size of, and far more plainly bound than, the catalogue of the Blenheim enamels which appeared last year, it is a much more interesting book, and the objects represented in the photographs are infinitely more beautiful. To our taste, again, the modest grey binding was much to be preferred to the flaming scarlet covers of the former catalogues, especially when one had to carry the volume under one's arm about Piccadilly and St. James's Street. The private "Syndicate," which was formed in order to give the Government a sort of second chance of making purchases from this great collection, was a worthy successor of the voluntary association which was at one time proposed for the relief of Gordon, and we may add that it was far more effective. The Government has doubtless done much to make itself ridiculous this year, but that, after it had had the whole Fountaine Collection to pick and choose from, there should be any necessity for private people to purchase some of the principal lots in order that the Government should have a second opportunity of making up its mind, seems simply disgraceful. At the same time the greatest credit is due to the gentlemen who formed the Syndicate, and so handsomely joined in subscribing the large guarantee fund, and if it had not been for this Syndicate a larger number of beautiful works of art would unquestionably have been taken from this country. Most people know the prices of the chief objects sold at the Fountaine sale by heart, and to recapitulate them would be weary work, but it is impossible to notice a sale without making some mention of the prices. The first lots sold were pieces of majolica, and a plate less than eleven inches in diameter going for 920*l.* showed the sort of prices that were to be expected. The Syndicate was soon at work, and early in the sale it picked up a couple of Urbino plates at 252*l.* and 378*l.*, which were worth the money; but when the Palissy ware came on, it plunged more heavily, giving 1,510*l.* for a pair of candlesticks, each a foot high, and it got something of a bargain in a magnificent cistern, rather more than a yard long, at 1,102*l.* 10*s.* A finer though smaller cistern was knocked down to another purchaser at 1,911*l.* Nor did the Syndicate purchase the famous Briot ewer (about 12 inches high) at 1,300 guineas. Some Limoges enamels came next, and the beautiful ewer by Susanne de Court (10⅜ inches) was not considered dear at 1,312*l.* 10*s.* A ewer of somewhat similar design, by the same artist, went for 945*l.* at the Blenheim sale last year. The Syndicate secured a grand dish, over 17 inches in diameter, supposed to be by one of the Penicauds, at 776*l.* 10*s.* A dish, by another artist, painted with a representation of the same subject—the Supper of the Gods—was sold for 1,207*l.* 10*s.* at the Hamilton sale; but this dish was rather larger, and its arabesques were richer.

The return of the first day was more than 24,000*l.*, and the proceeds of the second day's sale were the same. Pieces of majolica which had been been purchased in the Bernal sale were now sold at a profit of seven, ten, and in one case twelve, hundred per cent. A magnificent oval Urbino dish, 26½ inches by 20¾ inches, painted with the finest arabesque work on a white ground with medallions, and a Scriptural subject in the centre, was fortunately obtained by the Syndicate, but 1,333*l.* 10*s.* had to be paid for it. The great event of the day was the sale of three pieces of the extremely rare Henri II., or Oiron, ware, which, by the way, is made of pipeclay. This ware was made between the years 1520 and 1550. A little candlestick, 12⅜ inches high, was bought by M. Clément, of Paris, for 3,500 guineas. There is said to be an even finer specimen than this of Henri II. ware in the collection of Mr. Magniac, which only cost 96*l.* at the Odiot sale in 1842. A mortier à cire (or perhaps a tazza), 5¾ inches high by 8 inches in diameter, was purchased by M. Manheim, of Paris, at 1,500 guineas. A smaller tazza, 4 inches high by 5½ inches in diameter, at the Hamilton sale fetched 1,218*l.* A Biberon, 9 inches high, was now sold to M. Clément for 1,060*l.* 10*s.* Some twenty years ago at the Pourtalès sale in Paris Mr. Malcolm, of Poltalloch, purchased a very similar Biberon for 1,100*l.* In Chaffers's book, published in 1874, the three Fountaine pieces of Henri II. ware, which fetched 3,500 guineas, 1,500 guineas, and 1,218*l.*, were respectively valued at 1,000*l.*, 800*l.*, and 500*l.*

The great day of the sale was the third, and the return was about 31,000*l.* The celebrated Limoges dish by Leonard Limousin, painted after Raphael's "Supper of the Gods," was sold for an enormous price. This is probably the finest specimen of enamel painting in existence. The Hamilton tazza, by Jean Penicaud, painted with the "Story of Samson," was considered its nearest rival, at any rate in this country. That piece went for 2,100*l.* at the Hamilton sale. The Leonard Limousin, 19¼ inches by 16⅜ inches, was now put up at 2,000 guineas, and sold at 7,000 guineas. We fear that in future this exquisite enamel will be degraded in the eyes of the public from a great work of art to a mere money token. It used to be the great Leonard Limousin; it has now become the seven-thousand-guinea plate. A ewer, 10½ inches high, by Jean Courtois, of very brilliant colouring, reached 2,300 guineas. At the sale of the famous Blenheim enamels last year, the highest price obtained was 1,040 guineas. This was for a piece by Jean Court; and at the Hamilton sale, the 2,100*l.* for the Jean Penicaud already mentioned, was the highest sum made by an enamel. The Syndicate was outbidden for the best lots, but it got a very good ewer by Jean Courtois for 378*l.*, as well as two dishes at 336*l.* and 798*l.* by the same artist. It was outbidden for a very rich dish, also by Jean Courtois, which went for 2,940*l.* In the earlier part of the afternoon, a dish of Gubbio ware, which had cost 142*l.* at the Bernal sale, now brought in 819*l.* A fine piece of Della Robbia ware, a yard and a half in diameter, fetched 425*l.* It is but seldom that any of this workmanship comes into the English market. A few fine specimens of Nevers ware were sold on the same day.

The fourth day of the Fountaine sale was devoted to what may be termed artistic odds and ends, and the great prize of the occasion was a carved ivory horn, something under 30 inches long, which was bought by a foreign dealer for 4,240 guineas. There are several fine ivory horns in the South Kensington Museum. One, that was considered unequalled, is carved with a sort of pattern work, whereas the Fountaine horn was decorated with cherubs' heads, masks, and birds. There are, or have been, many historical ivory horns, such as St. Oswald's horn, the horn of St. Ulphus in the Treasury at York, the horn given by Henry I. to the cathedral at Carlisle, the horn of Charlemagne at Aix-la-Chapelle, and the horn of Roland in the cathedral at Toulouse. Most of these were what are termed "tenare horns." They used to be called "olyphauntes," because they were made out of the tusks of the "olyphaunte whyche ys a grete beest," as Caxton says. A carved rock-crystal cup went for 860 guineas. At the Hamilton sale a very beautiful cup of the same material and workmanship reached 1,150 guineas. Very many of the finest objects in the Fountaine sale were bought to be taken abroad; and, if it had not been for the foreign competition, there would have been a great reduction in the 91,112*l.* 12*s.* realized by the collection. This was more than double the amount returned by the Strawberry Hill sale, which lasted twenty-four days, and half as much again as the proceeds of the Bernal sale. The Fountaine sale lasted but four days, and produced almost a quarter of the sum made by the seventeen days of the Hamilton sale, more than a third of that of the long sale of the San Donato collection, and about 15,000*l.* more than that of the Stowe sale, which went on for forty days.

This week connoisseurs and others have been enjoying the splendid collection of pictures by old masters from Leigh Court, which are to be sold to-day. The pictures by Rubens, Claude, Murillo, and Raphael are generally considered the gems of the collection; but criticism of works of art before a sale is to be deprecated. The principal pictures are reviewed in Dr. Waagen's Art Treasures, Smith's Catalogue Raisonné, Crowe and Cavalcaselle's great work, and Kugler's Handbooks. A critic in a leading journal, when writing of one of the most famous works in the Leigh Court collection, said, "Before this amazing picture" "all beholders must tremble." We went to King Street in order to witness the quakings of the great picture-dealers; but, strange to say, they bore the ordeal with so little apparent suffering that we almost began to think the picture sent to Christie's must have been a copy. To people of even moderate taste the exhibitions at Messrs. Christie, Manson, & Woods' of the Fountaine and Leigh Court collections have been by far the greatest pleasures of a rather dull London season.

SCOUTS AND THEIR CRITICS.

A CURIOUS correspondence which has appeared, or at least partly appeared, in the Oxford and Cambridge Journal, was reprinted the other day in the Daily News. It deals with that useful, if not very illustrious, class of persons known at Oxford as "Scouts"; whether indeed the corresponding class designated "Gyps" at Cambridge are intended to be brought under the same condemnation is not explained, though it may be feared that whatever holds good of the one is likely mutatis mutandis to hold good of the other also. However, as this is not expressly stated, our remarks shall be directed to the case of the Oxford scout. But first a word must be said about the question of name, for those immediately interested do not appear at all to accept the proverbial view—which does certainly often look like a popular fallacy—that "there is nothing in a name." There can be no doubt that scouts were always called scouts, and nothing else, "among men"—that is, undergraduates—whatever might be the usage "among the gods" who quaffed their nectar in Common Room. Nor are we aware that they made any objection to the name. But according to the testimony of "an Old College Servant," who addresses the Oxford and Cambridge Journal, and whose letter shows some signs that the schoolmaster has been abroad among the scouts—we beg their pardons, the college servants—also, it is very different now. They indignantly repudiate the name, as they "scorn the action" imputed to them by "Fair Play"—"which name," as the "Old College Servant" puts it, "is not generally appreciated by college servants." The Daily News, which might have been expected on democratic grounds to sympathize with this noble protest, is unkind enough to put it aside as unreasonable. It "cannot see why the word 'scout,' which has a military and rather dashing sound, should be so much disliked." But supposing there is any measure of truth in the charges brought against the scouts, and supposing also—what is perhaps a bold assumption, even in these enlightened days—that they are in the habit of studying Johnson's Dictionary, their dislike to the name becomes sufficiently intelligible. The only definition of the term provided by the great lexicographer has nothing very dashing or military about it, while it has a connotation unpleasantly suggestive, as will presently appear, of the indictment. "Fair Play" has preferred against "this man, whom he calls a 'scout.'" For Johnson defines him—the italics are ours—"one who is sent privily to observe the motions of the enemy." Now the very point of the indictment is this. "Fair Play" writes to call the attention of "leading Dons and undergraduates to the fact that every day, and frequently two and three times a day, men I believe to be scouts are to be seen coming from certain Colleges, and making their way homeward, with heavily-laden baskets, huge parcels, and crammed pockets." He adds a graphic touch:—"A few days ago I saw one of these men so heavily laden that he had to stop a tram car, and had great difficulty in getting in. Whilst I am writing, the very same man is going along towards his home bowed down with the weight of what I suppose may be called his 'spoils.'" To this challenge "an Old College Servant" replies, not by denying the alleged facts, at least so far as they are visible to the naked eye, but by a counter-challenge:—"Let 'Fair Play' call one of the City police to examine the heavily-laden basket, &c., and what will he see? In most cases his spoils"—our College Servant gets a little mixed here in his pronouns in spite of the schoolmaster—"will consist of the few crusts and pieces of bread which his masters have not had time to eat, and in all probability a few bones for the favourite cat or dog." There is an exquisite pathos in that artistic allusion to the despised "scout's" tender regard for his four-footed favourites. Who can suspect evil of "this man"—though he be called or miscalled "a scout"—whose daily thought is for the comfort of "the favourite cat or dog"? To be sure Schopenhauer was devoted to his pet spaniel, though he kicked his landlady downstairs and crippled her for life. But then Schopenhauer was a philosopher, and such little eccentricities are pardonable in a philosopher, but incredible in "the man called a scout."

It strikes us as a pity that "an Old College Servant" did not finish his letter with this masterly appeal to all lovers of cats and dogs. For his closing argument, if it is meant for such, is not very lucid, and may to some fastidious readers appear a little profane. "'Fair Play' has not made up his mind yet for the Church"—i.e. we presume to take orders—"because he could never use the text, 'Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost.'" There is, so far as we are aware, no rule of "the Church" binding all preachers to make use of that text, nor is it very obvious on the surface why "Fair Play" should be precluded from doing so. To interpret the text as a sanction or command to scouts to pilfer odds and ends from their masters—especially for "the favourite cat or dog"—may be within the lawful liberty of private judgment, but it may be asserted safely that no such authoritative interpretation has yet been affixed to it by any "Church." Meanwhile the controversy throws a new light on the question hotly debated two or three years ago about Oxford tram cars. Our readers may recollect that the proposal to introduce these useful but very unornamental innovations into the High Street, which moreover involved the widening, and therefore desecration, of the time-honoured Magdalen Bridge, was met by an influential and emphatic protest from a considerable body of old Oxonians. Among the signatories was Mr. Shairp of St. Andrews, the Professor of Poetry, who also wrote to the Times on the subject, partly in order to combat what he said was the only serious argument he had heard propounded in favour of this piece of Vandalism. It was urged that many of the scouts lived at Cowley, and the tram cars would be very convenient for bringing them in to their colleges in the early morning. To this plea Professor Shairp made a very effective reply, prompted possibly by his own recollections of a Balliol scout of former days, to be mentioned presently, for he was himself a Balliol Scholar. The scouts, he observed, were apt to be remarkable for obesity rather than the reverse, and a two-mile walk every morning would much benefit their digestion. It may not have occurred to him, or he may have left it to be inferred, that another objection to the proposed facilities for the locomotion of obese scouts might be found in the increased facilities thereby afforded for the simultaneous locomotion of "heavily laden baskets, huge parcels, and crammed pockets." But it is obvious that from this point of view masters who, like Mrs. Gilpin, have "a frugal mind," might find practical as well as æsthetic objections to the new tram cars. For it is equally clear that, if scouts in the Oxford sense of the term are rightly defined as persons who "privily observe the motions of the enemy," their masters are "the enemy," whose privity they naturally desire to escape in the purloining of their superfluous goods.

As to the question of collegiate discipline thus raised, it may well be left to the authorities on the spot tantas componere lites. To an outsider the first criticism likely to occur will be that there are scouts and scouts, and we may note in passing that "Fair Play" confines his impeachment to "scouts from certain colleges." There have certainly in former days been college servants, even in the proud position of college cooks, who were greatly maligned if no such sins could be justly laid to their charge. We seem to recollect a Christ Church tradition, how at the end of one long vacation Dean Gaisford addressed the Canons, then forming the governing body of the college, in reference to a certain peccant cook, who had been admonished in vain to mend his ways, and had unexpectedly deceased, in these words, "It has pleased Providence during the vacation to remove old ——, and if it had not, I intended to do so myself." On the other hand a vision floats before our memory of a Balliol scout, long since gathered to his fathers, honest but obese exceedingly, who had the singular privilege of serving successively two distinguished divines of very diverse type. His earliest master was Mr. Ward, then Fellow and Tutor of Balliol, and the much admired and much hated author of the Ideal. This scout was probably the only man in Oxford at the time who could have worn—as in fact he did wear—his master's cast-off clothes, for great as was the intellectual gulf between them, there was a close physical resemblance. And it used to be rumoured how, while commending his generosity, his scout would speak with bated breath of "Mr. Ward's great theological work." Mr. Ward married and departed—there were no married Fellows in those days—and by a strange irony of fate no less a personage than the present Master of Balliol succeeded to his rooms, and of course therefore to his scout, who transferred his devotion from the old master to the new, not indeed that he could have endued his ample limbs with Mr. Jowett's garments, but he used to talk thenceforth of "Mr. Jowett's forthcoming great work"—the Commentary on St. Paul's Epistles—perhaps with a dim sense of some mysterious flavour of suspected heresy attaching to both, though with a difference he was hardly enough of a theologian exactly to apprehend. There was another story told about his comments on his new master from which ill-natured people were apt to point a moral he certainly did not himself intend. A guest of Mr. Jowett's was going on Sunday evening to New College Chapel, and wanted a prayer-book. His host was out; so he appealed to the scout, "Has Mr. Jowett a prayer-book anywhere?" "Well, Sir," was the sententious reply, "he has got a prayer-book somewheres, but it would be very hard to find it." Another story, which we believe to be perfectly authentic, is told in connexion with the late Professor Conington, and it may be variously interpreted as favourable or unfavourable to the general character of scouts, according to the political prepossessions of the hearer. Between thirty and forty years ago a series of Tracts, containing both prose and verse, were started by the extreme Liberal party at Oxford, to which Mr. Conington then belonged—his opinions on these and other matters became considerably modified afterwards—under the title of Politics for the People. There was inter alia a poem of his addressed to "the priests of England, who at the altar stand," exhorting them to "cast aside their rosaries," and attend to more practical concerns, on which a distinguished fellow and tutor, who is now a dean, remarked that they might find it difficult to follow the admonition for this reason, if for no other, that they had no rosaries to throw away. But there was also an elaborate paper of Conington's on "the Condition of the People," and another tutor, famous in his day for logic and ethics, and of strong Conservative views, was asked by a friend, "What does Conington know about the people?" "Oh," was the prompt reply, "his knowledge of the people is a hasty generalization from his scout." We are afraid the tutor had not formed a very flattering estimate of "the residuum," and therefore presumably did not think very highly of the typical scout; but a closer study of the Tract, which is probably now out of print, might throw some light on the matter. Meanwhile if the speciality of a scout is "privily to observe the motions of the enemy," the lesson intended to be conveyed to "the enemy" by "Fair Play's" letter is evidently that he in turn should privily observe the motions of the scout, who, being "heavily laden," is sure—till he falls in with a friendly tram car—to move slowly. Some years ago there was a fierce war of pamphlets between Dean Burgon, then Fellow of Oriel, and a Censor of Christ Church as to the surreptitious smuggling of hot breakfasts into the latter establishment on Sunday mornings. The Censor declared that no such iniquity was permissible or possible. "But I see them, Sandford," replied Mr. Burgon in his next brochure, and a photograph soon appeared, which had a great run at Oxford, entitled "Mr. Burgon's back hair," where the indignant tutor was seen gazing from his bedroom window, which looked into Oriel Lane, while shaving, at the contraband convoy of forbidden delicacies through Canterbury Gate for the illegitimate delectation of the gilded youth of Christ Church. Cannot "Fair Play" onlist the services of some equally resolute censor morum among "the leading Dons or undergraduates," to whom his letter is addressed, "to observe privily" the contraband conveyance out of college of heavily-laden baskets, bundles, and stuffed pockets? And then, as "an Old College Servant" happily suggests, "one of the City police" may be trusted to do the rest.

THE BATTLE OF BOTHWELL BRIDGE.

THE victory of Drumclog did little more than expose the fatal weakness of the Covenant. On the morning of Sunday, June 1st, Claverhouse was flying for his life before the pikes and pitchforks of the "wild Western Whigs." Three weeks later, on another Sunday morning, June 22nd, they saw him again, and this time it was their turn to fly. But it was in those three short weeks that the cause of the Covenant was really broken, and not on Bothwell Bridge. The Solemn League was doomed before the English cannon were heard on the banks of the Clyde. When men begin to dispute among themselves the reason of their quarrel with the enemy, the end is not far off. Even such partisans as Wodrow and Laing cannot hide the fact that the English Government was far more surely and lastingly served by the dissensions and jealousies of the Covenanters than by the swords of its dragoons.

The morning after Drumclog Hamilton found himself at the head of a considerable body of men. The news of the victory had spread fast. From all parts of the country the roused peasants flocked to their revenge. Many of the petty lairds and gentry of the West came riding in at the head of their mounted tenants. Many even of those who had hitherto preferred liberty of person to liberty of conscience hesitated no longer to throw in their lot with a leader who seemed able to secure both. No one then was inclined to dispute that leader's title to command. He had shown himself on the previous day both brave and skilful, and stern enough to satisfy even those savage and uncompromising spirits whose favourite passage in the Bible they professed to teach was that which records the doom of the Amalekites. It was resolved to march on Glasgow. Had that resolve been taken twelve hours sooner, it is probable that the town would have fallen, and Claverhouse himself, perhaps, have never lived to write his famous despatch. But the delay gave him breathing time. The citizens were called to arms; barricades were hastily erected in the principal thoroughfares; his own soldiers, finding themselves safe among their fellows again, plucked up their spirits. When Hamilton arrived before the town he knew enough of his business to see it would be no case of Drumclog over again. Nevertheless he did not dare to refuse battle. His men advanced bravely, but the steady fire from the barricades was too much for them. After losing several of their number, while not a man on the other side had fallen, they withdrew into the open, whither Claverhouse did not care to follow them, and after a short halt, they continued their retreat to the village of Hamilton, where they bivouacked in the Duke's park. In this affair their leader by no means maintained the reputation he had won at Drumclog. It was said, indeed, that he would not face the barricades, but kept out of fire in a house at the head of the Gallowgate till his men withdrew.

On the following day the Council met at Edinburgh. Their first proceeding was to proclaim the rising an "open, manifest, and horrid rebellion." All the insurgents were summoned to surrender at discretion as "desperate and incorrigible traitors." After having thus satisfied their diplomatic consciences, they proceeded to more practical measures. The Militia was called out, horse and foot, in all the Lowlands, save in the disaffected shires. Those north of the Forth were to meet at Stirling, those on the south on the links of Leith. All were to bring provisions with them for ten days. The magistrates were ordered to remove all the powder and other munitions of war they could find in the city to the Castle. An armed guard was stationed night and day in the Canongate, and another in the Abbey. Finally, a post was sent to London on Linlithgow's advice to urge the instant despatch of more troops, and two shillings and sixpence a day of extra pay was promised to every foot soldier.

Meanwhile, Ross and Claverhouse had evacuated Glasgow, and marched east to join Linlithgow at Falkirk, while Lord Mar was sent with some horse to secure the passages of the Forth. The Covenanters were too busy with their own affairs to take much heed what their enemies were doing. They did, indeed, march into Glasgow, but beyond collecting the heads of the poor wretches who had been executed for the Pentland rising, and hanging one of the citizens on a prodigious gallows set up with much parade in their camp for the benefit of all prisoners they might take, they did nothing. They did not stay long in the town. Plans they seem to have had none, nor any settled organization or discipline. Moving restlessly about the neighbourhood from village to village and moor to moor, their preachers preached, as much against each other as against Pope or prelate, and their leaders quarrelled as though there were not a King's soldier in all Scotland, or Claverhouse himself were not within a dozen miles of them waiting for the moment to strike. There was no lack of arms among them, and their whole force at this time seems too have been not far short of eight thousand men. But no men of any influence or position in the country had joined them. With the exception of Hamilton, whose authority, since his cowardice at Glasgow, had sunk to a very low ebb, the preachers seem to have exercised the only control over the rabble, and such control, as was natural, seems rarely to have lasted beyond the length of their sermons, which, to be sure, were not commonly short. The two parties into which the Covenanters had ever since "the Mauchlin Testimony" been divided had now become more firmly marked and more bitter against the other than ever. The chiefs of the more moderate section, or Erastians as their opponents scornfully termed them, were John Welsh, a noted preacher, and David Hume. Hamilton himself, Donald Cargill, and Thomas Douglas were the most conspicuous on the other side. The demands of the former were temperate and reasonable. They asked for no more than they were willing to give. Against the King, his Government, and his bishops they had no quarrel they averred, if only they were suffered to worship God after their own fashion. Though they themselves had not accepted the indulgence, they were not disposed to be unduly severe with those who had. In a word, they were willing to extend to all men the liberty they demanded for themselves. On the other side all was confused, extravagant, fierce, unreasoning. What they wanted, what they were fighting to get, from whom they expected to get it, even their own historians are unable to explain, and probably they themselves had no very clear notions. They talked of liberty, by which they seem to have meant no more than liberty to kill all who on any point thought otherwise than they did; of freedom, which meant freedom from all laws save their own passions; of the God of their fathers, and every day they violated alike His precepts and their practice. To slay and spare not was their watchword; but whom they were to slay, or what was to be gained or done when the slaying was accomplished, no two men among them were agreed. For the moment the current of their fury seems to have set most strongly against the Indulgence and those who had accepted its terms, and Wodrow relates an anecdote which shows pretty plainly the desperate state of insubordination into which those unhappy men had fallen. It was announced that one Rae, a favourite expounder on the moderate side, was about to preach on a certain day in camp. Hamilton, who still retained the nominal command, accordingly sent him an arrogant letter bidding him not to spare the Indulgence. To this Rae, who does not himself seem to have been in any position of authority, made answer that Hamilton "had better mind what belonged to him and not go beyond his sphere or station." It would not be difficult to draw a parallel between the condition of the Covenanting camp at that time and "the Irish Party" of our own day. Indeed, if anybody will be at the trouble to examine the contemporary accounts of the conduct of Hamilton and his followers, and particularly their language, much of which has been faithfully reported by admirers, they will be surprised to find how closely the parallel may be pushed.

On the other side preparations went briskly forward. A strong detachment of the Royal Guards was at once despatched from London, with the young Duke of Monmouth himself in command. Most of the writers of that time, including Burnet and Dalrymple, have been at great pains to explain the intrigues which inspired this appointment. It does not strike us, however, as very difficult of explanation. Monmouth was the King's favourite son. He had served his apprenticeship to the trade of war in the Low Countries, and under no less a master than William of Orange himself. He was popular with the people for his personal courage, his good looks, his pleasant manners, and, above all, for his Protestantism—a matter with him, no doubt, more of policy than principle, but which served among the common people to gain him the affectionate nickname of "the Protestant Duke," and to distinguish him in their eyes as the natural antagonist to the unpopular and Popish James. With all his faults Monmouth was no tyrant, and Charles himself was rather careless than cruel. This appointment, therefore, was taken in Scotland to signify a disposition on the King's part to employ gentle means if possible with the insurgents, and as such was not altogether approved of. Gentle means were not much to the taste of the presiding spirits of the Council Board at Edinburgh, whose native ferocity had certainly not been softened by the fright and confusion of the last few days. It was particularly requested, therefore, that Dalzell might be named second in command, who they felt could well be trusted to counteract any unseasonable leniency on Monmouth's part. Fortunately for the Insurgents the old savage did not receive his commission till the day after the battle.

Monmouth left London on June 15th and reached Edinburgh on the 18th. He at once took the field. Montrose commanded the cavalry, Linlithgow the foot, Claverhouse rode at the head of his troop under his kinsman, and the Earls of Home and Airlie were in charge of their respective regiments of horse; Mar held a command of foot. Many other Scotch noblemen and gentlemen of position followed the army as volunteers.

The near approach of the Royal troops only increased the quarrelling and confusion in the insurgent camp, which was pitched now at Hamilton. Some friends at Edinburgh had sent word to them that Monmouth might be found not indisposed to treat, and that it would be best for them to stand off for a while, and not on any account be drawn into fighting. But the idea of treating only inflamed the more violent. On the 21st a council was called, which began in mutual recrimination and abuse and ended in a furious quarrel. Hamilton drew his sword, vociferating that it was drawn as much against the King's curates and the minions of the Indulgence as against the English dragoons, and left the meeting followed by Cargill, Douglas, and the more violent of his party. Disgusted with the scene, and convinced of the hopelessness of a cause supported by such men, many left the camp and returned to their own homes. Welsh and the moderate leaders resolved to take matters into their own hands. On the morning of the 22nd Monmouth had reached Bothwell. His advanced guard held the little town about a quarter of a mile distant from the river; his main body was encamped on the moor. Shortly after daybreak he was surprised by a visit from Welsh, Hume, and another of their party, Fergusson of Caitloch. They were in disguise; but Claverhouse, who never forgot a face he had once seen, knew them immediately, and took them to the Duke's tent. Monmouth received them courteously, and heard them with patience while they read to him a paper they had drawn up detailing their grievances and their demands. The first were indisputable; the second were, as we have said, moderate. Monmouth was, however, forced to answer that he could not treat with armed rebels. If they would lay down their arms and surrender at discretion, he promised to do all he could to gain them not only present pardon, but tolerance in the future. Meanwhile, he said, they had best return to their camp, report his message, and bring him back an answer within half an hour's time. They returned, only to find confusion worse confounded, and their own lives even in some danger from the furious Hamilton.

The half-hour passed, and no further sign of submission was made. Monmouth bid the advance be sounded, and the foot-guards, commanded by young Livingston, Linlithgow's eldest son, moved down to the bridge. Just at that spot the Clyde is deep and narrow, running swiftly between steep banks, fringed on the western side with bushes of alder and hazel. The bridge itself was only twelve feet wide, and guarded in the centre with a gate-house. The post was a strong one for defence, and had there been any military skill, or even unity of purpose among the defendants, Monmouth would have had to buy his passage dear. Hackston of Rathillet had thrown himself with a small body of determined men into the gate-house, while Burley with a few men who could hold their muskets straight took up his post among the alder bushes. The rest stood idly by while their comrades fought. For about an hour Hackston held the gate till his powder was spent. He sent to Hamilton for more, or for fresh troops, but the only answer he received was an order to retire. He had no choice but to fall back on the main body, which he found at that supreme moment busily engaged in cashiering their officers, and quarrelling over the choice of new ones! The English foot then crossed the bridge; Monmouth followed leisurely at the head of the horse, while his cannon played from the eastern bank on the disordered masses of the Covenanters. A few Galloway men, better mounted and officered than the rest of their fellows, spurred out against the horse-guards as they were filing off the narrow bridge, but were at once ordered back by Hamilton. The rest of the horse in taking up fresh ground to avoid the English cannon completed the disorder of the foot — if, indeed, anything were wanted to complete the disorder of a rabble which had never known the meaning of the word order—and a general forward movement of the Royal troops, who had now all passed the bridge, gave the signal for flight. Hamilton was the first to obey it, thus, in the words of an eye-witness, "leaving the world to debate whether he acted most like a traitor, a coward, or a fool." Twelve hundred of the poor wretches surrendered at discretion; the rest fled in all directions. Monmouth ordered quarter to be given to all who asked it, and there is no doubt that he was able considerably to diminish the slaughter. Very few fell at the bridge, but the English Dragoons, and particularly those who had shared in the rout at Drumclog, played sad havoc among the fugitives, and the Highland broadswords were not idle. Four or five hundred are said to have fallen, "murdered up and down the fields," says Wodrow, "wherever the soldiers met them, without mercy." Where Monmouth's personal authority could not reach, and the pursuit travelled fast and far, it is not likely that much mercy was shown. Mercy was not a prominent quality of the soldiery of those days; and the discovery of a huge gallows in the insurgent camp, with a cartload of new ropes at the foot, was not likely to stay the hands of men who know well enough that, had the fortune of war been different, those ropes would have been round their necks without any mercy. There is, however, no reason to attribute to Claverhouse himself any particular or unseasonable cruelty. The "fiery and vindictive Grahame," whom Sir Walter represents as so terribly avenging his kinsman's death on that day, was too good a soldier to disobey his chief's commands, besides having the death of no kinsman to avenge. We may be pretty sure, moreover, that the Whig chroniclers of the affair would have been only too glad to cast another stone at their favourite scapegoat could they have found one to their hand; but, as of matter of fact, in no contemporary account is his name mentioned further than having been present with his troop in Monmouth's army. Dalzell, who is also mentioned in Old Mortality as rebuking Monmouth for his unseasonable humanity, was not even present at the battle. As he, however, shortly after superseded Monmouth in his command, and as there is no doubt the latter's moderation was not approved of in Edinburgh, Sir Walter has, perhaps, on this point not exceeded the novelist's privileges. How far he has done so in the matter of Claverhouse, either at Bothwell Bridge, or elsewhere during those miserable times, we are not now concerned to inquire, and it is indeed difficult to determine. No contemporary historian could be trusted to write of such a man, either for or against him, without bias. Even in our own times his memory has been no better served. He has suffered alike from the bitter hatred of the Whigs, and the blind idolatry of the Jacobites. Midway between the two his fame must rest; but it is certain that no authority can be got from history for imputing to him an unnecessary share of blood-guiltiness at Bothwell Bridge.

GROSLEY.

FOR a Frenchman he was above the middle height, but slight, thin, and dried up. The small round head, for all its wealth of hair, was out of proportion to his height, but the forehead was large and it overshadowed with bushy brows a pair of small green eyes which, though sunken, were full of fire. The lips were thin and close, but the mouth was not by any means on a small scale. Add to these a pointed chin, sloping cheeks, a craning neck, and a deathlike pallor—a "last-sacraments" visage, as he himself used to say—and we by no means get what about his time our forebears used to call a "pretty fellow." He was born at Troyes in Champagne in 1718. His dress was remarkable. He wore thick woollen-stockings at all seasons. Beneath the coloured kerchief which he wound about his long neck there appeared on high days and holidays a small collar of corded muslin. In summer, when he was "dressed," his old and old-fashioned coats were grey, gold-laced, and gold-buttoned; but then he never donned such gala costume but on Sundays and great feasts, and would take his walks abroad in Troyes and pass the evenings with his neighbours and friends, just as he sat in his study, in slippers, dressing-gown, and nightcap. In his visits to Paris indeed, and it may be supposed in London too, he was driven to putting his hair in a bag which he would buy on the Pont-Neuf for twelve sous, and was obliged to wear a sword which sadly exercised him. In his later years he adopted for overcoating in winter a sort of gaberdine of red camlet which came down to his ankles and was lined with white catskins. This he had had copied from an old painting of St. Pantaleon in one of the churches of his native town. If we then imagine that this queer figure is all vivacity, that he illustrates his witty and copious conversation with all the changeable gestures of an admirable pantomime, that his laugh is full of quick drollery, and that his wan, nay ghastly, parchment-face is instinct with expression, we may conjure up before us Pierre-Jean Grosley as we lately left him, at the age of forty-seven, in the lodging of his fellow-countryman in "La Place de Leicester Fields."

Troyes is perhaps chiefly allied in our minds with weights; the old proverb has gone round the world that "Quatre-vingt-dix-neuf moutons et un Champenois font cent bêtes"; and The Heptameron mentions the natives either as sots, balourds, or lourdiers; but here was a Champenois who was neither heavy nor stupid, but instinct with intelligence, and as pétillant as the wine of his country. Oddly enough, he could claim to be of English descent, pointing out that Troyes, where the fairs were for twelve centuries the centre of European commerce, was also the [illegible] of the astonishing treaty of 1420 between England, [illegible] of theatre Burgundy, by which Henry V. married the Princess [illegible] France, and was named Regent of France, and after the death [illegible] Katherine, was to inherit the French crown— [illegible] crown of Charles VI.

> that the contending [illegible]
> Of France and England, whose [illegible] very shores looked pale
> With envy of each other's [illegible]
> Might cease their hateful [illegible] and there in fact the second [illegible] laid. English resort to [illegible] and scene of the fifth act of Henry V. is and families with "and influence all around was naturally great, in Grosley's day it [illegible] purely English names" still continued to exist Barton, Gilbert, [illegible], or had just become extinct, such as Allen, and his own [illegible]on, De Gray, Husson [Howson?], Mussey, Walton, [illegible] of the [illegible]wn, the suffix of which, at all events, is clearly the Sa[illegible]ley (A.-S. leáh, leá), an open forest glade or pasture, of which there are nigh seventy instances in place-names in the Weald; a word which is also, by the way, to be found in such names as Hohen*lohe* and Water*loo*, and even, spite of the lucendo and non lucendo theories, in the Latin lucus, as Professor Skeat points out.

Grosley figured as by no means an insignificant personality in his time. His more important works fill about twenty octavo volumes—leaving out of the reckoning an immense number of papers on all sorts of subjects, communicated to Societies and periodicals of all kinds. He was a member of the Académie des Inscriptions, and even once ran second to Rousseau at the Dijon Academy for the prize essay on the "Origin of the Inequality of Mankind." Voltaire, too, mentioned him in the phrase stereotyped in the English of the century as "le savant et ingénieux M. Grosley"; and nowadays French antiquarians refer to "le savant troyen" with respect. His best-known books were his Italie and his Londres. We say "were," for he is but one among a multitude whose writings have long been well buried, and who might exclaim with Job:—"Ecce nunc in pulvere dormiam, et si me quæsieris non subsistam."

His life was with difficulty preserved at his birth; he had four nurses, and his constitution was poor and his health always dilapidated. He did not hunt or shoot or even fish, and could not conceive the taste for sport existing in others. At an early age he was mastered by a love for books and reflection, and his life was almost wholly given up to literature. "Tout savant est un peu cadavre," says M. Victor Hugo in L'homme qui rit. To qualify himself for his father's profession and become an avocat Grosley went to Paris at the age of eighteen; and there, although an anti-Jesuit all his life (he was educated by the Oratorians), was taken up by the celebrated Jesuit Tournemine who gave him the run of the libraries left by Huet and Menage—a wonderful advantage for a studious youngster in those days, contributing no little to his literary outfit later on, when his penetration, judgment, excellent critical faculty and prodigious memory had developed. He collected a vast quantity of books, filling all their fly-leaves fore and aft with notes and observations—a habit inherited from his father. Thus notable public events found their place, as indicated by himself, in "a parchment folio containing fragments of Bayle's Dictionary"; and trifling occurrences, chiefly humorous, were collected as a farrago "at the end of a quarto MS. entitled Recueil d'Arrêts, and bound in calf." Heredity also showed itself in what was, for a Frenchman, an extraordinary delight in travelling which offered scope for his inexhaustible curiosity and energy. In such circumstances he was almost literally ubiquitous; it seemed physically impossible to do and see all he did and saw. He says that his two months in London were one continuous rush, and still the acute and active mind was ever fresh and industrious. But though he only took two months to see London he gave two years to the writing of his book on it, which did not eventually appear until 1770 at Lausanne. There was a second edition in 1774, while Dr. Nugent's English translation appeared in 1772.

He spent the greater number of his mornings in London questioning and cross-questioning "le chevalier Mac Donald who was as well known at Versailles as at St. James's, and as dear to the gay world of Paris as he was welcome in the learned society of London." He was also intimate with James, Earl of Morton, then President of the Royal Society, of which he was made a foreign Fellow, and knew Lord Chesterfield almost of course, whom he pronounced to have been somewhat disgusted with many things which the English generally ad cœlum tollunt rumore secundo. Numerous letters of introduction from Paris opened to him many "coteries," ministerial, medical, and legal. Great personages called at his Leicester Fields lodging and asked him to dinner in town or to their houses down in the country. "Pure courtesy on their part," he writes, "to a tramp of my state and condition." But he was not unprovided; he lived in modest ease, and some wealthy friends had forced on him a letter of credit for 80,000 livres or 3,500*l*.—perhaps one of the ciphers is due to the printer—which however he took back intact. Earl Temple, whose position was then of much importance if only as Pitt's brother-in-law and inseparable aid—for it was [illegible] before the "fall upstairs"—crowned his attentions by taking Grosley for some time down to Stowe, of which he put a long and enthusiastic description in an appendix to [illegible] book. He saw the Spitalfields weavers' riots, as they got to be called, in May 1765, when a mob of twenty thousand (including numbers of French refugees) marched on Westminster with black flags and drums, pillaged City warehouses which held French goods, and laid siege to the Duke of Bedford's house in Bloomsbury Square under the noses of the Household troops. These were the riots which led Rockingham to restrain the import of foreign silk and take off the unpopular cider-tax. He was present at the trial, on the 16th and 17th of April 1765, of Byron's grand-uncle in Westminster Hall, and gave a minute account of it, noting among more weighty matter how the Eton boys on the steps of the throne munched apples and chucked the peels into the curls of the Lord Steward's great wig. And when he went from Windsor to Eton by boat these boys did even worse; for three of them saluted him, Grosley, from behind a bank with small-shot from fowling-pieces, while their companions were engaged in the neighbouring mead perspiring in their shirt-sleeves at a "kind of tennis which calls for much skill and rapidity of motion." A nephew of Lord Chesterfield's left the group and joined him, and from him he learned "with astonishment that they took this recreation every day at the same hour and in the same place." He was scarcely less surprised to see that the crowd of about sixty of them had no supervision but that of "some man who, far out of hearing, was seated reading at the riverside." Later on, in the town, a dozen of the boys filed into a shop where he waited for a friend, to eat tarts, comfits, and other dainties; the older of them joking with the fat shop-wench, and the more enterprising perhaps rather those most in debt—absolutely hugging her "before our very eyes."

Grosley's utter ignorance of English was from one point of view an advantage. He heard with his eyes, he says, and he jokes against himself about Panurge who by wearing spectacles in his hat "oyoit des oreilles beaucoup plus clair que de coustume." But almost everywhere he found people to converse with who spoke French perfectly or passably and who were ready even to act the interpreter. Indeed once Lord Chesterfield, seeing him affected at the byplay in a tragedy, told him he was indebted for his emotions to his inability to understand the bald platitudes that were spoken by the actors. But this want of English led him into making the most amusing statements. The vehicle of Wilkes's once notorious No. 45, for instance, was the "Lord Britton"; the bloods of the day beat the "ouach-men"; the mob shouted "Ourey! a rallying cry in rows of all kinds." Blackfriars meant "moines blancs," and Parliament sat at Vestminster. He passed Withéal going to the House of Commons, where the "Spik" took his seat in a simple deal chair and every member conversed audibly with his neighbour, taking no notice whatever of the speeches except for a moment now and then when those in favour of the motion "asked for silence and attention in a chorus of ya! ya!" which after all is not phonetically too bad a shot. He had almost always a good word for the English—was there something of heredity here too?—praising them for the affability with which they bore all his insatiable curiosity. In all ranks, professions, and conditions he met with the same indulgence, the same amiability, the same kindness. The education of boys he thought wonderful as a preservative against effeminacy, vanity, and frivolity; the very opposite of that mollis educatio of Quintilian which nervos omnes mentis et corporis frangit. But the true Frenchman came out in his abuse of the national phlegm and melancholy; and he averred, as Plutarch's Sybarite said of the Lacedemonians, that it was no wonder Englishman had so great a thirst for fighting, for death in battle rid them of their cheerless and depressing form of existence.

If the occupation of travelling was exactly suited to Grosley's temperament, a book of travels was a mode of expression which precisely hit off his literary faculty. The novelty, the wide range, and the medley of subjects were just suited to bring out his learning, his cultivation, and his powers of memory. Objects of interest, striking aspects of common things, and the minute and the extraordinary were all picked up by his nimble apprehension, and so he produced in his Londres one of the most various and attractive epitomes of its kind. And we have not touched on a tenth of the interesting small chronicle of his life.

THE PLETHORA OF MONEY.

THE reduction last week of their rate of discount by the Directors of the Bank of England illustrates the extreme dulness of trade all over the world just now. For nearly seven months in the summer of 1879, when, it will be recollected, there was extreme commercial and agricultural depression, the Bank rate was 2 per cent., but it has not been so low since until now; and that it has now been again reduced to 2 per cent. affords evidence, as we have said, of the total absence of enterprise in the business community. The immediate cause of the fall in the value of money is the distrust occasioned by the panics in Paris and New York, and by the dishonesty of the managers of credit institutions that has been brought to light in New York. The wild speculation in France that ended with the collapse of the Union Générale led to the failure of a large number of the members of the Paris and Lyons Bourses, and ruined very many speculators, more especially amongst the wealthy and aristocratic classes. The panic that resulted in Paris was stopped by the action of the great credit institutions; but a suspicion was left behind that several, both in Paris and Lyons, who were really bankrupt were saved from suspension only by the support of the great capitalists and credit institutions, and consequently there was a disinclination to engage in business with Paris. Nobody knew who was really solvent, and there was therefore a very general distrust generated which has never been quite dispelled. Furthermore, it was known that the great capitalists and credit institutions of Paris had bought immense quantities of the stocks which the speculators were obliged to sell, and that they bought not for the sake of holding, but with the intention of selling as soon as they could do so with a profit. It has been felt, therefore, by the Stock Exchanges of the rest of Europe ever since that, as soon as a rise occurred, immense quantities of these stocks would be thrown upon the several markets; and for this reason, again, there has been a disinclination to deal much in the stocks quoted on the Paris Bourse. Probably the feeling of uneasiness thus occasioned would have passed away before now were it not for the train of adverse political events that have followed one another since. The disquieting colonial policy in which France has engaged, the maladministration of our own Government in Egypt, the financial difficulties of France, and the growth of Socialism all over the Continent—these, with every now and then a dread that war might break out amongst the great military nations, have kept alive a feeling of apprehension, which has been intensified by the recent panic in New York. The over-building of railways in the United States everybody foresaw would lead to difficulties; but it was hoped that the difficulties might be got over without a crash, that there would be a long and slow liquidation of the bank business done between 1879 and 1882, but that there would be no serious panic. Now, however, it is found that this was too favourable a view. Unfortunately the panic in New York was checked by the action of the Associated Banks, just as the panic in Paris was checked by the action of the great credit institutions there; and the result has been similar. There is a feeling of uncertainty as to who is solvent and who is not, and consequently a very general distrust exists. The New York panic, too, has revealed so much dishonesty on the part of managers of banks throughout the United States as has very greatly added to the distrust. And here in London, also, the Blakeway frauds, and some other events of the kind, prove that the dishonesty was not confined to the United States. These disclosures in New York have given a shock to credit which will not be soon recovered.

There is another and a more potent cause of the general depression in business than even the shock to credit to which we have been referring. For about eight years now Europe has been tried by a succession of bad seasons. The crops have sometimes been extremely deficient and at no time good. Farmers have suffered heavily; farms in many instances cannot be let; rents have fallen, and the prices of agricultural produce have fallen still more. The result is that all over Europe the classes dependent upon the land are in distress. Even here in England agriculture is the greatest single industry in the country. Upon the Continent it is greater than all other industries put together. When therefore landowners, farmers, and agricultural labourers are depressed by a long-continued series of unfavourable harvests, it is inevitable that there should be a general depression in trade. The landed classes have smaller incomes than they used to have, and therefore have less money to expend upon manufactures; they are able also to save less, and consequently are able to invest to a smaller extent. The falling off in the investments of the landed classes is perhaps the real cause of the depreciation of Stock Exchange securities to which we referred above. If the landed classes of Europe were as prosperous as formerly, they would have invested largely in Stock Exchange securities, and consequently would have kept up prices. But, owing to the long-continued series of bad seasons, the investments of the landed classes are much smaller than they used to be, and, therefore, prices have fallen. The bad harvests likewise explain the low prices of commodities, for the agricultural classes generally are obliged to diminish their consumption, and diminished consumption means a smaller demand for commodities, and therefore lower prices. The depression of agriculture is not entirely due to the long-continued series of bad harvests; it is aggravated by the competition of America, Russia, Australia, India, and generally of the countries with small populations compared with the extent of land under cultivation or capable of cultivation. Quite recently, in fact, the production has grown more rapidly than the consumption, and consequently prices would have fallen independently of the bad seasons of so many successive years. The result of this combination of unfavourable circumstances—bad seasons, low prices, over-speculation, dishonesty of management, panic, and depreciation—is that there is a general distrust throughout the trading communities of the world. Everybody knows that great losses have been suffered in both trade and speculation, and nobody knows, therefore, who is really solvent and who in consequence may be trusted. Capitalists, therefore, are disinclined to lend freely, while speculators are unwilling to speculate. They see no probability of an early rise in prices; and, as they speculate only in the hope that prices will rise, and that they will be able to sell with a profit to themselves, they refrain from speculating, and consequently do not need to borrow largely. It is this state of things which is described by bankers as a "plethora of money." Capital, in fact, accumulates at the great banking centres of the world, and is unemployed there, because its owners are afraid to use it freely, and borrowers are afraid on their part to venture on new enterprises.

How long this state of things will last depends upon the course of events. If there should be further serious failures in New York, attended by further disclosures of dishonesty, the distrust will be intensified, and possibly the value of money may, after the first squeeze is over, fall even lower. So again, if the cholera epidemic, which has appeared in Toulon, should become serious, and should spread, there would be a further check given to enterprise, and money would sink in value. On the other hand, if the rumours that are now circulating of impending great failures in the United States should prove to be groundless, and if there should be a recovery in prices, confidence might probably revive rapidly, and there might be a sudden springing up of a demand for money. All depends thus upon events which cannot be foreseen. In the meantime, it appears not improbable that there may be a demand for gold in New York. If this should arise, it will check, for a while at least, the fall in the value of money here. The Associated Banks of New York ever since the panic have been rigorously insisting upon repayment of the loans made by them to their customers. They had lent recklessly while the speculative mania lasted; and, now that they see the consequences, they have become alarmed, and they are risking a renewal of the panic by forcing their customers to sell the stocks on which they borrowed at a ruinous loss. Even the best dividend-paying stocks in the United States have fallen from 30 to 50 per cent. within the last three years. It is evident that this could not happen if many of the holders of those stocks had not been compelled to sell, and they have been compelled to sell by the banks, alarmed for their own safety by the run on deposits that has occurred here and there. This action of the banks has caused the rate of interest in New York to rise very considerably. This week it is reported to be about 8 per cent., and naturally there is an eagerness on the part of capitalists abroad to send capital to New York while it can be employed at such high rates. More particularly the Canadian banks are employing large sums in New York, and these banks, in order to do so, are drawing upon London for gold. They are enabled to do this all the better because they keep a large part of their reserves in notes issued by the Canadian Government, and the Canadian Government having just borrowed five millions sterling has gold here at its command which the banks can draw upon. There has already been such a fall in the New York Sterling Exchange as makes it probable that shipments of gold may take place before long. Whether these shipments will be so large as seriously to affect the London money market it is, of course, impossible to say at present. That will depend chiefly upon the course of events in New York itself. If the value of money there should rise so high as to make it worth the while of London capitalists to send out gold for employment in New York, then undoubtedly there will be considerable sums remitted, and remittances of considerable sums would at once raise the value of money here. But, even if this should occur, the effect would be short-lived. Money cannot continue long to be of high value while trade is so depressed as it is at present, and while speculation is in collapse.

THE STORY OF THE COUP D'ÉTAT.*

MR. VANDAM informs us on his title-page that he has "freely translated" M. de Maupas's Mémoires sur le Second Empire. It would have been sufficient to translate it accurately; but if he had given a readable version of his original, had said nothing more than M. "Maupas or De Maupas," and had omitted nothing essential, he might innocently have allowed himself some liberties. It will not surprise the experienced reader of translations to learn that Mr. Vandam's freedom is generally shown in the bold defiance of English grammar which is born of a slavish deference to French idioms. "L'Assemblée ressentait un secret dépit de n'être pour rien dans ses origines," becomes, "The Assembly felt a secret spite at being for nothing in its origin." The French infinitive is always translated by the same mood in English. We are told that the French nation "believed to have returned to a monarchical régime." Twenty times or more Mr. Vandam commits the blunder of using "ignore" as if it was the proper translation of ignorer. Generals ignore orders, the police ignore the presence of armed men in their neighbourhood, the people ignore the details of "the principal and fundamental dispositions of the Constitution," which is possibly what they did, but it is not what M. de Maupas meant to say. Not content with reiterating this cherished mistake of half-educated foreigners who try to speak or write English, Mr. Vandam considers himself free to make ludicrous mistranslations from time to time. In his account of the fighting on the 4th of December, M. de Maupas says that "les blousiers se dirigèrent sur le quartier Saint-Martin." With the omnipotence of a translator Mr. Vandam turns all these heroes into heroines, and astonishes the modest reader by telling him that "the smocks took the road" to that part of Paris. Such are the sorrowful chances of the hasty translator who makes a superficial use of his dictionary. Mr. Vandam has yet to learn that a smock and a smock-frock are not the same thing. Considering the general character of his work, it would be hypercritical to point out that under the circumstances even the latter word is not the proper equivalent of "blouse." Mr. Vandam's translation is, in fact, a hurried piece of hackwork meant for immediate consumption. Five or six times over he makes notes correcting or commenting on something in the text, and then a little further on finds that it has been duly annotated by M. de Maupas. Then he puts in another note ingenuously confessing that he had not got so far as this when he made his former observation. He has, in short, hurried through the job, working from hand to mouth, and without giving himself the trouble to read his author through before he began. As regards Mr. Vandam's fitness to annotate, as shown by his knowledge of the literature of the subject, it will be enough to say that he gravely refers his readers to the Times of some day in December for Captain Jesse's letter describing the massacre on the Boulevard on the afternoon of the 4th, in obvious ignorance of the fact that it is given at length in Mr. Kinglake's History of the Invasion of the Crimea. It may seem that this kind of work is treated with an excess of honour when it is criticized at any length, but it is really time to give up considering slovenliness as a matter of course in translation from the French.

To be sure, if some respect were not due to the English language and the English reader, M. de Maupas's book might plausibly be said to have received the treatment it deserved. The narrative of an eye-witness of any considerable event has always some value. If one of the commissaries of police sent to arrest the foremost men in France during the night of the 2nd December had published a plain account of his experiences there would have been something to learn from him. So much value there no doubt is in these Mémoires sur le Second Empire. The head policeman comes, and tells us all about what was mainly a piece of police work. But more than that is required to give the book permanent worth. A volume of memoirs must either interest us in the writer or tell us something new about the events he saw. Now the biographical side of these memoirs is singularly barren. M. de Maupas appears in official capacity, and, moreover, he writes a colourless official style. There is a considerable personal element of a kind in the book. The author was accused, as we know, of having lost his nerve during the attack on the Prefecture of Police on the 4th of December, and his fears, real or imaginary, were made the subject of one of the many ignoble wrangles among the founders of the Second Empire. Whenever these gentlemen fell out, as they frequently did, they seldom failed to indulge in mutual accusations of cowardice, intrigue, or corruption. M. de Maupas assures us that the fears were imaginary. So far was he from losing his head, and sending terrified messages to M. de Morny, that it was he who had to keep up the fainting heart of his fellow-conspirator. M. de Morny came far too late to the Ministry of the Interior, and when there kept pestering the Prefecture of Police with nervous telegrams. Reminiscences of Peachum and Lockitt revive in our minds on reading these passages. To show how cool he was and how brave, M. de Maupas tells us of the excellent example he set to his employés. When the mob was pressing on the Prefecture, a hurried commissary rushed breathless in his room with the key of a back door, and implored the Prefect to save himself and family. With heroic and withal French valour, M. de Maupas made a scene. He collected his subordinates on the steps regardless of the raging foe, and his aged mother (when was ma mère absent from a French melodrama?), his faithful spouse and tender infant being conspicuous in the background, he then and there dismissed the subordinate who thought of his master's safety before his honour. In the course of his complacent account of how he organized the guet-apens of the 2nd December, M. de Maupas talks a good deal of his honour. He passes very lightly over his early career as Prefect of the Haute Garonne, and treats in general terms of the series of events which led up to the historic interview with M. Léon Faucher.

The reader who brings with him some slight knowledge of modern literature and history will find very little that is absolutely new in these "Mémoires." M. de Maupas revenges himself fairly enough on Victor Hugo by making some rather wooden fun out of the difference between the magnificence of the poet's language and the modest scale of his deeds during the street-fighting after the coup d'état. But then who ever took the Histoire d'un Crime at the foot of the letter?—to adopt M. Vandam's method of translating. At times the logic of the former Prefect of the Seine is defective. He stoutly denies the stories of massacres of prisoners after the fighting, and, to prove their absurdity, boldly asks why the deaths were not recorded in the usual registers. To his critics it will scarcely seem to require demonstration that men capable of organizing the coup d'état were also capable of falsifying the register of births and deaths. From an historical point of view, the most important thing in his volume is the statement that the delay to attack the barricades was not due either to fear or bungling. After the publication of the letters given here General Magnan must at least be fully acquitted of any such weakness. We have it under his own hand that he deliberately delayed to act, with the intention of getting a crowd together to shoot. M. de Maupas is naturally anxious to clear himself of the charge of having shed blood unnecessarily; but his party have little reason to thank him for proving the truth of an old-standing accusation just at this moment. M. de Maupas is at great pains to show the falsity of one statement in the Memoirs of M. Claude. He did not, as that book says he did, call all the commissaries together before sending them off on their kidnapping expeditions. On the contrary, he spoke to them one by one, as for the rest Mr. Kinglake said he did more than twenty years ago. People who love malignant tittle-tattle as retailed by critics from below stairs may gather a good handful of it from these memoirs. They will learn how Colonel de Charras drank a glass of absinthe when suddenly called upon to turn out in the middle of the night, which to the superior taste of M. de Maupas seems unbecoming. It also appears that the Commissary saw M. Thiers orate from his bedstead, and make an indecent gesture. Further, it seemed to this officer that M. Thiers was very frightened. Of this and of the like there is a good deal, and allowing for the personal equation, it is doubtless true enough. A good deal of this sort of thing comes under the scrutinizing eye of the flunkey and the lady's-maid. The purely political part of the book tells nothing new to anybody who has read his Kinglake with the necessary grains of salt. M. de Maupas, like the inferior kind of French political writers, dearly loves the jingling of formulas. He profoundly observes that nations do not change their character in a day. "Tant il est vrai," he says in one place (we quote the original, and not the translation, as we wish to show what M. de Maupas really said), "qu'une législation permanente ne saurait s'appliquer à une société où la mobilité des esprits, encouragée par le principe même du gouvernement, transforme incessamment la situation du pays." He abounds in just and original observations of this sort. To judge from certain passages in his book, particularly from one in which he asks us gushingly to take our hats off to Louis Napoleon, M. de Maupas has a pardonable desire to persuade us that his party was wise, disinterested, and patriotic. He cannot be congratulated on having succeeded. We need not suppose, and we are very far from thinking, that the political virtue and vice of France were divided in the lump between Bonapartists and not-Bonapartists. All the black was not on one side and the white on the other. The Assembly was divided and weak. There were faddists and intriguers for mere pedantic dreams in plenty on its benches. In it and out of it there was a busy and dangerous anarchist party. The Republic was founded by a surprise and had proved vacillating. Neither is the use of force the chief charge against the Bonapartists. In that respect no French party can afford to throw stones at any other; for, with the single exception of the monarchy of Charles X., no Government in France, not even M. Grévy's, has been established without the actual or threatened use of violence since 1792. It is perfectly open to the Bonapartists to taunt their opponents, whether Republicans or Orleanists, with their readiness to use the mob, which is a far more dangerous political instrument than the army. They were entitled to fight for themselves in the general scramble. If everybody draws a distinction at once between them and their rivals, it is because of the character of their leaders and the methods of their warfare. All M. de Maupas's gush and all his platitudes will do nothing to alter the received opinion on that point. After reading his apology—for, in spite of its swaggering tone, it is an apology—Louis Napoleon appears as he did before—a dreamer of showy dreams and a contriver of mean stratagems. His followers continue to be military bravos, impudent Parisian speculators, or superior policemen—and that, to call things by their right names, is the case of M. de Maupas—who looked on all government as an affair of the Rue de Jérusalem. It is, no doubt, true that because Legitimists, Orleanists, and Republicans all loved their several formulas better than their country, and were generally so clever that they had no common sense, and because the mass of Frenchmen look upon the raking together of sous as the end of existence, that therefore the set of persons described above ruled France for years. In view of these facts, we are quite prepared to accept the Empire as a natural development, and as the sort of government which comes to countries given over to the attorney species by revolutions and the worship of the goddess of lubricity. It is no reason, however, why we should accept M. de Maupas's invitation, and take our hats off to Louis Napoleon and his "little knot of middle-aged men who were pushing their fortunes in Paris" about the early fifties.

BOUND TOGETHER.*

THE sudden and deserved success achieved by the author of Called Back ought not to prejudice the critic in his judgment of a series of less striking stories by the same hand. The tales included in Bound Together are, in fact, the record of Mr. Conway's period of apprenticeship in the art. They are clever, amusing, thrilling, packed full of interest, but they want polish. There is matter in two or three of them, at least, worthy of more patient study and, patient elaboration; matter that would, we think, amply have rewarded the author for the trouble of weaving it into ampler and more complete form.

Of the twelve tales included in the volumes before us three at least might have been easily developed into separate volumes. The pretty sketch of character in "Fleurette," the sprightly, tender, loyal, and brave girl who renounces the love of a true and honest man rather than betray the weakness of an inebriate mother, certainly suggests deeper things than it fulfils, and would really be the better of a more analytical treatment in the charming character of the heroine, as in that of the helplessly blunt, good doctor whom she loves, for the plot in this tale is of less account than in most of Mr. Conway's writings, and rather serves to show that he might succeed as well had he a mind in comedy character-drawing as he has done in the more mysterious aspects of psychological romance. "Miss Rivers's Revenge" shows the author's lighter mood once more, and is a spirited sketch of a young lady who in her schoolgirl days overhears a patronizingly cool opinion passed upon herself by a literary young gentleman, and who, two years afterwards, coquettes with the same gentleman, now blossomed into an author of note, and punishes herself as well as him by choosing the questionably sweet revenge of refusing his offer of marriage. We are glad to be able to add that Mr. Conway is too kind to leave a bad taste in the mouth of his readers, and ingeniously contrives that the outraged lover should return unaware to find his proud mistress in tears, which he immediately takes the best means of drying for ever. In "A Cabinet Secret" Mr. Conway's humour plays around the china collector's mania until he gets a very graceful little story out of a young man's passion for Old Chelsea leading him even the lengths of proposing to an old lady because she possesses, and flatly refuses to sell to him, the half of a fine set, the other portion of which had previously found its way into his cabinet; that the old lady had no designs on the handsome hero, excepting for a pretty niece, whose beaux yeux even on the first introduction drive Old Chelsea to the winds, is the pretty sequel to a daring little comedy. In speaking of Mr. Conway's humour we must not forget a delightfully cynical little tale called "A Speculative Spirit," wherein a stolid old stockbroker, with a twinkle in his eye, having been reproved by two foppish young artists for daring to aspire to imagination, tells them a most circumstantial but utterly false ghost story, and is found afterwards laughing immoderately behind the door at the recollection of their scared and puzzled faces. But this is the reverse of the medal, and the face of it is as strong and bright as we have a right to expect from the man who could write Called Back. Perhaps for cleverness of sustained interest and for force of situation, "In one Short Year"—a tale which does not meddle with psychology at all—is as good as any other story in the book; but it is notably one of those open to the objection previously stated—it has too much matter for its space. Possibly the author does not yet feel himself equal to the heavy task of dealing with such deep problems of human character as are opened out in these twenty-five pages of large octavo print.

It is, perhaps, in the tales relying for the development of their plots upon supernatural elements that Mr. Conway is at his best and strongest. The direct and simple manner in which he tells the facts, or what he chooses to allege are the facts, of his case, the deprecatory preface before the wonderful relations begin, the circumstantial evidence brought to bear upon them, are all points that inevitably help to carry conviction; and conviction he certainly does carry, sufficient, at all events, to interest the reader so profoundly, while he has a mind to do so, that we should doubt whether any one who has taken up one of the successful among these tales has ever laid it down before finishing it. Of this engrossing sort is certainly "The Secret of the Stradivarius," the first story in these new volumes. The tale is more purely fantastic than any other we have as yet seen from Mr. Conway's pen; it mixes up no every-day, commonplace incidents with the marvellous; it is supernatural throughout; and yet so weirdly and forcibly is it told, that the lengthened recital of grim things as called up before the mind by strains of music never wearies or grows feeble, but remains entrancing to the end. The story is the story of a violin, or rather the story of a violin's owner; the pathetic tragedy of a man's love and death, acted in a phantasmagoria evolved by the music of the strange instrument itself. The writing in this tale is of a higher literary merit than we have always found in Mr. Conway's style, although there are passages in "Our Last Walk Together" which aim higher as poetical prose. This tale, though not perhaps one of the strongest, is in some ways one of the most weird in the book. The same thing may be said of "The Bandsman's Story," which is also more powerful and interesting in plot, and here it is music again that plays the subtle phantom part. "The Daughter of the Stars," called a psychological romance, is not nearly so effective in carrying the conviction [illegible] other less ambitious attempts where the [illegible] woven deftly into everyday surroun[illegible], on the other hand, in "My First Client" the ef[illegible] blend conflicting elements is almost too bold, and the supernatural becomes for a moment almost absurd. "The Truth of It" and "The Blatchford Request" neither of them deal with the spirit world. They are both clever tales, the former reminding us of the beginning of Belot's Crime de la Rue de la Paix, but the latter has a plot so neatly constructed that we feel sorry it did not receive more attention from its author in the matter of writing and characterization.

MEXICAN RUINS.*

THE ruined cities of Central America exercise a strange fascination from the number of interesting problems which they suggest, as well as from the intrinsic merit of their architecture. By what race were they built, and at what epoch? Whence was derived the civilization of their builders? How came it to be restricted to so small an area of the American Continent? By what mechanical appliances were the ponderous masses of stone raised? Is it possible to find a key to the hieroglyphs which ornament the walls of some of them? These and many other questions of interest to the traveller, the antiquary, and the ethnologist present themselves to any one who examines these mysterious relics. Considering how long it is since attention has been drawn to the existence of these ruins, it is surprising that they have never been visited or described by any one familiar with the rules of architectural criticism. They are all contained in a somewhat limited geographical area, bounded on the north by the mountains forming the southern barrier of the valley of Mexico, while southwards none are known to exist below Copan, in Honduras. It is impossible, however, to say that none remain to be discovered within the half-explored tropical forests of Central America. The ruins first known in this country were those of Mitla, which were described by Humboldt, though never actually seen by him; he acquired his information from two Mexican gentlemen, who visited and sketched the buildings in 1802. Mitla, as well as Palenque, was fully described by Lord Kingsborough, whose magnificently illustrated volumes, published between 1830 and 1848, were written to prove that the Temple of Palenque was built on the model of that of King Solomon, and, consequently, that the builders were Jews. The still more extensive ruins of Yucatan were explored by the American traveller, J. L. Stephens, in 1841-2. His volumes contain the account of visits to forty-four ruined cities, or places in which remains or vestiges of ancient population were found; and he justly claims that his work, aided by that of his artist-companion, Mr. Catherwood, has interposed to snatch from oblivion these perishing but still gigantic memorials. Photographs of Palenque, Mitla, Uxmal, Izamal, and Chichen-Itza, were taken about twenty years ago by the French archæologist, M. Charnay, and were published in the city of Mexico by Michaud, in 1860, together with some notes on them by M. Viollet-le-Duc. These photographs would appear to be the most recent ones taken, as they have evidently been made use of by Mr. F. A. Ober for illustrating the work now under review. Mr. Ober's book is by no means confined to antiquities; but he alone of recent travellers has devoted special attention to the ancient remains. His work in Yucatan possesses a special value, as showing the progress of decay during the forty years since the visit of Stephens, thereby in some degree confirming the views of the latter as to the not very remote antiquity of the buildings. Mr. Ober tells us in his preface that, at the time of his visit to Yucatan and Central and Southern Mexico, he devoted more attention to the natural features and historic surroundings of his journey than to the material wealth of the country; but, after reaching home, and getting his narrative nearly ready for the press, the progress of the railways, which had entered the country from the north at several points, seemed to call for fuller information as to the resources of Mexico and descriptions of the border region. Mr. Ober therefore laid aside his manuscript and took another journey southwards, along the entire boundary line from the Gulf of Mexico to the Gulf of California. The result has been a well illustrated and more comprehensive account than has yet appeared of the present condition and resources of the whole country, in addition to the above-mentioned valuable contribution to our knowledge of its archæological remains.

Mr. Ober began his investigations in Yucatan; he landed at a new port, connected by a railway twenty-five miles in length with Merida, the capital, and aptly named "Progreso." Sisal, the old port of entry, which gives its name to the hemp which is the staple product of the country, has been abandoned. In Merida Mr. Ober mentions a curious custom, which is surely a survival of the old picture-writing; most of the Indians till recently were unable to read, so the names of the streets were designated by a painted figure at each corner or by an image perched on the wall. Few now remain, but there may yet be seen the Elephant, the Flamingo, and the Street of the Two Faces. Yucatan was one of the earliest provinces of the New World colonized by the Spaniards; its inhabitants at first offered a desperate resistance, but ultimately settled down quietly and cultivated the arts of peace. Its history has since been uneventful, probably becau[illegible] country contained not a single mine of gold or silver to [illegible] the invaders for their conquest. The interior of the country, however, is occupied even to-day by a race of untamed Indians, pr[illegible]y akin to the fierce Caribs who once possessed the southern W[illegible] Indies and the Spanish Main. These aborigines have revolted at different times, and have so completely terrorized the whole country, that towns have been abandoned, and their territory is actually increasing in extent at the expense of that occupied by the white and the agricultural Indians. These latter, who form the bulk of the population, are the Mayas; they still keep up the language, and to a certain extent the customs, of their sun-worshipping ancestors. Mr. Ober instances a native dance which he witnessed, at which they spread in the centre of the room a banner, painted with a figure of the sun and two people kneeling in adoration of it. They used a log-drum beaten with a deer's antler, and a turtle-shell rattle, exactly as described by the old chroniclers. A wise ordinance at Merida, which might be copied with advantage in other tropical cities, prohibits the painting of the houses white, in order to diminish the glare as much as possible. There are no rivers in Yucatan that run above-ground, so the people are dependent upon the clouds for their supply of water, or upon a curious system of underground rivers. The province is a vast table of coral rock, beneath which flow large streams, which break out at intervals into water-caves, called "cenotes." The ancient cities were always built near these caves, and the Indians, centuries ago, marked the course of these subterranean streams by heaps of stones. Some of the "cenotes" are made use of as bathing-places—most refreshing resorts in the heat of day. Some have fish, said to be blind, like those in the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky. With many of them are connected all kinds of Indian legend or tradition. Within a radius of one hundred miles from Merida are scores of ruined cities: the most accessible is Uxmal, some sixty miles from the capital. As at Pompeii, fanciful names have been assigned to the principal buildings — the House of the Governor, of the Nuns, of the Dwarf. The builders were unacquainted with the principle of the true arch; the rooms are consequently narrow, as the vaulting is formed by the "Maya arch." This was made by bringing the courses of stone nearer together till they meet in the centre, precisely as the Etruscans did in Europe at the dawn of civilization. Another peculiarity is the so-called "elephant trunk" ornament, used at the corners and along the façade of buildings. The illustration of this in Mr. Ober's book is not a good one, but a detailed drawing will be found in Stephens's work, vol. i. p. 171. It is so pronounced that it was probably more than an ornament, and may have been used for holding the poles of awnings, or for suspending decorations or sacrificial objects. Mr. Ober's suggestion that the builders took the idea from the trunk of the Mastodon can hardly be serious. Very interesting are the drawings from photographs taken by the author of the "Katunes" of Aké, Cyclopean columns composed of eight or ten rude stones. The early chroniclers averred that they were intended to serve as a record of the age of the race, each stone representing a period of twenty years. As there are thirty-six columns of ten stones each, this would give them an antiquity of seven thousand two hundred years! Of Mayapan, the seat of the ancient Maya empire, Mr. Ober gives details of recent explorations by Dr. Le Plongeon, as reported to the American Antiquarian Society. The Doctor has studied the hieroglyphs of Yucatan for seven years, and, in addition to his archæological qualifications, possesses a knowledge of the Maya tongue. Among his discoveries are a statue of Chaacmol, "the Tiger King," now removed to the city of Mexico. The United States Consul, Mr. Aymé, has brought to light at Kabah a rude painting of a man on horseback, which would certainly seem to confirm the theory that these buildings were occupied, at all events, down to the period of the arrival of the Spaniards. Mr. Ober concluded his visit to Yucatan with a ride through the logwood forests and a trip to the lagoons on the north coast. He bears emphatic testimony to the honesty of the Yucatecans; he travelled unarmed, and could leave his portable property exposed wherever he stopped without a thought for its safety. Assuredly he could not have done either of these things in Mexico proper. On quitting Yucatan, Mr. Ober coasted round the Bay of Campeche, and describes, though apparently he did not visit, the ruins of Palenque, in the province of Tabasco. These buildings, elevated, like those of Yucatan, on artificial mounds or pyramids, are characterized by stucco bas-reliefs and large hieroglyphical tablets, the most important of which is the well-known one of the Cross. A fascinating subject of speculation is the mysterious city said to exist in the neighbourhood of Lake Peten, inhabited by an aboriginal race still preserving all the rites and customs of their progenitors. Stephens, Squier, Morelet, and other travellers all believed in its existence; but all attempts to penetrate these unexplored wilds have hitherto failed. Yet it is the author's firm conviction that in an exploration of this region lies the only way to obtain a clue to the hieroglyphs of Central America.

Unable for lack of funds to try to solve this mystery, Mr. Ober landed at Vera Cruz and proceeded in the usual way by railroad to the city of Mexico. The city of Mexico, the Mexicans at home, the museums, markets, and floating gardens, all have separate chapters assigned to them, and Mr. Ober successfully accomplished the ascent of Popocatepetl. He goes fully into the recent expansion of railways towards what he regards as their ultimate destination, the continent of South America. These features of Mexico as it is to-day may be found in the works of other writers; but Mr. Ober, while giving ample details as to the present state of the country, lingers lovingly over the vestiges of the ancient civilization of the earlier inhabitants. Among these remains was the little-visited ruin of Xochicalco, standing apart from every other group in Mexico, and unique in its structure and carvings. It is surprising that it should be so little known, as it is only two hours' ride from Cuernavaca, which is but a day's journey from the capital. Tula, to the north of the valley of Mexico, contains an interesting group of ruins of the Toltecs; little is known of these people except that they gave to the country an advanced civilization, and were ultimately driven out by the Aztecs. Another race, the Zapotecs, were the builders of the palaces of Mitla, near Oaxaca, in Southern Mexico. These are perhaps better known than any other group, as they have been described by every traveller from Humboldt downwards. They possess peculiarities belonging neither to those of Yucatan to the north-east nor those of Central Mexico to the north-west. Among them may be mentioned a hall, the roof of which was supported by gigantic monolithic pillars of circular form. The elaborate ornamentation is carried out, not by sculpture or stucco, but by panels of mosaic of pieces of stone each about seven inches in length, forming grecques or arabesques of extraordinary intricacy. The façades of the Yucatan ruins are deeply carved in stone; Palenque is noted for its sculptures and bas-reliefs of stucco; Copan for the number of its idols and altars; while Mitla owes the magnificence of its whole effect to the careful execution of detail in mosaic-work, arranged, not on a flat surface, but with the pattern now projecting, now receding, so as to give the necessary variety of light and shade.

Mr. Ober's work may advantageously be consulted for information as to the present condition and resources of the country; but its special merit is that he is entitled to the credit which he claims—of being the first to enumerate and particularly describe all the principal ruins of interest to the student of American archæology.

TWO BOOKS OF LITERARY HISTORY.*

THERE are some books the most immediate and direct result of reading which is a sense of disappointment—a sense of seeing a good thing badly done, or, at any rate, not nearly so well done as it might have been. Among those books, we are sorry to say, G. S. B.'s Study of the English Prologue and Epilogue must rank. The subject is a really excellent one for a critical monograph. It is just big enough to be substantive, and not big enough to be out of the critic's power to handle except at very great length. It is full of interest of the most diverse kind, and it admits (properly and without illegitimate digression) of that admixture of gossip which the reading public of to-day so dearly loves. It has not, to our knowledge at least, or apparently to G. S. B.'s, been attempted before; it is not very likely (or at least would not have been very likely if it had been well handled) to be treated soon again. In such cases an author has a considerable chance of securing himself, without superhuman pains or extraordinary genius, something of a permanent place in literature—at any rate a place held on a good long lease. "G. S. B. on Prologues" might, if he and Minerva had pleased, have been quoted as certain legal writers are quoted.

This, we fear, is not, as things go, likely to be the case, and there is more than an opening for somebody else on Prologues. In the first place, G. S. B. has unnecessarily and inartistically curtailed his subject. For though it is quite true, as he says, that the prologue came to a climax with Dryden, it by no means ceased to be of importance with the seventeenth century or even with the eighteenth. It is only within the present age that it became practically insignificant. In the second place, though facilitating his own work by thus unceremoniously abridging it, he has not dealt anything like completely with what he has left, and he has dealt with it still less methodically. Historical order is set at nought here, and prologues and epilogues of the Revolution are quoted side by side and discussed side by side with prologues of Peele and Dekker. Again, this mingle-mangle stuff is not mingle-mangled in anything like equal proportion. Practically more than half—more than two-thirds we should say—of the book is given to Dryden, who is introduced at every turn, and the citations from whom vastly exceed those from all other dramatists put together. Certainly we have no intention of saying that a very readable and pleasant book might not be made exclusively on glorious John's prologues and epilogues. But then such a book would not be a Study of the English Prologue and Epilogue from Shakspeare to Dryden. Lastly, G. S. B.'s treatment, putting aside the questions of its method and completeness, is by no means distinguished by rigorous accuracy. Thus, on p. 33 he tells the story of Dryden's raising the price of prologues without mentioning the very important and still unsettled variants in it, according to which the O.P. and N.P. respectively were not only five guineas and ten (the only figures he gives), but four and six, and two and three. We do not know what he can possibly mean by quoting an epilogue of 1686 and then saying, "In plays of a later date, such as Wycherley's Country Wife." The chronology of Wycherley's plays has always been something of a crux; but nobody has put even the latest of them after 1686. He assumes the truth of the story about Dryden's prologue for Calisto, of which there is literally no evidence. He repeats the old but inexcusable blunder of supposing that the whole of the character of Bayes in The Rehearsal is a direct satire on Dryden. He thinks that the grumble at "vast expenses" in the prologue to The Prophetess was due to the fact of the poet's having a regular share in the profits of the theatre, whereas that share had ceased years before The Prophetess was revived. He speaks of "the Puritans, and first and foremost Jeremy Collier." That Jeremy and the Puritans sympathized on this particular point may be granted. But what guileless reader will not go off with the notion that Collier, the highest and hottest of Jacobites and High Churchmen, was a Puritan?

It may be said that these are matters of no very great importance; but they show a certain looseness of handling which is undesirable on such matters. Nevertheless, it would hardly have been possible to write an uninteresting book on the subject, and uninteresting G. S. B.'s tractate certainly is not. The reader who does not know much about the subject (and probably most readers are in this case) will go away without the clear and precise notion of it which might without much difficulty have been given to him; but he will have read some capital verse, have been told some curious stories, and have had many glimpses of quaint and forgotten manners. Such is the notice of the extraordinary and not very intelligible contest which went on between the two houses at one time, each actor or actress who prologized appearing with an immense broad-brimmed carter's hat several inches wider than his or her rival had dared. There is, too (long earlier, but a critic is surely entitled to copy the sans gêne of his author), the story of George Peele, who collected much money at Bristol by means of a prologue, and levanted while it was being spoken. There is an abstract, at least (G. S. B. would have done well to give the text), of the curious prologue in which three actors take part, and one who was actually known for a somewhat undue devotion to the original god of stage representations comes in "half mellow" and delivers a supplementary address. All these and many other oddities of the stage—the "bevy of children," the occasion when in Charles's reign the actresses had the stage to themselves, and many others—give the writer on this subject admirable handles of which, if G. S. B. has not always availed himself successfully (and he certainly has not), yet he could not fail to avail himself somehow. We wish very much that he had done what he has done better; but it is a very hopeful sign of grace that he thought of doing it at all, and this being the case, we do not care to part from him otherwise than in charity.

If G. S. B. has chosen a small subject, Mr. Hoffmann has unquestionably chosen a big one enough. It is nearly as oddly treated as it is large, and the oddity extends to the outward and visible form of the book as well as to its matter. In the first place, it is issued half-bound in calf, an old (though not a bad) practice which has almost entirely died out. In the second place, the second volume, containing more than three hundred pages, is entirely filled with elaborate tables and indices of poets of all ages and countries annotated in close small type. The first, which has some seven hundred pages, contains a continuous account of the progress of poetry, including some of the most startling statements, and arranged on quite the most remarkable principles that we remember to have noticed in a book of the kind. We begin with fifteen pages on "The Nature of Poetry in General," which may be not unfairly sampled by the extraordinary remark that "it was Plato's opinion that if a man could see virtue he would be strangely enamoured on her person; which is the reason why Horace and Virgil have continued so long in reputation, because they have drawn her in all the charms of poetry." Then comes "The Progress of Poetry in the Middle Ages" (of which we are sorry to say that Mr. Hoffmann knows absolutely nothing) with ten pages, and next we find ourselves somehow or other transported to "The Early Poets of Greece" and "The Early Poets of Rome." Chapter V. jumps to Dante, and Chapter VI. turns to Chaucer, with examples taken from Dryden's version. After this an elaborate but most eccentrically marshalled procession of English poets begins, and fills the rest of the book. It may be observed by way of convenient and luminous illustration that Langhorne has eighteen pages and Gray eight, that Kirke White has fourteen and Keats eight, that Southey has thirty and Scott nine, that Miss Mitford has a page and Mrs. Browning (except in the index) not a line. As Mr. Hoffmann has judiciously and quite openly conveyed many passages from the older authorities, such as Lamb, Hazlitt, and Coleridge, there is much that is worth reading in his prose, and as his quotations from his authors proper are lavish, one can turn over his pages with pleasure. But whether for critical power or for accuracy of information, we can give his original matter very little praise. What is to be said for a man who calls Clémence Isaure (we put aside the parallel with Mrs. Harris) "Countess of Thoulouse," the spelling being of itself instructive? We have no doubt that Mr. Hoffmann has some meaning when he says that in Hamlet "the passages are not exhibited as in his other plays," but we entertain not the remotest idea of what that meaning may be. A poem "of an obstruse and elevated kind" would doubtless commend itself to Mr. C. J. Yellowplush; but the oddity is probably not intentional as such forms as "Lander" (who may, it seems, be quoted as a critic, but is only allowed his line of index as a poet) and "Iphigema" occur. These coquilles d'imprimerie add not a little to the interest of Mr. Hoffmann's curious book. "In classing Charles Lamb among these poetical essays" is a very agreeable phrase; and we can only say that if Lamb was a poetical essay, we are uncommonly grateful to the poetical essayist who wrote him. In the following the grammar is the most attractive element:—"The Vision of Judgment is a most severe attack upon Southey, in which Byron very warmly repels the charges brought by Southey against the alleged immorality of his poems, and shows up with unmerciful bitterness the contrast between Southey's former Liberal opinions and his then mad devotion to the principles of the Court; and parodying the poor and pretentious verses which," &c. &c. There is a delightful muddlement of thought in the phrase "heroic verse, a powerful species of writing of which he was scarcely master." So again, "The former well-known song is stately and noble, and possesses at the same time the genuine structure and melody of verse which constitutes the truly patriotic." From this many things can be gathered; among them that it is impossible to be truly patriotic except in verse. To find a florid description of Garth's quoted as "a remarkable passage of wit" might startle one elsewhere, but the reader who has accompanied Mr. Hoffmann thus far is past surprises.

He is, however, a writer with whom it is difficult to be seriously wrath, because he is evidently a very industrious and well-intentioned person, who likes poetry, who has in a groping sort of way some feeling of its goodness, absolute and relative, and who desires to introduce other people to his own favourite countries. Unfortunately (though we may seem to magnify our office here) it is no more given to everybody to be a critic and historian of poetry than it is given to every one to be a poet. In the first place the critical historian must know how to write English, which we fear Mr. Hoffmann cannot be said to know. In the second, he must have considerably more accurate knowledge of his subject than Mr. Hoffmann (who except as to English poetry seems to speak almost always at second-hand) possesses; and in the third, he must have some notion of method, of the planning and circumscribing of a subject, the proportioning of its parts, and the selection of points of treatment. As to all of these Mr. Hoffmann is lamentably defective. We feel sure that he would have written a good book if he could; but unluckily that is not quite enough.

NEW PRINTS.

THE various photographic processes which are now in use both add largely to the number of prints published and also to the critic's difficulties. It is not always possible for any but an expert to pronounce whether a print has been engraved in the old mezzotint manner or in the new "photogravure." Messrs. Tooth will forgive us if we say that the engraving after M. de Blaas's "Venetian Courtship," of which they have sent us a proof impression, is so like the picture that we doubt if any engraver could attain such fidelity, and, on the other hand, is so like a mezzotint that we do not like to call it anything else. However it is produced, it is a charming work. The earnest look of the youth, and the coquettish and more than doubtful expression of the girl, seem to come out even better than in the picture now that there is no colour to divert the eye from M. de Blaas's admirable powers of drawing and composition.

From Messrs. Goupil we have received a fine landscape etched by M. Brunet Debaines after Constable. A waggon crosses a farm pond; a pretty gabled farmhouse is on the left, and fine old trees in the middle distance; beyond, a sunlit meadow stretches away to the low wooded hills. Heavy summer clouds partly obscure the sky, and throw half the foreground into shadow. Altogether, in spite of the simplicity of the subject, this is a charming landscape, and a wonderful example of what a capable artist can do in rendering the impression of brilliant colouring in black and white. M. Brunet Debaines has brought to England all his countrymen's appreciation of the importance of relative tone and "values."

Mr. Lefevre, of King Street, St. James's, has published two very pretty "processions," by M. A. Gilbert, after Munkacsy. The first is the "Triumph of Agriculture," and has nothing in it but what may any autumn be seen in Styria or Bohemia, when the villagers assemble with music and march through the market-place. The English peasant's Harvest Home is a very poor imitation of one of these festivals. There is a sound artistic tradition in South Germany, and even the great Durer employed the resources of his genius in arranging triumphal processions. The second piece represents "The Chase." A car decked with boughs brings home the deer, and the hero of the hunt rides before, his hawk fluttering hooded on his hand. Falconers carry dead herons at the head of the procession, followed by a "cadger" with two couple of peregrines on his "cadge." Hawker and cadger have come down in the world of late. These are highly decorative plates, and the impressions before us are very delicately printed.

A portrait of Mr. Samuel Cousins, the engraver, after Mr. Long, comes from the Fine Art Society. It is brilliantly engraved in mezzotint by himself, and is understood to signalize his retirement from the active duties of his profession. If so, it shows that he is determined to "carry out" his burin before any sign of deterioration can be detected in his work. Either this is an exceptionally good impression or the print is one of rare vividness and freshness. The aged artist sits at his table, his plate before him, and the shade in his left hand. The print will be welcomed by all admirers of the art of one of our most conscientious and able engravers.

It may be convenient to notice here a little volume which comes to us from New York. This is the National Academy Notes. It includes the complete catalogue of the Fifty-ninth Spring Exhibition of the National Academy of Design. It is profusely illustrated with drawings by the artists reproduced by photo-engraving, and the illustrations are supplemented by a description and by a personal notice of each artist, inserted to show "where and with whom" he studied. It would be interesting to see such a list of exhibitors at one of our exhibitions. There is not much evidence of study anywhere in a majority of the pictures at the Royal Academy, for example, this year. The National Academy of Design does not appear to be very much junior to the English Academy, as it is "the real successor of the American Academy of the Fine Arts which was originally established in 1802." Prizes are given by the vote of all the exhibitors, so it is evident that, though the Society has Academicians and Associates, it is not managed precisely like ours, although it is described as "a private institution devoted to the public service." There are at present ninety-four Academicians and sixty Associates. The art prevalent in New York, if we may judge by the illustrated Catalogue, is of a very high order. We observe the names of three ladies in the list of Associates.

THE RENT QUESTION IN BENGAL.*

THAT the agitation in Bengal and Behar, which has now lasted for ten years, should result in literature more varied and more ponderous than the outturn of the Crofters' Commission is not surprising. Palliatives have been tried during the above period. A Commission on Rent has followed on a Commission on Famines. No less than two Draft Acts have been prepared. Officials of all grades have reported in detail on the provisions to facilitate the recovery of rent on the one hand and the rights of the rent-payers on the other. At meetings of landlords, native Zemindars and English merchants lately divided by the Ilbert Bill, have joined hands in defence of their manorial privileges. In one province under the Government of Bengal it is roundly asserted that the agriculturists are being gradually reduced to a state of villainage without any of its compensations. In another it is broadly stated that the Zemindar cannot collect his due rents, and that he bears a strong resemblance to an unfortunate Irish landlord. This is clearly not a case for putting down an agrarian disturbance by an extra battalion of police, or for clearing files of rent suits by the appointment of two or three extra judges. Neither will it do for Government to look placidly on with its hands folded, and comfort foes and friends by the assurance that these inevitable disputes can be best settled by the operation of "natural and economic causes." A healthy system of revenue and rent, it cannot be too often repeated, is the foundation of all good government anywhere in India. In no province, from Peshawar to Tinnevelly, from Tripura to Khandeish, can the various customs under which land is held, cultivated, and assessed, be made to work without some control or interference on the part of the Collector and Magistrate. The legislation now attempted does not meddle with something denounced by one class as a shameful exemption and cherished by another as a reasonable privilege. The character of the British Government for equity, strength, and fair dealing is involved in the settlement of a harassing dispute, and in such an adjustment of the relations between Zemindar and Ryot as is possible where custom and not contract has for centuries determined the clearance of jungles, the induction of tenants into their holdings, the processes of agriculture, the realization of rents, and eventually the security of the Government revenue.

One of the latest contributions to the common stock comes from a native gentleman who tells us that he is a B.A.—it must be presumed of the Calcutta University—a Deputy Collector, and a Zemindar. He writes good English, like many of his contemporaries; he is fairly familiar with Revenue legislation, past and present; and he has doubtless some share in an ancestral estate which justifies his assumption of the title of landholder. It is very clear, however, that his criticisms do not err on the side of modesty, and he complacently disposes of his superiors, the Covenanted Civil Service, by saying that "the same desire for the easy solution of a complex question and the same aversion to details which generally make Englishmen indifferent revenue officers at the present time, also interfered with their efficiency a hundred years ago." This is an exquisite specimen of Young Bengal. His own book carries in every page a refutation of the above audacious but sublime sentence. His production, in fact, is little more than a selection from the Reports and Minutes of these indifferent and inefficient English Collectors, Commissioners, Judges, and Lieutenant-Governors who have massed facts, compared opinions, discussed amendments, propounded remedies, and have enabled this confident B.A. to compile his little work. To native contributors he makes but few allusions. The native memorial on which he depends is the work of an English barrister; and he nowhere himself attempts any dispassionate summing up of the whole case. That he should incline to the weaker or Ryot's side of the question is no doubt creditable. The Zemindars have their own organs, associations, and means of making known their complaints. The Ryot, with plenty of sympathizers, needs those who can speak and write for him. How far the writer's opposition to the Zemindars and his adherence to most of the reforms suggested in the Draft Act, may be coloured by his own position and hopes of promotion as a servant of Government, it is needless to inquire. Nor again is it necessary to dissect the reasoning which tries to make out that the condition of the peasantry under the Mohammedan Nawabs of Dacca and Moorshedabad of the last century was by no means so bad as supposed. History has settled this point as far as it can settle anything. A province half swamp and jungle, the prey of tigers and hogs, Mahratta raiders and Mohammedan tyrants, where population was stationary and famine and epidemics were allowed to spread unchecked, is something very different from the same country with roads and railroads, marts and factories, schools and dispensaries, and a population of 500 or 600 to the square mile. It is quite true, as many officials have proved, that in that land of hectors, Lattials and thieves, tenant-right was maintained and transmitted in spite of grinding exactions and summary modes of realizing revenue. Its vitality was inexhaustible; or rather, perhaps, villagers were left to cultivate their fields and to stick to their homesteads for generations, while one usurper dethroned or expelled another at Moorshedabad, and Zemindars and Rajas were compelled to pay tributes and taxes under the lash or at the cannon's mouth. But the real point now for discussion is not whether the English Collector's finger is worse than the heavy hand of Murshed Kuli Khan or Aliverdi, whether Mussulman lawyers have rightly defined the division of the produce between the Treasury and the cultivator, or whether the five years' Settlements made by Warren Hastings and Verelst were judicious or not; but whether the new Bengal Rent Bill is just all round in its main provisions, and whether it correctly interprets and stereotypes the common law of the country in regard to occupancy, transfers, manorial privileges, the patrimony of the Ryot, the social position and the political bearing of the Zemindar.

One new feature in this familiar controversy is the contrast between the agriculturists of Behar and those of Lower Bengal. If, a generation ago, the question had been put, "which of the two were the most calculated to resist oppression and to hold their own against an encroaching landlord," most officials would have reckoned on the Behar Ryot. The tract of country which gave birth to Koer Sing and his adherents, which sent recruits to the Sepoy ranks and contingents to the military police, which had deprived the cultivation of indigo in the hands of Englishmen of the objectionable features which imperilled its manufacture in Bengal, was, it would have been argued, the home of stalwart peasants accustomed to wield the club and the spear as easily as the spade and the mattock. The Bengali cultivator, Englishmen would have gone on to say, is spiritless, ignorant, the bondsman of the Mahajan, the worm under the iron heel of the Zemindar. It now turns out that the above picture, believed to be true before and after the Mutiny, is exactly reversed. The Bengali Ryot in the metropolitan districts has learnt to know his rights and to combine for their assertion. He is not to be deluded or coerced. In Eastern Bengal he is master of the situation, stands up to the agent of the Zemindar, and even refuses to pay as he ought. The Behar Ryot is the object of pity. For him the protection of the law is urgently required. In this backward province rents are still paid in kind. The legitimate growth of tenant-right contemplated by the Rent Act of 1859 has here been prevented, or, if it existed, it has yielded to intimidation or force. Ryots in Behar are shifted—so it is said—from one plot to another, just at the very time when a twelve years' residence would give them a title to hold on. Tracts of Ryotty land are appropriated by the superior landlord, and attached to indigo factories in order to gratify the English planter. In short, the Behar Ryot is a miserable serf whom neither magistrates nor judges can protect, and whom education has failed to impress with the idea that he can call anything his own. To remedy this state of things it is not proposed to strengthen the established tribunals, to impress on magistrates the necessity of protecting the weak against the strong, to give any one Ryot arbitrarily ejected or shifted from his holding in the eleventh month of his twelfth year of occupancy a cheap and summary redress, or by proclamation or example to show whole classes what to do. It is seriously proposed to make a registration of the existing Khamar lands, or those held and cultivated by the Zemindar through his own servants, and not to allow this stock of land ever to be increased. Hitherto by the common law of the country not only do all waste lands, whether of the swamp or the forest, belong to the Zemindar as part of his estate, but all Ryots' lands vacated by death or desertion, or other cause, revert ipso facto to the superior landlord. It was always thought that he could deal with such vacated plots as he liked, induct new Ryots, or reserve the land as a garden, a Runna or chase, or cultivate it by his own bullocks and ploughs. Now the Legislature steps in and gravely rules that the "existing stock of Khamar land cannot be hereafter increased," and that when land falls in, or even when a Zemindar purchases a Ryot's tenure, as he constantly does, he must re-let it to a fresh tenant. No wonder that the landholders denounce this provision as arbitrary and unjust. Whether it amounts to a deliberate breach of the covenant entered into by Lord Cornwallis in 1793 may be a question. But it is quite certain that it is admirably contrived to irritate and annoy a very important class, without conferring any large benefits on the community or increasing the area available for scientific agriculture. Moreover, a proposal of this kind, interfering with a privilege of long continuance though occasionally abused, is a practical confession of administrative weakness. Surely a Government which has at its beck judges, magistrates, sub-divisional joint-magistrates, police inspectors and constables, ought to be able with the laws and tribunals in existence to check any wholesale appropriation of this kind. After all, there must be a good tract of country yet available for the Ryots, as it is admitted that they still hold as Ryotty three-fourths of the land in Behar. A Zemindar may not be the ideal of either Lord Cornwallis or Lord Tennyson. He may not correspond to the sketch of the former in the Proclamation of 1793, exerting himself "in the cultivation of his lands"; nor may he bear even a remote resemblance to the broad-shouldered genial Englishman of the latter in the Princess, who bred prize oxen and sheep, patronized some thirty charities, and wrote pamphlets on guano and on grain. But there are laws which annoy and vex one party far more than they can ever benefit another; and this provision, though it has, to our surprise, the endorsement of the present able Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, is just one which will present the Zemindars with a perpetual grievance, while it will not perceptibly increase the food or absorb the surplus of the cultivating castes.

The above is an instance of legislation ill advised in scope rather than extensive in effect. On the question of improvements the writer says little or nothing. The chapter in the Bill dealing with this question is not very long; but it is difficult to compress into a page or two more ignorance of the parts respectively played by Zemindar and Ryot in what we call "improvements." Legislation on this head was needless. If there is one thing on which the native community in populous districts is agreed more than another, it is as to those operations which concern any one plot and its occupants and those which concern the population at large. It is well understood that each Ryot may stick to the ordinary crops of rice and pulse as he pleases, or embark in the more profitable but more expensive cultivation of jute, sugar-cane, tobacco, pan, date-trees, and the like. It is the Zemindar or Talukdar who undertakes or promotes works in which the residents of ten villages or of a crowded gunje or mart have a pious or social interest—a fine reservoir, a temple to Shiva, a bathing ghaut of stone or brick, a canal draining a swamp, a road connecting a large bazaar with the river and the villages by which it is kept constantly supplied. These several and distinct improvements have hitherto, as a rule, been performed without clashing of interests, social misunderstandings, or costly litigation. The Indian Government has now cunningly devised clauses which can only have the effect of setting every one by the ears. A Ryot will be expected to ask his landlord's permission to clear jungle, to erect his own dwelling-house, to make an embankment against a flood, or to dig a well in his own garden. And a landlord who may have a fancy for meddling with his tenantry may call on them, in writing, to make "improvements" within a reasonable time. On the Ryot's neglect or refusal the landlord may make them himself. There is a touch of humour in the application of these sections to a country where the Ryot is often of one creed and the Zemindar of another, or where, if both are Hindus, one may be a Sudra and the other a high-caste Brahmin. Who is to define what a Hindu Zemindar may decree to be an "improvement" on the tenancy of a solitary Mussulman? May the former call on the latter to build a temple to Kali, or to provide a burning ghaut for his own co-religionists? Would not a Mussulman Ryot think a private burial-ground, at the end of his own garden, such as we have often seen, more of an improvement? The whole of this mischievous chapter, with its ridiculous compensation clauses dragged in from the Irish Land Act, is simply calculated to sow distrust and defiance, and should be mercilessly expunged. A powerful Government ought to be ashamed of an unacquaintance with rustic life hardly permissible in a junior civilian of three years' standing.

The occupancy-right is a more perplexing and imperative question, and it is closely connected with the legal sale and transfer of such a right. All these Minutes and Reports have only made clearer what was quite clear before to a good many District Officers, that the tenant-right, with its occupancy and customary rental, had a distinct market value; that, like the kingdoms in the Talking Oak, it "overset or passed from hand to hand"; and that it was often as eagerly competed for by the Zemindar himself as by the Ryot. Nothing is more common than for the Zemindar to purchase these rights on his own estate and on those of his rivals and neighbours. Very possibly this custom, though fully recognized by the courts of law, has not been acknowledged by any statute, and it may often cause excitement, distrust, and litigation. A Ryot, unable to cope with A, his own landlord, sells his tenancy privately to B, a neighbouring Zemindar; or C, a third Zemindar, wishing to get a locus standi on the estate of D, his rival, purchases at a sale in execution the tenure of one of D's Ryots. Or, again, if a Zemindar is a vigorous manager, and has vigorous agents, the new tenant at a private sale pays down a fine on entrance. But these sorts of transfers, dictated by pique, anger, inability to resist oppression, love of annoyance, or mere legitimate speculation, are so thoroughly understood that they require nothing but a broad announcement in any new Act, that henceforth their free sale and transfer is a part of the statute law of the land. Not content with this, the Government has involved itself in a maze of contradictions and inconsistencies about the landlord's right of pre-emption, and tenants, and the sub-tenants of tenants, and other complicated matters, and has lost sight of the main object, which the writer says truly should have been the fostering "of a substantial class of cultivators who have direct interest in the agriculture of the country."

This is the more to be regretted as the Draft contains divers unexceptionable provisions about the ascertainment of the Pergunnah rates by a Special Commission so as to serve as a guide to the Courts, the payment of rent by four instalments in the year, accuracy and punctuality in receipts and accounts, simplification of legal procedure, and the prohibition when rent has been once fixed judicially, of any new suit for the next ten years. But the Draft entirely fails to deal properly with the evil practice of abwabs or extra and illegal cesses, nor does it discredit that of purchasing all sorts of tenures in fictitious or sham or shadowy names. The Bill, however, is in suspense till next November, and we may hope that by that time the Government may abandon the idea that difficulties will cease in proportion as sections and clauses bristle and multiply, and that they may devise some more moderate project which, while it secures and improves the position of the countless tenantry, may not be unjust to a higher class of men who in the time of famine have been useful, and in the time of mutiny, loyal and well-affected to the British Power.

TWO SUMMER STORIES.[a]

THOSE wandering Englishmen who have found themselves on the lofty piazzas of a Saratoga hotel in the height of the torrid season, or who have sat in cool comfort on the hospitable verandahs of a Newport cottage, where lawns of an almost English richness of verdure slope away to the pleasant waters of Narragansett Bay, cannot but have made the acquaintance of a variety of fiction known in the United States as the "summer novel." The wandering Englishman will, no doubt, have seen many of the pretty girls of America reading the flat quarto pamphlets into one of which the pirate-publisher reprints the solid three volumes of the English novel; but he must also have noticed by the side of these thin piratical octaves certain stouter octavo volumes stitched into paper covers. These latter were Summer Novels, and they are generally of American authorship. Their chief characteristics are brevity and liveliness; for the Summer Novel is the reverse of the Convalescent Novel. As we understand the matter, the convalescent desires a novel of gentle interest, of exciting episode, and of interminable length; while the general reader in summer seeks rather for a short tale which will keep him quietly awake during a sultry afternoon. The ideal Convalescent Novel is the great epic of the great Dumas, with its many sequels, wherein all the daring deeds are duly set down of the Three Musketeers. The ideal Summer Novel is Mr. Howells's If Chance Acquaintance, or Mr. James's Siege of London, truly books for an idle hour—bright and brief. It is as Summer Novels that we must describe the two books before us; one of them is American in authorship, and the other is English; one of them is by an experienced teller of tales, and the other is plainly enough a first attempt; one of them is by a man, and the other, in spite of a masculine nom de guerre, is obviously the handiwork of a woman; one covers almost the whole of the heroine's life, and the other confines itself to the setting forth of the events of six weeks; but the one and the other are Summer Novels in their brevity, their simplicity of plot, and their liveliness of narration.

Mr. Edward Everett Hale is known to all Americans as a born story-teller, as a dozen ingenious and original tales have fully proved. That Mr. Hale has written many stories not equal to his best does not detract from the merit of that best. And those who know My Double and How He Undid Me and The Skeletons in the Closet, and, above all, the admirable Man Without a Country—one of the very finest short stories ever written—will acknowledge that this best is good indeed. Among his longer stories, Back to Back, excellent in its concision, vigour, and relief, is perhaps the foremost. In the Fortunes of Rachel the chief quality is simplicity and straightforwardness. What Mr. Hale offers us is a series of scenes—a panorama, in fact, of the life of a young English girl, who is rescued from a wreck and taken to the United States at the age of fourteen. We are shown how she fell in with a very pleasant and humorous old lady; how she was educated; how she lost her "Aunt Lois"; how she was thrown on her own resources; how she began to earn her living; how the wrong man fell in love with her; how she does not marry him; how she does marry the right man; how she makes him a good wife in prosperity and in adversity; and how her husband is at last made a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States toward the beginning of the next century; for Mr. Hale has boldly projected his story into the future, without however wasting any space on the minor effects to be derived from this anticipation of what is yet in store for us. The story is interesting, which is the great thing in a story. The reader is carried on with a rush, and he moves from the East to the West, and again from the mines of the Rocky Mountains to the society of Washington, before he has time to take breath. The characters are all honest folk, brave men and fair women; there are no villains in the tale and there are no midnight plottings and secret murders. The story is honest, and healthy, and helpful: and it gives a far more accurate idea of life as it is in the United States than can be derived from the more elaborate studies of society along the sea-coast, where the American has been more or less contaminated by the European. Mr. Hale is sufficiently American to let one of his characters refer to "a grand English lady whom we had here; her husband is professor of applied bad manners in Oxford, I believe" (p. 105), and to set forth the application of one of the young ladies who was in process of education with Rachel, for permission to go driving with a gentleman (p. 75). Now the rules of the school allowed the young ladies to go out only with the father, the brother, or the fortunate young man to whom she might be engaged. So when Rachel's friend, Maria Kent, went to ask permission to drive with Mr. Wilcox, the principal asked:—

"And who is Mr. Wilcox, Miss Maria?"
"He is a friend of mine."
"You know the rules, Miss Maria; he is certainly not your father."
"No," said Maria, demurely.
"You have no half-brother named Wilcox?"
"No," said poor Maria.
"Are you engaged to the gentleman?"
"No," said Maria, "but I shall be before we come home."

In Sunny Switzerland is a simple little story; which it would be easy to damn with faint praise. But it is unpretending, and it is not uninteresting; and it is the work of an educated lady. It is a book which can be taken up with pleasure and laid down without great regret. The sentiment is wholesome, and it does not sink into sentimentality. The character of Mr. Folliot is very neatly hit off, and suggests that the writer may develop a stronger power of character-drawing; and the two sisters Eleanor and Verna are painted with sympathetic touches.

WITH LORD STRATFORD IN THE CRIMEAN WAR.*

IF there is not much information, there is a good deal of amusement to be got out of this volume. The writer never makes the mistake of dwelling too long on any subject; rather is he apt to arouse curiosity and then go off at a tangent without guaranteeing the authenticity of his anecdotes or giving chapter and verse for his facts. Mr. Skene has been, we learn, alternately soldier, diplomatist, and author. He appears to have lived on remarkably intimate and privileged terms with the "Great Elchi," Lord Stratford de Redcliffe; but in what capacity he served him, whether as attaché, aide-de-camp, secretary, counsellor, interpreter, or chef, we are left to imagine. All we know is that Mr. Skene was privileged to hold many conversations with the ambassador on the most important political events, to give counsel to the great man, and, indeed, to argue with him. It is amusing to meet with such phrases as "I tried to calm Lord Stratford's irritation"; "The Ambassador's way of putting the case seemed to me so unanswerable that I let him have the last word"; "I explained to Lord Stratford the accepted maxim of military science, that a besieging force ought to be twice as numerous as the defending garrison"; "Lord Stratford was horrified by the number of men placed hors de combat [in the assault of the Malakof and Great Redan]; but I explained to him that it was the unprepared advances against those works that so sadly augmented the lists of killed and wounded"; and more to the same effect. It is probably from an excess of modesty that Mr. Skene forbears to inform us in what relation he and the poor Ambassador so dependent upon him for an appreciation of the A B C of military matters stood to each other. It would have been satisfactory, also, to be told what military exploits Mr. Skene had performed to make of him so great an authority, and to know where he picked up his "accepted maxim of military science." If it is a maxim, it is one contradicted by the experience of a vast number of notable sieges; the fact being that the case of no two sieges can be precisely similar, so many circumstances combining to often make the relative number of opposing forces an inferior factor in bringing about the result.

Lord Stratford's character was curiously compounded. A man of genius, far-seeing views, wide sympathies, generous disposition, he had also le défaut de ses qualités; for he could be prejudiced, overbearing, and vehemently passionate in his too frequent exhibitions of indignation and anger. No one was more fitted for the position he held at Constantinople before the outbreak of the Crimean War, when it was necessary for England to have a strong man at the Turkish capital who should be at once able to déjouer Russian intrigues, to alternately cajole and terrify the Sultan, and to make matters go smoothly with France. Mr. Skene has an amusing anecdote in connexion with the Ambassador's proneness to lose his temper, but which illustrates also the facility with which he regained his self-control. He had been finding fault with a young attaché for making mistakes in copying a despatch. "Mistakes may be made," said Lord Stratford, "by the most careful attaché; how much more by the most careless!" The young diplomatist got exceedingly incensed, and told his chief that, although he was his Ambassador, he had no right to reprimand him for what was untrue, as he was not habitually careless. "You accuse me of untruthfulness! D—— your eyes!" exclaimed Lord Stratford. "D—— your Excellency's eyes!" retorted the youth. "The Elchi burst out laughing. Holding out his hand to him, he begged the attaché to excuse the infirmity of his temper, and they shook hands most cordially." One of Lord Stratford's characteristics was his veneration for royalty. We mean this in its best sense. He had scant veneration for royalty when it took the form of an Emperor Nicholas, or a Napoleon III., or a Sultan Abdul Medjid, although he was a sincere believer in divine right; but every member of our own Royal family was to him an object of unbounded deference. "I went," writes Mr. Skene, "one afternoon with Lord Stratford to dine with Admiral Sir James Dundas on board the Britannia. On reaching the ship we heard one of the officers call out, in a tone of no great respect, 'Come, come, Prince! this will never do; you must have that deck better swabbed.' 'The words Prince and swabbed do not seem to go well together,' said Lord Stratford to the Admiral who advanced to receive him; 'who is the Prince?' 'The Prince of Leiningen, the Queen's nephew, whom I do myself the honour of presenting to your Excellency,' replied Sir J. Dundas." On which the Ambassador told the young middy he was delighted to see him, and hoped to have the honour of his company at dinner next day at the Embassy. "He said this in a loud voice, so as to be heard by the officer who had dared to address a near relative of Her Majesty with so little ceremony; and then he turned round and scowled at the presumptuous culprit." We can easily imagine our democrats of to-day sneering at this deference to a near relative of Majesty as savouring of rankest toadyism; but Lord Stratford was anything but a toady to rank and power, and he would probably have been about the last person whom our Government at this moment would wish to have as their representative either at Cairo or Constantinople. But there is a more amusing anecdote in connexion with royalty. The Duke of Cambridge was expected as a guest at the Embassy, and on the morning of the day of his arrival the Ambassador went in his dressing-gown and slippers to see that the rooms were ready for his reception. He found the Duke's valet arranging the trunks and portmanteaus which had arrived, and began to give him directions how they should be placed. "The man left off working, and stared at Lord Stratford. 'I will tell you what it is,' he said at last. 'I know how His Royal Highness likes to have his things arranged better than you do. So you just shut up—and be off, will you, old feller?' Lord Stratford left the room in a towering passion, and, calling one of the attachés, ordered him to go and tell that man who it was he had ventured to address such language to. The attaché soon returned with sparkling eyes. 'Well, what did you say to him?' asked the Ambassador. 'I said to him, my lord, that the person to whom he had ventured to address such language was Her Majesty's representative in Turkey.' 'Ah, quite right. And what was his answer?' 'He answered, my lord, that he had never said you warn't.' It was a singular feature in Lord Stratford's hasty disposition that his anger would suddenly be appeased by anything which seemed to him ludicrous. It was so in this case, and he enjoyed a hearty laugh with his attaché."

Mr. Skene's version of the charge of the Light Brigade differs from the generally accepted one in a material point. He would have us believe that Lord Lucan, not seeing anything else to charge but a single Russian battery, ordered Lord Cardigan to charge it; that Lord Cardigan (apparently seeing nothing more) advanced on this one battery, but that Captain Nolan, perceiving the Brigade was going in the wrong direction, was, when killed by a shell, shouting and waving his sword to make it incline to the right. According to this, either Lord Cardigan was advancing, unknown to himself, against the Russian army in position, and then what becomes of his exclamation, "Here goes the last of the Cardigans!" or Nolan, not content with a charge upon a single battery, wished it to be delivered on the Russian army itself.

We are glad to note that Mr. Skene has no sympathy with the unjust and, we may add, stupid efforts of some few English writers on the war (and notably the historian par excellence of the war) to minimize in every imaginable way the extent of French co-operation during the campaign. That the French are undesirable as allies may be true. As a rule they have few principles and fewer scruples. But when we inveigh against their intense eagerness to shine, we are apt to forget that in a less demonstrative way we are equally determined to hold our own. And it is too often lost sight of that in the Crimea at one time, and that for a long period, our numbers were so insignificant, as compared with the French, that it was pardonable in the latter to imagine their rôle was the more important. To a one-sided Englishman or a one-sided Frenchman there can be no more edifying study than a perusal of Todleben's Crimean story. The one fresh from Kinglake and the other from Bazancourt will there find materials sufficient to enable them to form a juster estimate of the share of credit due to each. There is no more useless task than the writing of a one-sided history. It rarely convinces entirely even the actual generation, while the fallacies are invariably detected later on. In proof of this, we may cite the fact that among well-informed Frenchmen at the present day the Waterloo story of Thiers is regarded as an eloquent and patriotic romance. Colonel de la Tour d'Auvergne in his work on Waterloo observes that Thiers is "unsatisfactory." There can be no possible doubt that at Inkerman we were saved by the arrival of the French. As a Russian general remarked on the field to his staff:—"The French are saving the English at Inkerman, as the Prussians did at Waterloo." Of course there was no merit whatever in the mere fact that the French came up to assist us, and they are not entitled to the smallest shred of credit in having so come. But as a matter of fact their arrival did turn defeat into victory; and when we know, as we do know, that their co-operation, which might have been given grudgingly, was accorded in the most chivalrous and cordial manner, by all from the General-in-Chief downwards, it is as silly as it is unjust to endeavour to make light of and minimize the extent and efficacy of such co-operation. It is all the more strange and more silly that historians should write in a partial spirit when the actors in the drama were animated by the most generous sentiments.

Lord Raglan rode up to General Bosquet after the battle, and dropping his bridle on his charger's neck (it will be remembered Lord Raglan had lost an arm at Waterloo), took the Frenchman's hand, and thanked him in the name of England for the part he had taken in the battle. He added that he regretted not being able to press both his hands in cordial acknowledgment of the signal service which he had thus rendered. "I regret it more than you can," answered Bosquet, "for it was our fault that you should only have one." "All old scores have long since been wiped out," said Lord Raglan, "but even if they had not been already forgotten, the powerful support given by the French to the English this day would efface every painful remembrance between the two nations."

Mr. Skene has a "deliciously French" story anent the reason for the opposition shown by Marshal St. Arnaud to agree to Lord Raglan's wish to attack Sebastopol from the north, and so in all probability terminate the business by one grand coup. "Nous ne voulons pas," said one of St. Arnaud's staff to the author, "que les Russes cèdent trop vite—nous voulons beaucoup de tapage—nous aimons le tambour—nous aimons la gloire—nous aimons tout ce qui est creux—tout ce qui fait du bruit—nous autres de la Gr-r-rande Nation." It is one of the most paradoxical points in French character—one that makes it so little comprehensible to ordinary Englishmen—that while they delight in tapage and gloire, and in sounding hollownesses generally, their extreme acuteness prevents their being blind to the emptiness of such; and, if rallied thereupon, they will at one moment defend their position with every show of pride attacked, and the next—honour once satisfied—they will be the first to turn round and raise a laugh at their own expense.

We look upon it as pretty certain that in some future war we shall come to very serious grief if newspaper correspondents are permitted to circulate everywhere, pick the brains of those in authority, and telegraph right and left their information and impressions. General Todleben himself told Mr. Skene that in the Crimean War little information was to be got out of the French papers; but that it did not matter, as he received the English papers regularly, and that these supplied him with valuable data as to not only the English but the French proceedings. He said that from a London newspaper he learned that the salient angle of the Redan was being mined by the English, and accordingly he promptly set to work to countermine. "I went into it myself, and heard the English sappers and miners above me laughing and talking as they worked. When I left the countermine for the train to be fired, I felt how painful was the duty I had to fulfil. I saw the poor English sappers and miners blown into the air with heads, legs, and arms torn off."

We will conclude our notice of this volume of anecdotes—all more or less amusing, and all, we presume, more or less authentic—with one more citation. A certain field officer in the Crimea was the perfection of a commanding officer in every respect, but with one sad defect—he took more brandy and soda than was good for him.

I asked him one day how he liked Constantinople. He said it would be a charming place were it not for its abominably unhealthy climate. I remarked that I had never heard of the unhealthiness of Constantinople. "Well," he remarked, "all I can say is that I was not there a week before I had delirium tremens. I ought to have stayed at the Scutari hospital, where Miss Nightingale assured me that neither she nor any of her lady-nurses had ever had it. But I thought I had got so strong under their care that I should be proof against the infection of the delirium tremens which is raging on the other side of the Bosphorus. The Greek Patriarch and several of the Ambassadors are suffering dreadfully from it. Constantinople has a bad climate, believe me."

We have not touched upon the author's exposition of Lord Stratford's political views and diplomatic conduct, as there is nothing in the book under these heads with which the public is not already familiar. The treaty of peace, after a war the results of which were in no way advantageous to Turkey, in whose interests it was nominally begun, was expected to settle the Eastern Question for ever. Yet Lord Stratford lived to see another war between Turkey and Russia, and on this occasion his voice was raised to oppose England's participation in it. By this time he had given up Turkey as being in an irreclaimably bad political and social condition. Indeed, before then "he had remarked to me, with evident mortification," says Mr. Skene, "'There is no more prosperity in store for Turkey than there was for Rome when Horace bewailed the decline of his country's vigour and virtues; and no long time elapsed before an irruption of barbarians overthrew it.' He frowned as he emphatically pronounced the word 'barbarians,' pointing northwards from the open window of his study at Therapia, where he sat enjoying a cool breeze and an uninterrupted view of the Black Sea."

MANUSCRIPTS IN THE BRITISH MUSEUM.*

THERE are few literary tasks apparently so simple, yet practically so difficult, as the compilation of a really serviceable catalogue of a large and important collection; and there is hardly any work which, if satisfactorily executed, evidences such close attention and such long and patient labour, and yet, with the generality of students, meets with so little approval or is more ruthlessly criticized. And when the collection is extensive and varied, as is that of the Manuscript Department of the British Museum, the probabilities of producing a catalogue which is neither too elaborate or too much condensed are by no means to be under-estimated. "Logic," it has been said, "has not yet succeeded in laying down a formula for the production of a title-page which shall be both concise and exhaustive, and constitute an infallible finger-post to the nature of a book." A catalogue of manuscripts is a long series of title-pages; and while one student will complain that the several entries are frequently insufficient to direct his researches, another will groan under the weight of seemingly interminable repetitions, and wish the editor had resorted to some sterner system of compression. The golden mean would surely seem to have been attained in these recently-issued catalogues. They may not be perfect, for all human pens are fallible; but it is not easy to suggest in what direction they could be improved; and, having tested them somewhat severely, the critic is more inclined to acknowledge the success that has been attained than search for possible errors, or question the system upon which they are devised, or the ability which has guided their arrangement. They do not form a complete catalogue of the MSS. in the custody of the department, since they commence only with the Addition made since 1854, and, with the exception of the selection from the Stowe MSS., are brought down only to the end of the year 1882. The MSS. previously acquired are less satisfactorily indexed. Possibly the Trustees may be induced to reprint, or rather recast and publish, these earlier volumes, that the whole series may be attainable in more convenient form, and so find their proper place on the shelves of every reference and public library.

The manuscript collection in the Museum is a singularly rich one. Few even of the more intelligent visitors who are attracted by the cases in "the King's Library" and the anteroom by which it is approached have any clear idea of the extent and value of a collection of which comparatively few selected examples can at any time be exhibited. That the greater part of these treasures should remain unseen by the general public is inevitable. Complaints from time to time are uttered, even in those august Houses which are supposed to represent the united wisdom of the nation, that the collections in the British Museum are not more popularized; and suggestions have even been made that not only should every nook and corner of the Museum be thrown open, but that important parts of the collections should periodically visit the provincial museums, as do certain selections from the galleries at South Kensington. But, if these national treasures are not better known, it is from no fault of the department. Consistently with their safe custody, there is no museum in the world where everything the student can reasonably desire is so completely at his command, and where more courteous assistance is always at hand to further his researches. The production of these recently-issued catalogues is evidence sufficient of the anxiety of those who, under the Trustees, have the custody of the collection to make its contents more widely known and more generally available. Had a greater measure of success in times past attended their endeavours, the country would not now have to regret the dispersal of collections which can never be recovered. The Hamilton MSS. would not have gone to Berlin, or the larger portion of the Ashburnhams have been refused.

It is not easy to account for the extraordinary indifference with which the English people have, until very recent years, regarded the possession and the safe custody of manuscripts and charters, without which history degenerates into tradition. Mr. Ewald, of the Record Office, in his Stories from the State Papers, has graphically told what dangers many of our most valuable public papers have escaped. At one time an important section were described by Prynne, temp. Charles II., as "buried together in a confused chaos, under corroding, putrefying cobwebs, dust, and filth, in the dark corners of Cæsar's Chapel in the White Tower." The "Records of the Queen's Remembrancer" were for many years deposited in sheds near the King's Mews at Charing Cross, subject to untold injuries from damp and rats; and, when the Mews were pulled down to make way for that supreme effort of English architecture, the National Gallery, the papers that survived were removed to the stables at Carlton House, to a building which the late Mr. Braidwood reported would not resist a fire for twenty minutes.

The venerable Domesday Book, the most priceless record in Europe, was preserved in the Chapter-house of Westminster Abbey, behind which were a brewhouse and a washhouse "reported as dangerous, and endangering the safety of the Chapter-house by fire," while the number of papers, royal, political, and private, which have entirely disappeared can never probably be known. A Treaty concluded with Holland in 1654 has been bought at an auction, and an original Treaty with Portugal of the same year was discovered at an old bookstall. It was not until 1851 that any serious attempt was made to provide for the safe custody of deeds and papers which, from their historical importance and antiquity, are absolutely invaluable. "They stand unrivalled," writes Mr. Ewald, "and cast the archives of Rome, Paris, Vienna, the Hague, and Madrid completely into the shade." To these papers a large proportion of the collections in the British Museum are actually supplementary; "divers books, treaties, papers, and records of State," which in the earlier careless days were liable to loss or theft, have in numerous instances found their way into the Manuscript Department, which also lovingly shelters treasures rescued from a still more cruel fate; such are the Service Books, the Hours, and Manuals of Devotion in which England was at one time extraordinarily rich. The Reformation and the Commonwealth, whatever blessings they may have brought in their train, were not favourable to art, nor were the iron-helmeted troopers who, whether serving under Henry VIII., or some hundred or more years later under Cromwell, took a pious delight in looting an abbey or a cathedral library, accustomed to show more reverence to Books of Hours or MSS., illuminated or "in camaieu gris," than to sacred images or painted windows; and the artist and the bibliophile may record in unison of horror how the glovers of a Midland town long supplied themselves with vellum from the plunder of a single library.

The 4,100 MSS., collected by Sir Hugh Sloane in the early part of the eighteenth century, and acquired by the nation on the establishment of the British Museum at Montague House, in 1753, forms the nucleus of the present collection. At the same time were added the 1029 Cottonian MSS., mostly of extreme value and rarity, brought together by Sir Robert Cotton in the seventeenth century; the MSS. 7,644, from the library of Robert Harley, Earl of Oxford; and the "Old Royal Collection," formerly belonging to James I., and incorporated with the rest in 1757, 1,950 volumes. Fifty years later, in 1807, the Lansdowne MSS., in 1,245 volumes, were purchased. The next important addition was of 514 MSS. from Mr. Francis Hargrave, in 1813. Four years afterwards 524 volumes were purchased from the executors of the Rev. Charles Burney. The Royal collection, formed by George III., now called "The King's," of 446 volumes, was added in 1823, in the reign of George IV. This was followed, in 1831, by 550 volumes from the collection of Thomas Howard, fourteenth Earl of Arundel; while the Egerton collection, continually augmented by funds bequeathed for the purpose by its generous donor, Francis Henry Egerton, eighth Earl of Bridgewater, and by Charles Long, Lord Farnborough, in 1825, at the end of the year 1882 numbered 2,610 volumes. The series called "The Additional MSS.," in which the above-named collections are not included, are numbered in continuation of the Sloane collection; beginning with 4,101, and increased from time to time by bequest or purchase, the final entry recorded in these catalogues is No. 31,896. Last year were added MSS. from the Stowe collection, formed by the Marquis of Buckingham at the beginning of the present century, a part—an important one, certainly, but only a part—of what has acquired a greater celebrity as "The Ashburnham MSS." It may be remarked that the Government, in sanctioning the purchase, to which they had been so strongly urged, were not unmindful of "Irish ideas," but, impelled by some inscrutable influence, caused to be transferred all Irish MSS. and all volumes relating to the sister isle to the library of the Royal Academy at Dublin. It is to be hoped in the interests of art, literature, and science, that this singular decision will not establish a precedent, or be allowed a retrospective action, since it might somewhat seriously interfere with the chief objects of the Museum if its contents generally were relegated to their parental soil.

"The Catalogue of Romances" deserves a fuller notice. It is at present sufficient to remark that it is a good example of what is called in the department a "Class Catalogue." The Oriental MSS., numbering more than 8,500, and described in twelve volumes; and the Spanish MSS., in three, are also "Class Catalogues." The Papyri, and a very varied and extensive collection of Bullæ and detached seals, are indexed in these volumes. To these, in estimating the richness of the entire department, must be added the collection of Deeds, Rolls, and Charters, only partially included in these recently-issued volumes. The Harleian charters, not a few of which date before the Norman conquest, are indexed in seven folios. The "Additional Charters" are numbered up to 27,000; the "Egerton," 485. Probably the whole number, when the catalogues are complete, will be found to exceed 100,000. It may be mentioned as showing the extent of these collections that the catalogues required for use in the department fill no less than 110 thick folio volumes. A class catalogue might with advantage be made of the collection of music in score. It would include a most interesting and valuable series of works once in the possession of Mr. Julian Marshall, and dating forwards from the sixteenth century, partially in holograph, of the greatest and most renowned composers.

It can never, of course, be suggested that "A Catalogue of Additional MSS." of "the Stowe Collection," or even of "Romances," still less a ponderous "Index" of 1,500 closely-printed pages in double column, are titles which will prove particularly attractive to the general reader; nor would the volumes themselves meet the wishes of those light-hearted students who never wander beyond the fugitive literature of the day. We should not look for these books at a railway-station, or expect them in our box from Mudie's; yet there are entries even in the "Index" which by their suggestiveness will imperiously arrest the attention of that happiest of all students, the "desultory reader"—as the eye of the Ancient Mariner fascinated the wedding guest—and compel his swift attendance in the MSS. room. What bibliophile could resist in vellum folio a fifteenth-century translation into "Englysshe" of a work by Bonaventura, suggestive from initial letter to colophon of the vigorous polemics of those early days, the cadences of which have not yet entirely ceased, entitled "A short tretis written to confusion of al fals lollardes and heretykes"? How painful his regret that a volume of poems and short treatises should be labelled "imperfect" when among its contents are Gospel stories, hymns, religious songs, and "disputacions"—a veritable page from some Christian Knowledge Society catalogue of the day. We should all be the better, if the chapter were only complete, for "A ful good meditacion for on to seye bi him self al on"; we could not fail to benefit by "the fourme of parfyt liuinge the whuche holi Richard the hermit of hampalle wrot to a recluse that was jcleped Margate"; and there must be many a volume in a churchman's library less edifying than "a luytel Boke that was writen to a worldly lord to teche hym hou he schuld haue hym in his state in ordeynyng loue to god and to his euen cristene." That the spelling in these old manuscripts is sometimes quaint and irregular, and that "monkish Latin" should have become proverbial, is perhaps accounted for by the occasional discovery of one of the rarest of literary treasures, a school-book of those days. The most rigid examiner would be merciful with a class whose only English-Latin dictionary had no earlier entry than "Bovntcovsnesse," and which abruptly ends with "Tryin a truthe be doom Discerno nis." The "Aduertisements of a loyall subiect to his gratious Souereigne drawne from the observations of the peoples speeches" might, while the House is in Committee, be studied with some advantage by the Speaker; and, impatient as are certain legislators of what they contemptuously term "ancient history," the time of the House itself would not be entirely wasted if a Government evening were devoted to "Certayne speciall Proiects to discouer from the Tyme past, and to preuent for the Tyme too come sundrye greate Abuses." Of volumes of a still graver character the Society for Psychical Research might fitly take cognisance. No modern tale of Spiritualism in which the intervention of a "medium" is necessary could surely be so instructive as a direct and animated "disputacion" between a good man and an evil spirit, the more interesting since the mysterious stranger stigmatized by the author as "a wikked gost" attempts to conceal his real nature, or possibly the want of it, by speaking of himself merely as a "ferrene mon an a wai feeringe." Equally suited to their purposes should be an account of an apparition at Alexti, near Avignon, and his, or its, conversation with the Prior of a house of "Frere prechoures," the slightly incomprehensible title would present no difficulty, "A good tretis that men clepeth spiritu Gwydonis." If wit is rightly defined as "an incongruity which excites surprise," a MS. of much more recent days is infinitely pleasing. Who would have supposed "the little Corporal" was a theologian, or expect "Notes on the Books of the Old Testament" by Napoleon Buonaparte. But for exquisite humour, the purest because most unconscious, commend us to a Poet Laureate's birthday ode; a holograph in the Stowe collection, and now exhibited in the King's Library. It is by Nahum Tate, addressed to that "Best of Kings," George I., of whom Macaulay writes so unlovingly, and is alone worth a pilgrimage to Bloomsbury. One stanza may be quoted. The poet adjures "the harmonious Powers,"

> In the transport of your joys,
> Beware the sacrilegious crime
> Of trespassing upon the monarch's time,
> Which since for common welfare he employs
> The Muses' tribe would wrong
> The public int'rest to detain him long.

DAY'S COLLACON.*

WE should have been inclined to look upon this book as a joke, did it not contain 1,216 pages, in double columns, and weigh over eight pounds avoirdupois. Whether for a Collacon it is long and heavy or short and light we cannot say, as it is the first specimen of that species that we have as yet come across. A man who had seen only one hippopotamus could not tell whether, among hippopotamuses, it was anything out of the common. For all he could know, it might be a mere baby. Should our readers ask what kind of a thing a Collacon is, we must refer them to the title-page. There they will learn that it is an Encyclopædia of Prose Quotations. How, by the way, a work that is limited not only to quotations, but to quotations of one kind, can be an encyclopædia is not worth inquiring. Mr. Day, no doubt, is as ignorant of the true meaning of an encyclopædia as the rest of the world is of that of Collacon. For a long time we puzzled ourselves over the derivation of this strange term. At last we were able to hit on an explanation that seems satisfactory. In the Preface the author tells us that "some years ago it was his good fortune to meet Mr. James Ellis, who had prepared a volume for publication under the title of Laconia; or, Gems of Literature, Original and Selected." "This production," he continues, "contained so many quotations that were adapted to this work, that an arrangement was at once entered into by which the manuscript was secured, and the author himself engaged to assist in completing the Collacon." The title, then, we infer, is meant to imply either a collection of laconic sayings at which one man has worked with another, or else a collection which every one can carry with him. Against this latter signification we must set the eight pounds avoirdupois. A rich man, no doubt, might always be followed by his page, who should carry his Collacon ready for him. In that way, should even two thousand subjects be discussed, he would have almost at his finger's end forty thousand quotations from the eight thousand most eminent writers of all nations. To a member of Parliament this collection should be invaluable. No matter to what party he may belong, or what hobby-horse he may ride, let him keep his Collacon on the bench by him, he will always have ready an appropriate laconic saying.

* Day's Collacon: an Encyclopædia of Prose Quotations. Consisting of Beautiful Thoughts, Choice Extracts, and Sayings, of the most Eminent Writers of all Nations, from the Earliest Ages to the Present Time; together with a Comprehensive Biographical Index of Authors, and an Alphabetical List of Subjects quoted. Compiled and arranged by Edward Parsons Day. London: Sampson Low & Co.

The Collacon is still further enriched by portraits of the most illustrious among the eight thousand of the most eminent writers, and by a biographical index, in which we have a brief account of them all. Thereby we become acquainted not only with the lives, but also with the features, of Zoroaster and Mr. Edward Parsons Day, and of Confucius and Mr. James Ellis. People are certainly jumbled together in the strangest manner. Thus in the index we come across such an assemblage of names as the following:—

> Thomas A Kempis. See Kempis, Thomas A.
> Thomas, Annie (Mrs. Pender Cudlip, q. v.)
> Thomas Aquinas, Saint. See Aquinas, Saint Thomas.

Among the portraits, on the same sheet and all in a line, we find Goethe, Cicero, Demosthenes, and Noah Webster. George Lippard, of Chester County, Pennsylvania, is given just above John Locke, and Henry Ward Beecher above Edmund Burke. Fanny Fern, otherwise Sarah Payson Willis Parton, "who gained a widespread reputation as a writer of spicy articles," is joined with Lady Mary Wortley Montagu. Sir Philip Sidney is matched with W. G. Simms, and Dean Swift with Henry W. Shaw, better known as Josh. Billings. Queen Victoria, Mrs. Emma Hart Willard, of Berlin, Connecticut, and Lydia Huntley Sigourney (the American Hemans) seem each pleased with the society of the other two. Still more comical is the effect that is produced by the way in which the quotations are arranged. Should we turn, for instance, to the heading "Drinking," the first of the eight thousand most eminent writers that is allowed to speak is P. T. Barnum, who briefly says:—"Use no intoxicating drinks." He is at once followed by Demosthenes. Lower down on the same page, between the author of the Anatomy of Melancholy and Dr. Johnson, we have Elisha L. Magoon, of Lebanon, New Hampshire, who says:—

> The votaries of distilled drinks and voluptuous dishes, saturated with alcohol, bloated with gluttony, and filthy with tobacco, inflame their debauchery to the greatest degree until nature is exhausted, and then, down the gloomy gulf of suicide or the fiery one of delirium tremens, they plunge to eternal death.

Burton, by the way, is made to describe men in a tavern as "drinking venenum (sic) pro vino." Dr. Johnson is followed by Mr. James Ellis, who, as one of his "original gems of literature," declares that "Drunkenness is the devil's agent." He in his turn is followed by the author of the Collacon himself, who, not to be outdone in sententious originality by his partner, maintains that "A drunkard is his own tormentor." Mr. Martin F. Tupper, coming between Krishna and Plato, asserts that "Work done may claim its wages." In one line Mrs. Abigail G. Whittlesey writes, "Mothers, endeavour to educate your daughters"; and in the next line Aristotle asserts that "Mothers are more fond of their children than fathers are." Just between Goethe and Raleigh we find Louisa Caroline Huggins Tuthill, who has discovered that "Self-government is a much more difficult task for the irritable, the passionate, the sanguine, than for the naturally amiable." On the same page Mrs. Emma Tuttle, an American Spiritualist, supported on one side by Macrobius and on the other by Seneca, maintains that "Self-esteem is not vanity; it is consciousness of having lived right." Mr. E. P. Day and his partner, perhaps, are Tuttleites. They certainly have self-esteem, for they not only give their own portraits, but they quote themselves more largely by far than almost any other of the eight thousand most eminent writers. Bismarck, Cobden, Darwin, Grote, John Stuart Mill, they quote twice; Mr. Huxley, seven times; Mr. Tupper, 59 times; and Dr. Elisha L. Magoon, 110 times; while from Mr. Day we have 230 quotations, and from Mr. Ellis 400 at least. Mr. Day is the discoverer of such truths as the following:—"Arithmetic is an aid to every science," and "Duelling is a relic of barbarism." Among Mr. Ellis's "original gems" we read:—"They who favour the eating of suppers overlook the wisdom of the salutary and restricting laws of nature." He is not so fond of brevity as his partner. The following is a fair specimen of his 400 gems:—

> It is a deplorable state of things when a fair and upright conduct avails less in the success of an undertaking, than the employment of duplicity and artifice, and would be most likely to defeat it, when the other would be almost certain to accomplish the end in view.

It is a little puzzling to find among the writers in prose—who alone, according to the editor, are quoted in the Collacon—Homer and Æschylus, Virgil and Horace. Perhaps Mr. Day has become acquainted with these writers in the translations published by Mr. Bohn, and may not have discovered that in the original they had written in verse. It is scarcely less puzzling to be told that Sallust asserted that "Every man is born a pauper." In the Biographical Index we come across some strange statements. John Sterling is described as a Scottish divine, and Mr. Leslie Stephen as an English theologian. After Mrs. Browning has been introduced as "one of England's most gifted female poets," in the next paragraph we come upon "Browning, Robert, husband of the preceding, born in Camberwell." We hope that the Browning Societies will not pass over this slight cast on their favourite author by an American editor, even though his Collacon does weigh over eight pounds. By the way, the quotations from both husband and wife are verse, printed to look like prose—not, perhaps, a very difficult matter, in the case of one of them at least. Lord George Gordon is entered only as "Gordon, George, the leader of the Gordon Riots"; but, to make up for this, we find "Trevelyan, Lord, K.C.B. (Sir Charles Edward)." The last Earl of Derby is described as "Stanley, Lord, Edward Geoffroy Smith (Earl of Derby)." The Duchess of Marlborough, we read, was "a lady celebrated for her beauty, ambition, and political influence." She should be still more celebrated for her length of years; for, if we may trust the Biographical Index, while she was born in 1660, she did not die till 1774. When we turned to the Collacon to see what it was she had said that found her a place in this Encyclopædia, we read that she is the author of that "beautiful thought, choice extract, or saying, Let us do all in our power for the relief of those in distress." Surely Pope did so good a woman grievous wrong when he described her as > Sick of herself through very selfishness.

Some of the characters are not wanting in a kind of comicality. Thus we are briefly told that Edward IV. was "a brave prince, possessing many amiable qualities." Edward VI. was "an amiable and humane monarch, and author of several works." Elizabeth was merely "a highly accomplished woman." Charles II. "lacked the virtues of his father, being noted for his immoralities," while "James II. was a brave, determined, and energetic monarch." Of Arthur we are told nothing more than that he was a king of a tribe of ancient Britons and author of the saying "Deny not to woman the proper use of her tongue." King Alfred—just as if his death were recorded in the columns of the Times—"died universally lamented." Among the sayings none perhaps is more extraordinary than one which is put in the mouth of the late Sir Rowland Hill. He not only, it should seem, discovered penny-postage, but also the following profound truth:—"Birth is a shadow, courage, self-sustained, out-lords succession's phlegm, and needs no ancestors." Such a saying surely must belong to one of the celebrated American writers who are found in these pages in swarms. One of the three Dodges, for instance, might have uttered it—Dodge, Mary A., or Dodge, Mary M., or Dodge, R. J. Or was it not spoken by George W. Shinn, or Dr. Joel Shew—Shinn, who maintains that "Hope is the expectation of good," and Shew, who boldly asserts that "Idiocy is characterized by a more or less complete obliteration of the moral and intellectual faculties." In these eight pounds weight of pages let not a single man be defrauded. Though England should suffer by seeing one of her sons struck out from the list of the eight thousand most eminent writers of the world, nevertheless let justice be done. With his one quotation gone, Sir Rowland Hill will no longer figure in the Collacon, but his place will be worthily supplied by one who no doubt "out-lords succession's phlegm, and needs no ancestors."

TWO BOOKS ON ANCIENT SCULPTURE.*

WE are afraid that we shall give offence to both the authors whose works we have here under review by linking them together in a single notice. We can imagine that to Mr. Murray Mrs. Mitchell seems superficial, second-rate, and sentimental, and that to Mrs. Mitchell Mr. Murray seems pedantic, crotchety, and wrongheaded. We, however, hold a higher opinion of each of them than perhaps they hold of one another, and in this season of the year, if two archæologists will insist on bringing out books together, they must expect simultaneous review. Besides it really is not necessary that the two authors should interfere with one another. Mrs. Mitchell's field is wide enough to take in sculpture from the beginning of the world. She discusses Egyptian, Assyrian, Phœnician, and Archaic Greek art, and has covered three hundred pages before she reaches the point where Mr. Murray takes up his parable, at the commencement of the age of Pheidias. Mr. Murray again is much more minute and positive than Mrs.

Mitchell in his mode of approaching the subject. He throws himself into controversy, and stands up with the enemy in the gate upon points of technical detail. He aims at being himself a Forscher, while Mrs. Mitchell merely performs the part of the wren seated between the wings of the soaring eagle of archæology. She makes no pretension to original research, but like a celebrated Oxford character, "what there is to know, she knows it."

We are sorry to be obliged to say that we do not like this second and final volume of Mr. Murray's quite so much as the first, which was published in 1880. In dealing with the archaic art of Greek, and following with scrupulous care the phenomena of its evolution, Mr. Murray showed himself not always, we think, a safe, but always an ingenious and pleasing, guide. It appears to us that the comparative poverty of the ground which he had to traverse was a preservative to him, and that in considering the fuller and more complex monuments of a later age, he has found himself painfully embarrassed by the mass of documents at his disposal. His style, which was at no time easy or eloquent, has become more harsh than it was, and some of his pages are downright hard to read. He has felt it desirable to open his discussion by a preliminary chapter on idealism, in which he has said a great deal that is ingenious and worthy of consideration, but in which he is too uneasily conscious of the prestige of foreign opinion. On the very first page, and at the very opening mention of idealism, we are delayed by a note in which the view of M. Eugène Véron is stated. We should have been satisfied on such a point as the definition of a philosophical term to have known Mr. Murray's view. We turn the page, and find that it is reduced to half its dimensions to make room for a very wordy passage from Hartmann's Philosophie des Unbewussten, and so the chapter proceeds, page by page. The quotations are often curious and obscure; those, for instance, from the Quid Phidiæ Plato debuerit of M. Lévêque lie outside the path of most people's reading. But the unhappy student, torn this way and that, is likely to cry at last—Let M. Lévêque and Herr Hartmann and all the other learned gentlemen write their own books. What we at present want to know is, what does Mr. Murray think?

There is perhaps no English archæologist who has made himself familiar with the conjectures of so many German and French scholars as Mr. Murray. His references to these authorities are copious and bewildering, and we cannot but feel that they would command a greater respect if they were more consistent. At the present moment the immense impetus which has been given to archæology by the recent discoveries at Olympia, Pergamus, and elsewhere, has tended to throw the development of theoretical research into chaos. The old views, the old standards of opinion, have to be abandoned, and who is to decide what the new ones are to be? The position of Alcamenes in the history of art is a case in point. Until the excavations at Olympia were made it was not possible for us to form any definite conception of the work of this man further than was implied by the facts that Pliny seems to speak of him as the pupil of Pheidias, and Pausanias as only second to that master in the cunning of sculpture. These statements left but little room for discussion, and Alcamenes took his conjectural place in history with little dispute. But now the whole state of the case is altered. Considerable fragments of the west pediment of the temple at Olympia, which we have the direct testimony of Pausanias was carved by Alcamenes, have come under our notice. It must be simply by an oversight, by the way, that Mrs. Mitchell in her plates attributes this pediment to Pæonius, and the eastern one to Alcamenes. But without any such rude reversal as this, we have ground enough for various conjecture. Brunn begins by entirely rejecting the supposition that Alcamenes was a pupil of Pheidias, since these newly-discovered works conform in no degree to the sculptures of the Parthenon, and he asserts that Alcamenes and Pæonius came together from some place in the north of Greece, and so were almost unaffected by the style of Pheidias. Furtwængler has gone further still, and has started the theory that Alcamenes was working on the pediments of Olympia a dozen years before the Parthenon was begun, and that Pheidias deigned to be indebted to him for ideas. Mr. Murray will none of this, and thinks that it was an Ionic tradition hanging about Alcamenes and Pæonius that makes their work seem in some respects more archaic than that of Pheidias. But now there comes in an odd story which has always been told to the credit of Pheidias—namely, that in a competition with Alcamenes the latter was about to win the prize, when the statue of the former was raised to the height for which it was intended, and was found to be by far the more skilful of the two. As an old Greek author puts it, Pheidias was found to be "optically and geometrically" the better sculptor. But Mr. Murray, with reference to the skill shown at Olympia, thinks that this story may be reversed; and, if we understand him rightly, believes that it was the youthful Pheidias who was beaten by Alcamenes. But now there arises Professor Boetticher, who concludes that Pausanias made a mistake in supposing that Alcamenes had anything to do with the sculptures at Olympia at all, and we are at sea again. It certainly is a terrible thing to reflect that our evidence of authorship rests entirely on a note in a journal as lax as a traveller's letter which should accidentally attribute to Salvator Rosa a group of paintings in a palace which were really painted by Domenichino.

Mrs. Mitchell does not trouble herself to go into these niceties of criticism. She sails more cheerfully than Mr. Murray over the hidden reefs of the subject, conscious that her bark is a lighter one than his. Yet it would be unfair to her not to point out that she has taken pains to ensure accuracy on all points that are not purely conjectural. Her proof-sheets have been revised by Professor von Duhn, of Heidelberg, and the principal authorities of the British Museum and of the Berlin National Museum appear as sponsors for her acquaintance with the results of the latest investigations. It has been at Heidelberg, and with daily recourse to the excellent Archæological Institute of that town, that she has spent the last year during which the composition of this volume occupied her. We may say that no woman has done so much to aid the popularization of sound archæological science. Mrs. Mitchell, moreover, writes in a flowing and agreeable style, without affectation, and without any of those peculiarities of diction which more original scholars have allowed to deform their descriptions. We are sometimes conscious that she has a German authority before her; but when she is free to write from memory or observation she puts her facts before us in a remarkably pleasing form. We are not sorry in a work of this scope to find the imaginative and decorative sides of ancient art dwelt upon in their due proportion. It is singular that such beautiful creations as a poem, or a picture, or a statue by a great master can so often, in the present day, appeal to the learned only as objects upon which to expend the dry labours of the scholiast. We are told what this professor and what that has fancied about them, we are furnished with statistical calculations of the number of feet in the one, the condition of the glazes in another, the peculiarities of the undercutting in the third. These things are not in themselves unessential, and indeed must not be omitted in any detailed examination of the work. But it is desirable to remind ourselves that, as Mr. Matthew Arnold has boldly said, "the aorists were made for man, not man for the aorists," and to set an appreciation of the glory and loveliness of a work of art, and of its spiritual significance, above the mere technology or grammar of it.

The illustration of a book on art is so large an element in its usefulness, that we cannot admit that it is an unimportant subject for criticism. In this respect Mrs. Mitchell has very greatly the advantage over Mr. Murray. Her book is illustrated copiously, irregularly, and from a great variety of sources, but some of her plates are among the least inadequate which we have seen. The phototype of the tragic head from the Villa Ludovisi, usually called "The Dying Medusa," opposite p. 618, is a charming reproduction of what evidently has been a good cast, untampered with. It is noticeable that this plate is clear, yet uniformly light in tone. It is better than that of a fragment of the Amazon Frieze, opposite p. 470, which is sculptor-like and free, but smudged or clouded in appearance. The colossal head of Aphrodite, from Berlin, which some critics attribute to the hand of Alcamenes himself, is excellently reproduced at p. 320, apparently from the original marble. On the whole we have seen no illustration to a work on antique sculpture more useful than this, which conceals nothing and corrects nothing in the condition of the work as it has come down to us. Of these phototypes, however, there are but a few in Mrs. Mitchell's book, although that volume is accompanied by a portfolio containing thirty-six such plates; an appendix which we can warmly recommend. Nearly three hundred woodcuts are scattered through the book, and these are of unequal value. Some are mere outlines; inoffensive indications of the general design of sculptures. Some are very refined and skilful pieces of engraving, transferred to the volume from the pages of the Century Magazine, in which a large portion of Mrs. Mitchell's work originally appeared. They have not the advantage of being so carefully printed here as they were in the magazine, but such engravings as the head of the "Hermes" of Praxiteles, facing p. 438, or the "Peiraian Tombstone," on p. 503, are welcome in any condition. Unhappily, side by side with these, we find illustrations so incompetent as the restorations of "The Olympia Pediments," to face p. 264, which seem to be reductions of poor lithographs, or so coarse as the "Tyche and Orontes," on p. 553. It will probably be some time before the public is presented with a manual of sculpture in which all the illustrations are uniformly excellent.

In the meantime Mr. Murray's book may serve as a dreadful example of all that publishers should avoid in the way of illustration. It is only fair, however, to mention one or two exceptions. The phototype of a slab from the frieze of the Parthenon, opposite p. 40, though needlessly clouded, is not unsatisfactory. The restoration of the West Pediment at Olympia for p. 146 is exceedingly good. The outline woodcuts, of which a great number are given, are, like those used in Mrs. Mitchell's book, fairly inoffensive. But what are we to say of the hideous lithograph of the Apollo Sauroktonos which faces p. 260? What of the still more ridiculous Hermes of p. 256, the face of which is distorted into a comic grin? If the newly-invented processes are destined to fill our books with plates so feeble and meaningless as those which are supposed to reproduce the fragments from the Nike Temple, we do not desire that they should be encouraged. Of these lovely forms scarcely an intelligible shadow is preserved. Another kind of horror is presented to us in the plate of bronze statuettes for p. 114, where an attempt to reproduce the appearance of the original patina has had the result of making the figures look as though they were badly modelled in clay, and smeared over with Brunswick black. They have a fine swarthy polish, but it is that sort of polish which housemaids give to grates. The palm of badness must be shared between these little figures and a frightful species of black ghost on p. 396 which does duty for a marble statuette of Aphrodite from Antaradus. We fear that the practical value of this book, into which so much careful scholarship has been cast, will be seriously diminished by the badness of the illustrations, and we are very sorry to see an eminent publishing firm like that of Mr. John Murray persistently indifferent to this matter. A time will surely come when it shall be impossible to send out to the world learned and standard volumes of art-criticism the illustrations of which are positively degrading to the eye.

ROCKSTRO'S MENDELSSOHN.*

MR. ROCKSTRO'S Life of Handel was vastly eloquent, prodigiously critical, uncommonly imaginative and ambitious. His Mendelssohn, in the unhappy "Great Musicians" series, is merely amiable and anecdotic and a little futile. That this is so is matter for astonishment not less than regret. Mr. Rockstro knew his hero intimately; he has for him the enthusiasm of the pupil for the master; he is deeply read in Mendelssohn's music, in Mendelssohn's innumerable letters, in Mendelssohn's many biographies; he has the Mendelssohnian tradition and the Mendelssohnian literature at his fingers' ends. But he has little or nothing to tell of Mendelssohn that is not commonplace and dull. Of the vast mass of material at his disposal he has forgotten nearly all that is personal and significant, and remembered only what is valueless and ineffective. He is prodigal of Mendelssohn's programmes and the dates of Mendelssohn's most trifling works; he is careful to note that Mendelssohn played the organ here, and the viola there, and the piano elsewhere; he delights to narrate how Mendelssohn presented him with a woollen muffler and Ferdinand David with a packet of cigars, how Mendelssohn was an adept in the compounding of Maitrank, how to please Mendelssohn one of Mendelssohn's pupils cut his hair, and how "there was not a student then present who would not gladly have had his head shaved could he thereby have purchased the smile" with which the well-barbered one was "rewarded for his devotion." The best chapter in his book is one containing an account of Mendelssohn's method of instruction, and exceedingly useful and interesting it is. But of Mendelssohn's place in art, of the artistic development of Mendelssohn's mind, of Mendelssohn's influence on his contemporaries and on posterity, of the peculiar quality and capacity of Mendelssohn's genius, of the difference even between Mendelssohn's style of playing and the styles of Liszt and Chopin, he has not much to say. On these points he is either inadequate or mute. To know about them we must inquire elsewhere.

This is the more to be regretted as Mendelssohn was a great artist, and one whose achievement in music, in spite of the change of fashion and ideal, will not soon be forgotten, and can never, even by the most ardent Wagnerite, be ignored or overlooked. Since he flourished and wrought the world has lived many lives, and suffered and delighted in many changes. It has learned to glory in the genius of Berlioz; it has accepted Brahms; it has taken Wagner very seriously indeed; the example and influence of Weber and Beethoven are everywhere triumphant. But the music of Mendelssohn is still popular, is still moving. His mantle, it is true, has fallen on nobody's shoulders; his theory of instrumentation has profited but few; and in the practice of those composers who have the ear of time and the world there is little or nothing to be discerned of that "method of phrasing" which Mr. Rockstro accounts his peculiar excellence. But, for all that, his name is still a name to conjure with, and his work, like the Laureate's, is still found incomparable after its kind. In his life he was fortunate from first to last; in his art from first to last he stood forth admirably conspicuous. Mr. Rockstro, arguing from a purely Mendelssohnian point of view, pretends that, "feeling the Divine Fire within him," he "stood forth as the Champion of the Art he loved, and did battle bravely against the partisans who, pretending to advance it, were in reality its bitterest enemies;" but Mr. Rockstro, who recognizes among his hero's contemporaries only Auber and Spohr, is careful not to tell us who these partisans were, and with equal discretion refrains from describing the object of those assaults which Mendelssohn is supposed to have withstood.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

M. JOHN NINET'S (1) account of the Arabi rebellion (which of course he maintains to have been no rebellion at all) and of his own woes at its suppression is very much what was to be expected. M. Ninet may be thought to have made something of a commercial, if not of a political, mistake in waiting two years to bring out his book. Things go quickly now, and the Egyptian affairs of which men are thinking have advanced a long way from the "Nilotic Nationalism" which M. Ninet upholds and mourns. The book is not unamusing, though the author frequently forgets himself, as when he charges Lieutenant Smith Dorrien with not having seen what Lieutenant Smith Dorrien officially reported himself as seeing. As probably the chief account of the Alexandrian business from the rebels' side to which historians will have to look, the volume deserves some notice, and we at least are not concerned to deny that M. Ninet makes some points against the mismanagement which blundered into a bombardment without having force to occupy. The fault, however, was of course not Lord Alcester's, with whom M. Ninet is very funnily angry. As for M. Ninet himself, we are not sorry that he was not hanged or shot, vast as is the harm which he and men like him do in the world. But we really think he might be less vociferous about his sufferings, considering how very easily he got off. We do not know the Swiss equivalent for "if you play at bowls you must expect to meet with rubbers." But when people choose to take part with those who raise an armed insurrection against the Government of their country, and employ the resources of that country in making war on foreigners, they may think themselves rather lucky after the collapse of the rebellion if they escape with a short sojourn in an uncomfortable prison and the loss of some personal property.

The French schools of Rome and Athens in the persons of two ex-members have just produced a couple of very creditable monographs (2, 3). The larger of the two, which belongs to the official series published by the two schools, is a book of considerable detail and erudition. The smaller "Study of Cypriot Greek" is a doctoral thesis, and a good specimen of a class of essay which might be revived in England with advantage.

We certainly shall not commit ourselves to the sweeping and heterodox proposition that all books on æsthetics are rubbish. But we own to a great suspicion of general discussions on a subject which is, as a whole, too vague, and in parts too complicated and diverse, to lend itself to anything like general and yet compendious treatment. M. Guyau's book (4) has not, we confess, inclined us to look more favourably on its class. Alternately discussing such vast questions as whether art is going to perish altogether, and correcting M. Théodore de Banville (on whose side, by the way, we bet our little pile) about the proper division of nine-syllable lines, M. Guyau seems to us to have produced what may be called a few remarks rather than a book.

There are several good articles in the Revue suisse (5) this month, among which may be pointed out a paper on General Gordon and a lively story entitled "Joyeuse Vadion," which is not yet finished.

M. Ohnet has shown his gratitude to the public which has received his dramas, as well as his novels, with favour by making the subject of Lise Fleuron (6) almost wholly theatrical. Lise is a virtuous and amiable actress who is plotted against successfully by an unvirtuous and unamiable rival. The fortunes of the Théâtre Moderne, its enterprising director, its company, and the successful play which is written for it by one of the characters, fill the book for the most part. We have never pretended to admire M. Ohnet's novels greatly, and their immense vogue is no doubt due in part to a reaction against the incredible brutality of the later naturalist performances, in part to the fact that such merit as they have is obvious to the meanest capacity. What M. Ohnet can do is to bustle a story along in a fairly dramatic fashion, and this is always popular. M. Durny's Andrée (7) is a clever book; but its merit is not perhaps quite equal to its cleverness. The heroine is the daughter of a rich nobody, who is anxious to marry genius or rank, or both; who, in common phrase, outstays her market; and who marries a semi-Bohemian viscount, a dabbler in coteris literature and art, under the impression that he is a great man and that she loves him. This impression she is not long in finding out to be mistaken in both points. There are some good studies of contemporary phases of thought and life in France; but the book is a little overdone with them and with the author's talk about his characters. Except in very rare cases, this kind of treatment always produces a certain heaviness. M. Ricard's Magdon (8) is really a better book than either Lise Fleuron or Andrée, but it is much slighter. It is a pity that this very promising writer does not give himself more time to elaborate his work. Magdon, however, the history, or historiette, of a country girl who marries a rich and brutal farmer, and dies partly of regret for an earlier love, partly of her husband's cruelty and indifference, both aggravating the weakness of her constitution, is simple enough, and to some readers may lack interest; but it is very well written and very well told, while it is much less repulsive in subject and detail than Pitchoun or La voix d'or. M. Ricard is certainly capable of better work than any of the three. Asunta (9) is a story of Corsican life, very inoffensive, and not without pathos. If Mérimée had only not written Colomba!

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

THE long-delayed publication of Heine's Memoirs makes a good opportunity for translating or reprinting everything of any value which has been written about him, and so the appearance of "Camille Selden's" Last Days of Heinrich Heine (Remington & Co.) in English is at least opportune. As usual with works written in French, it does not gain by translation. Clare Brune (Mr., Mrs., or Miss) does not, as far as we can see, make downright mistakes, but he or she does contrive to be exceedingly wooden, and to steer very near mere French idioms. The picture of the poet's last days given by Camille Selden is already well known. It has the merit of being obviously truthful, and therefore it is very painful. The author, who was Heine's pet in his latter days, shirks nothing. Her intense sympathy and admiration for him do not lead her to conceal what was hideous, and even at times ignoble, in the last stage of his life.

The "American Men of Letters Series" (Boston: Mifflin & Co.; London: Trübner & Co.) was in duty bound to contain a Life of Margaret Fuller. The author, Mr. F. W. Higginson, has succeeded in making a decidedly readable book out of a terribly overwritten subject. Concerning that lady herself we incline to think that everything has been said which needs to be said. They think otherwise in the United States, and very naturally. After reading Mr. Higginson, we remain as usual utterly puzzled as to what it was that caused Margaret Fuller to be such a burning and a shining light. She appears, as before, to have been a painfully well-informed person, of oppressive fluency—and not much more. Something more she must have been; but then that "something" is just what only a biographer who is a man of genius can make intelligible. Margaret Fuller should have found a Johnson or a Carlyle to write her life; but it is not many persons in a century who have the luck of Savage or John Sterling.

Mr. Henry B. Wheatley has reprinted in neat pamphlet form (Elliot Stock) his articles on the late Mr. Payne Collier, published in the Bibliographer. They contain a short sketch of his life, and a complete list of his works. At the end Mr. Wheatley gives an account of "Collier's Shakespeare Documents," of contentious memory.

What Shall We Do with Our Daughters? (Boston: Lee & Shepard; London: Trübner & Co.) is the great question propounded by Miss Mary A. Livermore. Her answer to her own question is that we ought to set them to work. In the course of explaining how this is to be done, Miss Livermore talks a great deal of the nonsense usually found among people who will write about the great woman question, but she contrives to dilute it with not a little sense. There is one part of the little book which we can conscientiously recommend as funny, and that is Miss Livermore's indignant chapter on the phrase "superfluous women." She tears it to pieces with dire wrath.

Those persons who are disturbed by the wickedness of the great Ingersoll have found a champion in the Rev. L. A. Lambert, of Waterloo, N.Y. Mr. Lambert, in his Notes on Ingersoll (John Hodges), reprinted, according to the title-page, from the fifth American edition, pursues his enemy from pillar to post, quoting him and confuting him in good scholastic style, not without showing him that he is a very ignorant, vulgar scribbler, and by no means so original as he supposes himself to be.

Suggestions to China Painters, by M. Louise McLaughlin (Cincinnati: Clarke & Co.), makes at least a very pretty little book. We will not undertake to decide as to the value of the instruction given on technical points; but the general artistic rules are sound on the great questions of drawing and the necessity of attending to values. The illustrations are less praiseworthy. Some of the woodcuts of flowers are blurred, and the head on p. 67 is simply coarse.

As Mrs. Haweis justly observes, birthday books are now so fashionable that there is no need to apologize for a new one. Consequently her Chaucer's Beads (Allen & Co.) has as good a right to exist as another birthday book. Touching its merits, we may point out that it is larger than usual, is printed on hand-made paper, and is much infested with æsthetic red-ink.

Mr. G. Holden Pike publishes a Life of the Earl of Shaftesbury (Partridge & Co.), illustrated by some of the most painful cuts ever seen. For Their Sakes (Chapman & Hall) is the title of a collection of stories and verse by various popular writers, made for the use of the deaf and dumb in charitable institutions. The promoters of the Manchester Ship Canal publish the Reply of Mr. Pember, Q.C., delivered before the House of Lords on behalf of the Bill (Mackie & Co.) Mr. Frank Banfield, M.A. Oxon, has added a thin book of notices of military and naval officers of various nations to his series of "Biographies of Celebrities for the People" (John & Robert Maxwell). The portraits are as hideous as usual. We have to notice a pretty, new edition of Alice Learmont: a Fairy Tale, by the author of John Halifax, Gentleman (Macmillan & Co.); and also a new edition of Dr. J. E. Taylor's Half Hours at the Seaside (Allen & Co.) A Selection of Milton's Prose Writings, made by Mr. E. Myers, has been added to the Parchment Library (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.) The Royal University Calendar for 1884 is published (Dublin: Thom & Co.); and a Scottish School Board Directory and Teachers' Guide, 1882-84, is published by Alexander Gardner, Paisley. We have also received The Bicycles of the Year 1884, and Part IX. of a Guide to the Identification and Valuation of British Coins, both published by L. Upcott Gill, London.

BERNA BOYLE. By Mrs. J. H. Riddell, Author of "The Mystery in Palace Gardens." 3 vols crown 8vo.

'An admirable study of life and character is Mrs. Riddell's Berna Boyle. It would be unjust to the author to reveal the details of her plot, but woman proves the reader that he will be deeply interested in it. It is one conspicuous merit of this novel that all the characters are well and vividly drawn—there is not one who is shadowy and unsubstantial—and the local colour of the narrative is excellently rendered. Though the story is not without its sterner passages, these are now and again lighted up with real Irish humour. Berna's mother is as good as one of the creations of Dickens and English Ludham, the 'brightest ornament of the Butlandshire ragamuffins, is worthy to bear her company.'—Academy POINT BLANK. By Pamela Sneyd. 3 vols crown 8vo.

'Point Blank' is a decidedly clever and well written story, and quite worthy of the author of 'Jack Urquhart's Daughter.'—Saturday Review

'Point Blank' will be read with pleasure for its bright sketches of society. The dialogues also are lively and natural, and the plot abounds in varied incident.'—Morning Post

The RHYME of the LADY of the ROCK, and How it Grew. By Emily Pfeiffer, Author of "Glan Alarch" &c.

"Nothing could be better of its kind than this narrative of a ride to Mull, and there is a genuineness and perception of the Highland character which is most soothing to the feelings too often irritated by the arrogant impertinence of casual tourists. The characters of old Ursula and Miss M'Corquodale are simply perfect in their way."—Graphic.

ILARIA; and other Poems. By Ernle S. W. Johnson.

'This little book shows considerable feeling for beauty in external nature.'—Academy

'Stories told with much feeling and grace and in melodious, clear and facile verse. Chiefly a mild grey tone.'—World

'Ilaria' is a romantic tragedy told of a noble Italian girl who, for her love's sake and the purity of it, surrenders all to become one of the people. Among Mr Johnson's other poems is one that celebrates the loves of Daphnis and Lycé with considerable grace and charm, and with a simplicity that well accords with the beautiful tale.—Saturday Review

The present little book is a production of which no young poet need feel ashamed. It possesses in its small limits much excellence for the future. The versification is generally good and the language employed is pleasant and musical.—Morning Post

PLAYS.

CALLIRRHOE. FAIR ROSAMUND. By MICHAEL FIELD.

In a review of four columns the Spectator says: "These poems are poems of great promise.....We have found a wealth of surprise in the strength, the simplicity, and the terseness of the imaginative feeling they display.....That has the true personal ring in it.....It sounds like the ring of a new voice which is likely to be heard far and wide among the English-speaking peoples. The passage is full of genius."

In a review of two columns the Academy says: "He sings the glories of enthusiasm and preaches the gospel of ecstasy to an old and chillier-minded world. We may credit him with a fresh gift of song, a picturesque, a vivid style."

In a lengthy review the Scotsman has: "'Callirrhoe,' a work of singular originality, beauty, and strength.....In both poems there is that ethereal quality that distinguishes what is poetry from what is not."

The Pall Mall Gazette says: "'Fair Rosamund' has real power. The scenes are more like the work of the minor Elizabethans than the similar work of any recent writer except the late Mr. Holmes."

LONDON: G. BELL & SON. CLIFTON: J. BAKER & SON.

MESSRS. LONGMANS' NEW BOOKS.

DISSOLVING VIEWS: a Novel. By Mrs. ANDREW LANG. 2 vols. crown 8vo. 14s.

"We have not in the least exaggerated the pleasure and pastime which the book is pretty certain to give to people of good breeding, reasonably wide interests, good taste, and a slight inclination to the humorous view of life."—SATURDAY REVIEW.

"Life in a Midland county, a duel in Paris, the Oxford and Cambridge cricket match, the gathering of the clans at Oban, a performance of 'The Clouds,' &c.—these are the staple incidents of the story; but its real interest lies in the writer's charming style and 'power of saying good things, which have now and again a touch of George Meredith about them."—ACADEMY.

WITH PREFACE BY J. A. FROUDE.

Now ready, 2 vols. 8vo. 28s.

IRELAND in the SEVENTEENTH CENTURY; or, the Irish Massacres of 1641-2, their Causes and Results. By MARY HICKSON. With Preface by J. A. FROUDE.

 In these volumes Illustrative Extracts are given from the unpublished State Papers, the unpublished MSS. in the Bodleian Library, Lambeth Library, and the Library of the Royal Dublin Society, relating to the Plantations of 1610-30; a Selection from the unpublished Depositions relating to the Massacres, with facsimiles; and the Reports of the Trials in the High Court of Justice, 1652-4, from the unpublished MSS. in Trinity College, Dublin.

RANCH NOTES in KANSAS, COLORADO, the INDIAN TERRITORY, and NORTHERN TEXAS. By REGINALD ALDRIDGE. With 4 full-page Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 5s.

"This is an unpretentious and very pleasant little volume.....By shrewdness and indomitable pluck, or, as Mr. Aldridge prefers to put it, by good luck, he has been enabled after less than seven years to become a substantial ranchman, whose herds graze, if not on a thousand hills, at least on a good many acres. Everything, so far as we have tested the statements, seems to be set down honestly, without exaggeration, and devoid of untoward intentions against the purse of the promoter."—ACADEMY.

The HEALTH of the SENSES: Sight, Hearing, Voice, Smell and Taste, Skin; with some General Hints on Health, Diet, Education, Health Resorts of Europe, &c. By H. MACNAUGHTON JONES, M.D. F.R.C.S.I. & Ed. With 60 Woodcut Illustrations. Crown 8vo. price 3s. 6d.

"FROM GRAVE to GAY"; a Volume of Selections from the complete Poems of H. CHOLMONDELEY-PENNELL, Author of "Puck on Pegasus" &c. Printed on hand-made paper, with a Portrait etched by C. W. Sherborne. Fcp. 8vo. (top edges gilt), 6s.

"This volume is certain to increase Mr. Cholmondeley-Pennell's reputation, and is as pretty a book to present to one's fair as the student is likely to find."—HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

 This forms the first volume of Military Biographies.

"This work is the first of a series of military biographies which Messrs. Chapman & Hall are issuing. The idea is an excellent one, and if the succeeding volumes maintain the high standard which Colonel Brackenbury has fixed in the first issue of the series, the execution will leave little to be desired."

HUNT-ROOM STORIES and YACHTING YARNS. By Wanderer, Author of "Across Country," "Fair Diana," &c. With Illustrations by Edgar Giborne. Demy 8vo. 12s.

"We commend this book, not only to the sporting world, who are sure to read and enjoy it, but to the general public, who will get more amusement out of these unpretending yarns, where the interest is unflagging, the characters life like, and the style easy and natural, than out of most of the many ambitious novels of the season."—Sporting News.

SHORT STUDIES in ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY and BIOGRAPHY. By the Rev. H. N. Oxenham. Demy 8vo. price 12s.

"They all bear the stamp of culture, of extensive reading within a certain area, of attention to the philosophical as well as the external aspects of the events discussed, and of impartiality."—Academy.

OFFICIAL PUBLICATIONS

ISSUED BY THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL OF THE INTERNATIONAL HEALTH EXHIBITION.

"Among the actual results of the opening of the Health Exhibition, not the least important is the issue of a series of Official Handbooks, now in course of publication, that practically illustrate the science of health in all its leading branches. The general excellence of the first instalment of these handbooks promises well for the value and completeness of the series; while the price at which they are issued, varying from 1s. to 2s., should assure the success they merit."—Saturday Review.
